Only, we want a little personal strength;
And pause us, till these rebels, now afoot,
Come underneath the yoke of government.

War. Both which we doubt not but your majesty shall soon enjoy.

K. Hen. Humphrey, my son of Gloster,
Where is the prince your brother?

P. Humph. I think he's gone to hunt, my lord, at Windsor.<sup>4</sup>

K. Hen. And how accompanied?

P. Humph. I do not know, my lord.

K. Hen. Is not his brother, Thomas of Clarence, with him?

P. Humph. No, my good lord; he is in presence here.

Cl. What would my lord and father?

K. Hen. Nothing but well to thee, Thomas of Clarence. How chance thou art not with the prince thy brother?

He loves thee, and thou dost neglect him, Thomas;

Thou hast a better place in his affection

Than all thy brothers: cherish it, my boy;

And noble offices thou may'st effect

Of mediation, after I am dead,

Between his greatness and thy other brethren:

Therefore, omit him not; blunt not his love:

Nor lose the good advantage of his grace,

By seeming cold, or careless of his will.

For he is gracious, if he be observ'd;

He hath a tear for pity, and a hand

Open as day for melting charity:

Yet notwithstanding, being incens'd, he's flint;

As humorous<sup>4</sup> as winter, and as sudden

As flaws<sup>5</sup> congealed in the spring of day.

His temper, therefore, must be well observ'd:

Chide him for faults, and do it reverently,

When you perceive his blood inclin'd to mirth:

But, being moody, give him line and scope;

Till that his passions, like a whale on ground,

Confound themselves with working. Learn this, Thomas,

And thou shalt prove a shelter to thy friends;

A hoop of gold, to bind thy brothers in;

That the united vessel of their blood,

Mingled with venom of suggestion,

(As, force perforce, the age will pour it in,)

Shall never leak, though it do work as strong

As aconitum, or rash gunpowder.

Cl. I shall observe him with all care and love.

K. Hen. Why art thou not at Windsor with him, Thomas?

Cl. He is not there to-day; he dines in London.

K. Hen. And how accompanied? canst thou tell that?

Cl. With Poins, and other his continual followers.

K. Hen. Most subject is the fattest soil to weeds;

And he, the noble image of my youth,

Is overspread with them: Therefore my grief

Stretches itself beyond the hour of death;

The blood weeps from my heart, when I do shape,

In forms imaginary, the unguided days,

And rotten times, that you shall look upon

When I am sleeping with my ancestors.

For when his headstrong riot hath no curb,

When rage and hot blood are his counsellors,

When means and lavish manners meet together,

<sup>4</sup> Humorous, applied literally, is humid—as "humorous night" in Romeo and Juliet. In this passage it has the sense of full of humours, alluding to the supposed fluids or humours of the body, which constituted the individual temperament.

<sup>5</sup> Flaws—thin crystallizations upon the ground moist with the morning dew.

O, with what wings shall his affections fly
Towards fronting peril and oppos'd decay!

War. My gracious lord, you look beyond him quite :
The prince but studies his companions,
Like a strange tongue : wherein, to gain the language,
'Tis needful that the most immodest word
Be look'd upon and learn'd : which once attain'd,
Your highness knows comes to no further use,
But to be known and hated. So, like gross terms,
The prince will, in the perfectness of time,
Cast off his followers : and their memory
Shall as a pattern or a measure live,
By which his grace must mete the lives of others ;
Turning past evils to advantages.

K. Hen. 'Tis seldom when the bee doth leave her comb
In the dead carrion.—Who's here? Westmoreland?

Enter WESTMORELAND.

West. Health to my sovereign! and new happiness
Added to that that I am to deliver!
Prince John, your son, doth kiss your grace's hand :
Mowbray, the bishop Scroop, Hastings, and all,
Are brought to the correction of your law ;
There is not now a rebel's sword unsheath'd,
But peace puts forth her olive everywhere.
The manner how this action hath been borne
Here at more leisure may your highness read ;
With every course, in his particular.<sup>1</sup>

K. Hen. O Westmoreland, thou art a summer bird,
Which ever in the haunch of winter sings
The lifting up of day. Look! here's more news.

Enter HARCOURT.

Har. From enemies heaven keep your majesty ;
And, when they stand against you, may they fall
As those that I am come to tell you of!
The earl Northumberland, and the lord Bardolph,
With a great power of English and of Scots,
Are by the sheriff of Yorkshire overthrown :
The manner and true order of the fight,
This packet, please it you, contains at large.

K. Hen. And wherefore should these good news make me sick?

Will fortune never come with both hands full,
But write her fair words still in foulest letters
She either gives a stomach, and no food,—
Such are the poor, in health ; or else a feast,
And takes away the stomach,—such are the rich,
That have abundance, and enjoy it not.
I should rejoice now at this happy news ;
And now my sight fails, and my brain is giddy :—
O me! come near me, now I am much ill. [Swoons.]

P. Humph. Comfort, your majesty!

Cla. O my royal father!

West. My sovereign lord, cheer up yourself, look up!

War. Be patient, princes ; you do know, these fits
Are with his highness very ordinary.
Stand from him, give him air ; he'll straight be well.

Cla. No, no ; he cannot long hold out these pangs ;
The incessant care and labour of his mind
Hath wrought the mure,<sup>2</sup> that should confine it in,
So thin, that life looks through, and will break out.<sup>f</sup>

P. Humph. The people fear me ;<sup>3</sup> for they do observe Unfather'd heirs, and loathly births of nature :<sup>4</sup>
The seasons change their manners, as the year
Had found some months asleep, and leap'd them over.

Cla. The river hath thrice flow'd, no ebb between :
And the old folk, time's doting chronicles,
Say it did so, a little time before

That our great-grandsire, Edward, sick'd and died.

War. Speak lower, princes, for the king recovers.

P. Humph. This apoplexy will, certain, be his end.

K. Hen. I pray you, take me up, and bear me hence
Into some other chamber : softly, pray.

[They convey the KING into an inner part of the room, and place him on a bed.]

Let there be no noise made, my gentle friends ;
Unless some dull and favourable hand
Will whisper music to my weary spirit.

War. Call for the music in the other room.

K. Hen. Set me the crown upon my pillow here.

Cla. His eye is hollow, and he changes much.

War. Less noise, less noise.

Enter PRINCE HENRY.

P. Hen. Who saw the duke of Clarence?

Cla. I am here, brother, full of heaviness.

P. Hen. How now! rain within doors, and none abroad!
How doth the king?

P. Humph. Exceeding ill.

P. Hen. Heard he the good news yet?
Tell it him.

P. Humph. He alter'd much upon the hearing it.

P. Hen. If he be sick

With joy, he will recover without physic.

War. Not so much noise, my lords :—sweet prince,<sup>1</sup> speak low ;

The king your father is dispos'd to sleep.

Cla. Let us withdraw into the other room.

War. Will't please your grace to go along with us?

P. Hen. No ; I will sit and watch here by the king.

[Exeunt all but P. HENRY.]

Why doth the crown lie there upon his pillow,
Being so troublesome a bedfellow?
O polish'd perturbation! golden care!
That keep'st the ports of slumber open wide
To many a watchful night!—sleep with it now!
Yet not so sound, and half so deeply sweet,
As he, whose brow, with homely biggin bound,
Snore out the watch of night. O majesty!
When thou dost pinch thy bearer, thou dost sit
Like a rich armour worn in heat of day,
That scalds with safety. By his gates of breath
There lies a downy feather which stirs not:
Did he suspire, that light and weightless down
Perforce must move. My gracious lord! my father
This sleep is sound indeed ; this is a sleep,
That from this golden rigol<sup>5</sup> hath divorc'd
So many English kings. Thy due, from me,
Is tears, and heavy sorrows of the blood ;
Which nature, love, and filial tenderness,
Shall, O dear father, pay thee plenteously :
My due, from thee, is this imperial crown ;
Which, as immediate from thy place and blood,
Derives itself to me. Lo, here it sits,—

[Putting it on his head.]

Which heaven shall guard : And put the world's whole strength

Into one giant arm, it shall not force
This lineal honour from me : This from thee
Will I to mine leave, as 'tis left to me.

[Exit.]

K. Hen. Warwick! Gloster! Clarence!

<sup>4</sup> Births of nature. So the old editions. Why the passage has been corrupted into birds of nature we cannot divine. Johnson must bear the blame of this.

Re-enter WARWICK, and the rest.

Cla. Doth the king call?

War. What would your majesty? How fares your grace?

K. Hen. Why did you leave me here alone, my lords?

Cla. We left the prince my brother here, my liege,
Who undertook to sit and watch by you.

K. Hen. The prince of Wales? Where is he? let me see him

He is not here.<sup>1</sup>

War. This door is open; he is gone this way.

P. Humph. He came not through the chamber where we stay'd.

K. Hen. Where is the crown? who took it from my pillow?

War. When we withdrew, my liege, we left it here.

K. Hen. The prince hath ta'en it hence;—go, seek him out.

Is he so hasty, that he doth suppose

My sleep my death?

Find him, my lord of Warwick; chide him hither.

[Exit WARWICK.]

This part of his conjoins with my disease,
And helps to end me.—See, sons, what things you are!

How quickly nature falls into revolt

When gold becomes her object!

For this the foolish over-careful fathers

Have broke their sleep with thoughts, their brains with care,

Their bones with industry;

For this they have engrossed and pil'd up

The canker'd heaps of strange-achieved gold;

For this they have been thoughtful to invest

Their sons with arts, and martial exercises:

When, like the bee, culling<sup>2</sup> from every flower

The virtuous sweets;

Our thighs pack'd with wax, our mouths with honey,

We bring it to the hive; and, like the bees,

Are murther'd for our pains. This bitter taste

Yields his engrossments to the ending father.

Re-enter WARWICK.

Now, where is he that will not stay so long
Till his friend sickness hath determin'd<sup>3</sup> me?

War. My lord, I found the prince in the next room,
Washing with kindly tears his gentle cheeks;
With such a deep demeanour in great sorrow,
That tyranny, which never quaff'd but blood,
Would, by beholding him, have wash'd his knife
With gentle eye-drops. He is coming hither.

K. Hen. But wherefore did he take away the crown?

Re-enter PRINCE HENRY.

Lo, where he comes. Come hither to me, Harry.
Depart the chamber, leave us here alone.

[Exeunt CLARENCE, PRINCE HUMPHREY, Lords, &c.]

P. Hen. I never thought to hear you speak again.

K. Hen. Thy wish was father, Harry, to that thought:
I stay too long by thee, I weary thee.

Dost thou so hunger for my empty chair,

That thou wilt needs invest thee with mine honours

Before thy hour be ripe? O foolish youth!

Thou seek'st the greatness that will overwhelm thee.

Stay but a little; for my cloud of dignity

Is held from falling with so weak a wind,

That it will quickly drop: my day is dim.

Thou hast stol'n that, which, after some few hours,
Were thine without offence; and, at my death,
Thou hast seal'd up my expectation:
Thy life did manifest thou lov'dst me not,
And thou wilt have me die assur'd of it.
Thou hid'st a thousand daggers in thy thoughts;
Which thou hast whetted on thy stony heart,
To stab at half an hour of my life.

What! canst thou not forbear me half an hour?
Then get thee gone; and dig my grave thyself;

And bid the merry bells ring to thine ear
That thou art crowned, not that I am dead.

Let all the tears that should bedew my hearse

Be drops of balm, to sanctify thy head:

Only compound me with forgotten dust;

Give that, which gave thee life, unto the worms.

Pluck down my officers, break my decrees;

For now a time is come to mock at form.

Harry the Fifth is crown'd:—Up, vanity!

Down, royal state! all you sage counsellors, hence!

And to the English court assemble now,

From every region, apes of idleness!

Now, neighbour confines, purge you of your scum:

Have you a ruffian that will swear, drink, dance,

Revel the night; rob, murder, and commit

The oldest sins the newest kind of ways?

Be happy, he will trouble you no more:

England shall double gild his treble guilt:

England shall give him office, honour, might:

For the fifth Harry from curb'd licence plucks

The muzzle of restraint, and the wild dog

Shall flesh his tooth in every innocent.

O my poor kingdom, sick with civil blows!

When that my care could not withhold thy riots,

What wilt thou do when riot is thy care?

O, thou wilt be a wilderness again,

Peopled with wolves, thy old inhabitants!

P. Hen. O, pardon me, my liege! but for my tears,

[Kneeling.]

The moist impediments unto my speech,
I had forestall'd this dear and deep rebuke,
Ere you with grief had spoke, and I had heard

The course of it so far. There is your crown:

And He that wears the crown immortally,

Long guard it yours! If I affect it more,

Than as your honour, and as your renown,

Let me no more from this obedience rise,—

(Which my most true and inward duteous spirit

Teacheth,)—this prostrate and exterior bending!

Heaven witness with me, when I here came in

And found no course of breath within your majesty,

How cold it struck my heart! If I do feign,

O, let me in my present wildness die;

And never live to show the incredulous world

The noble change that I have purposed!

Coming to look on you, thinking you dead,

(And dead almost, my liege, to think you were,)

I spake unto the crown as having sense,

And thus upbraided it:—"The care on thee depending

Hath fed upon the body of my father;

Therefore, thou, best of gold, art worst of gold.

Other, less fine in carat, is more precious,

Preserving life in med'cine potable;<sup>4</sup>

But thou, most fine, most honour'd, most renown'd,

Hast eat thy bearer up."—Thus, my most royal liege,

Accusing it, I put it on my head,

To try with it, as with an enemy,

That had before my face murder'd my father,

<sup>4</sup> Med'cine potable. The allusion is here to aurum potable, a preparation of gold to which great virtues were formerly ascribed.

The quarrel of a true inheritor.
But if it did infect my blood with joy,
Or swell my thoughts to any strain of pride ;
If any rebel or vain spirit of mine
Did, with the least affection of a welcome,
Give entertainment to the might of it,
Let heaven for ever keep it from my head,
And make me as the poorest vassal is,
That doth with awe and terror kneel to it.

K. Hen. O my son !
Heaven put it in thy mind to take it hence,
That thou might'st win the more thy father's love,
Pleading so wisely in excuse of it.
Come hither, Harry, sit thou by my bed ;
And hear, I think, the very latest counsel
That ever I shall breathe. Heaven knows, my son,
By what by-paths, and indirect crook'd ways,
I met this crown ; and I myself know well
How troublesome it sat upon my head :
To thee it shall descend with better quiet,
Better opinion, better confirmation ;
For all the soil of the achievement goes
With me into the earth. It seem'd in me
But as an honour snatch'd with boisterous hand ;
And I had many living, to upbraid
My gain of it by their assistances ;
Which daily grew to quarrel, and to bloodshed,
Wounding supposed peace : all these bold fears,
Thou seest, with peril I have answered :
For all my reign hath been but as a scene
Acting that argument ; and now my death
Changes the mood : for what in me was purchas'd,
Falls upon thee in a more fairer sort ;
So thou the garland wear'st successively.
Yet, though thou stand'st more sure than I could do,
Thou art not firm enough, since griefs are green ;
And all my friends, which thou must make thy friends,
Have but their stings and teeth newly ta'en out ;
By whose fell working I was first advanc'd,
And by whose power I well might lodge a fear
To be again displac'd : which to avoid,
I cut them off ; and had a purpose now
To lead out many to the Holy Land ;
Lest rest, and lying still, might make them look Too near unto my state. Therefore, my Harry,
Be it thy course, to busy giddy minds
With foreign quarrels ; that action, hence borne out,
May waste the memory of the former days.
More would I, but my lungs are wasted so,
The strength of speech is utterly denied me.
How I came by the crown, O heaven forgive !
And grant it may with thee in true peace live !

P. Hen. My gracious liege,
You won it, wore it, kept it, gave it me ;
Then plain and right must my possession be :
Which I, with more than with a common pain,
'Gainst all the world will rightfully maintain.

Enter PRINCE JOHN of Lancaster, WARWICK, Lords, and others.

K. Hen. Look, look, here comes my John of Lancaster.
P. John. Health, peace, and happiness, to my royal father !

K. Hen. Thou bring'st me happiness and peace, son John ;
But health, alack, with youthful wings is flown
From this bare, wither'd trunk : upon thy sight,
My worldly business makes a period.
Where is my lord of Warwick ?

P. Hen. My lord of Warwick !

K. Hen. Doth any name particular belong
Unto the lodging where I first did swoon ?

War. 'Tis call'd Jerusalem, my noble lord.

K. Hen. Laud be to heaven !—even there my life must end.

It hath been prophesied to me many years,
I should not die but in Jerusalem ;
Which vainly I suppos'd the Holy Land :—
But, bear me to that chamber ; there I'll lie
In that Jerusalem shall Harry die.<sup>g</sup>

[Exeunt.]

RECENT NEW READINGS.

Sc. I. p. 580.—“ To a loud trumpet, and a point of war.”

“ To a loud trumpet and report of war.”—Collier.

Let us look at the entire passage as we have printed it in the text :—

“ Wherefore do you so ill translate yourself,
Out of the speech of peace, that bears such grace,
Into the harsh and boist'rous tongue of war ?
Turning your books to graves, your ink to blood,
Your pens to lances, and your tongue divine
To a loud trumpet, and a point of war ?”

Mr. Collier says—“ Here ‘point of war’ can have no meaning.” The above ought to be printed thus, on the authority of the Corrector :—

“ Your tongue divine
To a loud trumpet and report of war.”

In “Waverley” we have the following passage :—“ The trumpets and kettle-drums of the cavalry were next heard to perform the beautiful and wild point of war appropriated as a signal for that piece of nocturnal duty.” Of course, when Walter Scott wrote this passage he was deceived by the “no meaning” of the common Shaksperes. Had the word become obsolete when the Corrector changed it to report ? or was the Corrector a caterer for the public taste himself, or one who waited upon the caterers to register their “emendations,” in all cases where it was desirable to popularise Shakspeare, to be intelligible to the ears of the groundlings ? It was intelligible in the days of the “Tatler.” “On a sudden we were alarmed by the noise of a drum, and immediately entered my little godson, to give us a point of war.”

Sc. IV. p. 587.—“ And all thy friends, which thou must make thy friends,
Have but their stings and teeth newly ta'en out ;
By whose fell working I was first advanc'd,
And by whose power I well might lodge a fear
To be again displac'd : which to avoid,
I cut them off.”

“ And all my friends, which thou must make thy friends,
Have but their stings and teeth newly ta'en out ;
By whose fell working I was first advanc'd,
And by whose power I well might lodge a fear
To be again displac'd : which to avoid
I cut some off.”—Collier.

The change of thy to my had been suggested by Tyrwhitt ; and some for them by Mr. Mason, who says, “As the passage stands, the King is advising the Prince to make those persons his friends whom he has already cut off.” The Corrector has both these changes. We adopt my instead of thy, and we reject some.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Glostershire. A Hall in Shallow's House.

Enter SHALLOW, FALSTAFF, BARDOLPH, and Page.

Shal. By cock and pye,<sup>a</sup> sir, you shall not away to-night
What, Davy, I say !

Fal. You must excuse me, master Robert Shallow.

Shal. I will not excuse you ; you shall not be excused ; excuses shall not be admitted ; there is no excuse shall serve ; you shall not be excused.—Why, Davy !

Enter DAVY.

Davy. Here, sir.

Shal. Davy, Davy, Davy,—let me see, Davy ; let me see :—yea, marry, William cook, bid him come hither.—Sir
John, you shall not be excused.

Davy. Marry, sir, thus ;—those precepts cannot be served :
and, again, sir,—Shall we sow the head-land with wheat ?

Shal. With red wheat, Davy. But for William cook ;—
Are there no young pigeons ?

Davy. Yes, sir.—Here is now the smith's note for shoeing and plough-irons.

Shal. Let it be cast, and paid :—sir John, you shall not be excused.

Davy. Sir, a new link to the bucket must needs be had :
—And, sir, do you mean to stop any of William's wages,
—about the sack he lost the other day at Hinckley fair ?

Shal. He shall answer it :—Some pigeons, Davy ; a couple of short-legged hens ; a joint of mutton ; and any pretty little tiny kickshaws, tell William cook.

Davy. Doth the man of war stay all night, sir ?

Shal. Yes, Davy. I will use him well. A friend i' the court is better than a penny in purse. Use his men well, Davy ; for they are arrant knaves, and will backbite.

Davy. No worse than they are bitten, sir ; for they have marvellous foul linen.

Shal. Well conceited, Davy. About thy business, Davy.

Davy. I beseech you, sir, to countenance William Visor of Wincot against Clement Perkes of the hill.

Shal. There are many complaints, Davy, against that Visor ; that Visor is an arrant knave, on my knowledge.

Davy. I grant your worship that he is a knave, sir : but, yet, heaven forbid, sir, but a knave should have some countenance at his friend's request. An honest man, sir, is able to speak for himself, when a knave is not. I have served your worship truly, sir, these eight years ; and if I cannot once or twice in a quarter bear out a knave against an honest man, I have but a very little credit with your worship. The knave is mine honest friend, sir ; therefore,
I beseech your worship, let him be countenanced.

Shal. Go to ; I say, he shall have no wrong. Look about, Davy. [Exit DAVY.] Where are you, sir John ?
Come, off with your boots.—Give me your hand, master Bardolph.

Bard. I am glad to see your worship.

Shal. I thank thee with all my heart, kind master Bar-dolph :—and welcome, my tall fellow. [To the Page.] Come,
sir John. [Exit SHALLOW.]

Fal. I'll follow you, good master Robert Shallow. Bar-dolph, look to our horses. [Exeunt BARDOLPH and Page.]
If I were sawed into quantities, I should make four dozen of such bearded hermit's-staves as master Shallow. It is a wonderful thing, to see the semblable coherence of his men's spirits and his : They, by observing of him, do bear themselves like foolish justices ; he, by conversing with them, is turned into a justice-like serving-man ; their spirits are so married in conjunction with the participation of society, that they flock together in consent, like so many wild-geese. If I had a suit to master Shallow, I would humour his men, with the imputation of being near their master : if to his men, I would curry with master Shallow,<sup>b</sup> that no man could better command his servants. It is certain that either wise bearing, or ignorant carriage, is caught as men take diseases, one of another : therefore, let men take heed of their company. I will devise matter enough out of this Shallow to keep prince Harry in continual laughter, the wearing-out of six fashions, (which is four terms or two actions),<sup>c</sup> and he shall laugh without in- tervallums. O, it is much, that a lie with a slight oath, and a jest with a sad brow, will do with a fellow that never had the ache in his shoulders ! O, you shall see him laugh, till his face be like a wet cloak ill laid up.

Shal. [Within.] Sir John !

Fal. I come, master Shallow ; I come, master Shallow.
[Exit FALSTAFF.]

SCENE II.—Westminster. A Room in the Palace.

Enter WARWICK and the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.

War. How now, my lord chief justice ? whither away ?

Ch. Just. How doth the king ?

War. Exceeding well ; his cares are now all ended.

Ch. Just. I hope, not dead.

War. He's walk'd the way of nature ;
And, to our purposes, he lives no more.

Ch. Just. I would his majesty had called me with him :
The service that I truly did his life
Hath left me open to all injuries.

War. Indeed, I think the young king loves you not.

Ch. Just. I know he doth not ; and do arm myself
To welcome the condition of the time ;
Which cannot look more hideously upon me
Than I have drawn it in my fantasy.

Enter PRINCE JOHN, PRINCE HUMPHREY, CLARENCE, WESTMORELAND, and others.

War. Here come the heavy issue of dead Harry ;
O, that the living Harry had the temper
Of him, the worst of these three gentlemen !
How many nobles then should hold their places,
That must strike sail to spirits of vile sort !

Ch. Just. Alas ! I fear all will be overturn'd.

P. John. Good morrow, cousin Warwick, good morrow.

P. Humph., Cla. Good morrow, cousin.

P. John. We meet like men that had forgot to speak.

War. We do remember ; but our argument
Is all too heavy to admit much talk.

P. John. Well, peace be with him that hath made us heavy !

Ch. Just. Peace be with us, lest we be heavier !

P. Humph. O, good my lord, you have lost a friend, indeed :

And I dare swear you borrow not that face
Of seeming sorrow ; it is, sure, your own.

P. John. Though no man be assur'd what grace to find,
You stand in coldest expectation :
I am the sorrier ; 'would 'twere otherwise.

Cla. Well, you must now speak sir John Falstaff fair ;
Which swims against your stream of quality.

Ch. Just. Sweet princes, what I did I did in honour,
Led by the impartial<sup>1</sup> conduct of my soul ;
And never shall you see that I will beg
A ragged and forestall'd remission.<sup>2</sup>
If truth and upright innocency fail me,
I'll to the king my master that is dead,
And tell him who hath sent me after him.

War. Here comes the prince.

Enter KING HENRY V.

Ch. Just. Good morrow ; and heaven save your majesty !

King. This new and gorgeous garment, majesty,
Sits not so easy on me as you think.
Brothers, you mix your sadness with some fear ;
This is the English, not the Turkish court ;
Not Amurath an Amurath succeeds,<sup>d</sup>
But Harry Harry : Yet be sad, good brothers,
For, to speak truth, it very well becomes you ;
Sorrow so royally in you appears,
That I will deeply put the fashion on,
And wear it in my heart. Why then, be sad.
But entertain no more of it, good brothers,
Than a joint burthen laid upon us all.
For me, by heaven, I bid you be assur'd,

I'll be your father and your brother too ;
Let me but bear your love, I'll bear your cares.
Yet weep, that Harry's dead ; and so will I ;
But Harry lives, that shall convert those tears,
By number, into hours of happiness.

P. John, &c. We hope no other from your majesty.

King. You all look strangely on me :—and you most ;
[To the CHIEF JUSTICE.

You are, I think, assur'd I love you not.

Ch. Just. I am assur'd, if I be measur'd rightly,
Your majesty hath no just cause to hate me.

King. No !

How might a prince of my great hopes forget
So great indignities you laid upon me ?
What ! rate, rebuke, and roughly send to prison
The immediate heir of England ! Was this easy ?
May this be wash'd in Lethe, and forgotten ?

Ch. Just. I then did use the person of your father ;
The image of his power lay then in me :

And, in the administration of his law,
Whiles I was busy for the commonwealth,
Your highness pleased to forget my place,
The majesty and power of law and justice,
The image of the king whom I presented,
And struck me in my very seat of judgment ;
Whereon, as an offender to your father,
I gave bold way to my authority,
And did commit you. If the deed were ill,
Be you contented, wearing now the garland,
To have a son set your decrees at nought ;
To pluck down justice from your awful bench ;
To trip the course of law, and blunt the sword
That guards the peace and safety of your person :
Nay, more ; to spurn at your most royal image,
And mock your workings in a second body.
Question your royal thoughts, make the case yours ;
Be now the father, and propose a son :
Hear your own dignity so much profan'd,
See your most dreadful laws so loosely slighted,
Behold yourself so by a son disdain'd ;
And then imagine me taking your part,
And, in your power, soft silencing your son :
After this cold considerance, sentence me ;
And, as you are a king, speak in your state,
What I have done that misbecame my place,
My person, or my liege's sovereignty.

King. You are right, justice, and you weigh this well
Therefore still bear the balance and the sword :

And I do wish your honours may increase,
Till you do live to see a son of mine
Offend you, and obey you, as I did.
So shall I live to speak my father's words :—
Happy am I, that have a man so bold,
That dares do justice on my proper son :
And no less happy, having such a son,
That would deliver up his greatness so
Into the hands of justice.—You did commit me :
For which, I do commit into your hand
The unstain'd sword that you have us'd to bear ;
With this remembrance,—That you use the same
With the like bold, just, and impartial spirit,
As you have done 'gainst me. There is my hand ;
You shall be as a father to my youth :
My voice shall sound as you do prompt mine ear ;
And I will stoop and humble my intents
To your well-practis'd, wise directions.
And, princes all, believe me, I beseech you ;—
My father is gone wild into his grave,
For in his tomb lie my affections ;

As Davy has not spoken, it was conjectured that we should read, "Well spread, Davy."

And with his spirit sadly I survive,
To mock the expectation of the world ;
To frustrate prophecies ; and to raze out
Rotten opinion, who hath writ me down
After my seeming. The tide of blood in me
Hath proudly flow'd in vanity till now :
Now doth it turn, and ebb back to the sea ;
Where it shall mingle with the state of floods,
And flow henceforth in formal majesty.
Now call we our high court of parliament :
And let us choose such limbs of noble counsel
That the great body of our state may go
In equal rank with the best govern'd nation ;
That war, or peace, or both at once may be
As things acquainted and familiar to us ;—
In which you, father, shall have foremost hand.

[To the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.

Our coronation done, we will accite,
As I before remember'd, all our state :
And (heaven consigning to my good intents,)
No prince, nor peer, shall have just cause to say,
Heaven shorten Harry's happy life one day. [Exeunt.

SCENE III. — Glostershire. The Garden of Shallow's House.

Enter FALSTAFF, SHALLOW, SILENCE, BARDOLPH, the Page, and DAVY.

Shal. Nay, you shall see mine orchard, where, in an arbour, we will eat a last year's pippin of my own grafting, with a dish of caraways, and so forth ;—come, cousin
Silence ;—and then to bed.

Fal. You have here a goodly dwelling, and a rich.

Shal. Barren, barren, barren ; beggars all, beggars all,
sir John :—marry, good air.—Spread, Davy ; spread, Davy ;
Well said, Davy.<sup>1</sup>

Fal. This Davy serves you for good uses ; he is your serving-man, and your husband.

Shal. A good varlet, a good varlet, a very good varlet, sir John.—By the mass, I have drunk too much sack at supper.—A good varlet. Now sit down, now sit down :—
come, cousin.

Sil. Ah, sirrah ! quoth-a,—we shall

Do nothing but eat, and make good cheer,<sup>2</sup> [Singing.
And praise heaven for the merry year,
When flesh is cheap and females dear,
And lusty lads roam here and there,
So merrily,
And ever among so merrily.

Fal. There's a merry heart !—Good master Silence, I'll give you a health for that anon.

Shal. Give master Bardolph some wine, Davy.

Davy. Sweet sir, sit ; [seating BARDOLPH and the Page at another table.] I'll be with you anon :—most sweet sir, sit.
—Master page, good master page, sit : proface !<sup>2</sup> What you want in meat, we'll have in drink. But you must bear ;
the heart's all. [Exit.

Shal. Be merry, master Bardolph ;—and my little soldier
there, be merry.

Sil. [Singing.]

Be merry, be merry, my wife has all ;
For women are shrews, both short and tall ;
'Tis merry in hall, when beards wag all,
And welcome merry shrove-tide.
Be merry, be merry, &c.

Fal. I did not think master Silence had been a man of this mettle.

Sil. Who, I ? I have been merry twice and once ere now.

Proface—much good may it do you. The phrase was common in Shakspere's time. Dr. Nares infers that we had the word from the Norman romance language ; Mr. G. White says, from the Italian pro vi faccia, may it do you good.

Re-enter DAVY.

Davy. There is a dish of leather-coats for you.

[Setting them before BARDOLPH.]

Shal. Davy,—

Davy. Your worship?—I'll be with you straight. [To BARD.—A cup of wine, sir?

Sil. [Singing.]

A cup of wine that's brisk and fine,
And drink unto the leman mine;
And a merry heart lives long-a.

Fal. Well said, master Silence.

Sil. If we shall be merry now comes in the sweet of the night.<sup>1</sup>

Fal. Health and long life to you, master Silence.

Sil.

Fill the cup, and let it come;
I'll pledge you a mile to the bottom.

Shal. Honest Bardolph, welcome: If thou want'st anything, and wilt not call, beshrew thy heart.—Welcome, my little tiny thief; [to the Page.] and welcome, indeed, too.—I'll drink to master Bardolph, and to all the cavaleroes about London.

Davy. I hope to see London once ere I die.

Bard. An I might see you there, Davy,—

Shal. You'll crack a quart together. Ha! will you not, master Bardolph?

Bard. Yes, sir, in a pottle pot.

Shal. I thank thee:—The knave will stick by thee, I can assure thee that: he will not out; he is true bred.

Bard. And I'll stick by him, sir.

Shal. Why, there spoke a king. Lack nothing: be merry. [Knocking heard.] Look who's at door there: Ho! who knocks? [Exit DAVY.]

Fal. Why, now you have done me right.

[To SILENCE, who drinks a bumper.]

Sil. [Singing.]

Do me right,
And dub me knight:
Samingo.

Is't not so?

Fal. 'Tis so.

Sil. Is't so? Why, then say, an old man can do somewhat.

Re-enter DAVY.

Davy. If it please your worship, there's one Pistol come from the court with news.

Fal. From the court? let him come in.

Enter PISTOL.

How now, Pistol?

Pist. Sir John! save you, sir.

Fal. What wind blew you hither, Pistol?

Pist. Not the ill wind which blows none to good.—Sweet knight, thou art now one of the greatest men in the realm.

Sil. By'r lady, I think he be; but goodman Puff of Barson.

Pist. Puff?

Puff in thy teeth, most recreant coward base!—

Sir John, I am thy Pistol, and thy friend,

And helter-skelter have I rode to thee;

And tidings do I bring, and lucky joys,

And golden times, and happy news of price.

Fal. I prithee now, deliver them like a man of this world.

Pist. A foutra for the world, and worldlings base!

I speak of Africa and golden joys

Fal. O base Assyrian knight, what is thy news?

Let king Cophetua know the truth thereof.

Sil. [Sings.]

And Robin Hood, Scarlet, and John.

Pist. Shall dunghill curs confront the Helicons?
And shall good news be baffled?

Then, Pistol, lay thy head in Furies' lap.

Shal. Honest gentleman, I know not your breeding.

Pist. Why then, lament, therefore.

Shal. Give me pardon, sir;—If, sir, you come with news from the court, I take it there is but two ways; either to utter them, or to conceal them. I am, sir, under the king, in some authority.

Pist. Under which king, Bezonian? speak or die.

Shal. Under king Harry.

Pist.

Harry the Fourth? or Fifth?

Shal. Harry the Fourth.

Pist.

A foutra for thine office!—

Sir John, thy tender lambkin now is king;

Harry the Fifth's the man. I speak the truth

When Pistol lies, do this; and fig me, like

The bragging Spaniard.

Fal. What! is the old king dead?

Pist. As nail in door: the things I speak are just.

Fal. Away, Bardolph; saddle my horse.—Master Robert Shallow, choose what office thou wilt in the land, 'tis thine.—Pistol, I will double-charge thee with dignities.

Bard. O joyful day!—I would not take a knighthood for my fortune.

Pist. What? I do bring good news?

Fal. Carry master Silence to bed.—Master Shallow, my lord Shallow, be what thou wilt, I am fortune's steward. Get on thy boots: we'll ride all night:—O, sweet Pistol:—Away, Bardolph. [Exit BARD.—Come, Pistol, utter more to me; and, withal, devise something to do thyself good.—Boot, boot, master Shallow: I know the young king is sick for me. Let us take any man's horses; the laws of England are at my commandment. Happy are they which have been my friends; and woe unto my lord chief justice!

Pist. Let vultures vile seize on his lungs also!

Where is the life that late I led? say they;

Why, here it is; Welcome these pleasant days. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV. London. A Street.

Enter Beadles, dragging in Hostess QUICKLY, and DOLL TEAR-SHEET.

Host. No, thou arrant knave; I would I might die that I might have thee hanged: thou hast drawn my shoulder out of joint.

Bead. The constables have delivered her over to me: and she shall have whipping-cheer enough, I warrant her; there hath been a man or two lately killed about her.

Doll. Nut-hook, nut-hook, you lie. Come on; I'll tell thee what, thou damned tripe-visaged rascal; an the child I now go with do miscarry, thou hadst better thou hadst struck thy mother, thou paper-faced villain.

Host. O that sir John were come! he would make this a bloody day to somebody. But I would the fruit of her womb might miscarry!

Bead. If it do, you shall have a dozen of cushions again; you have but eleven now. Come, I charge you both go with me; for the man is dead, that you and Pistol beat among you.

Doll. I'll tell thee what, thou thin man in a censer! I will have you as soundly swunged for this, you blue-bottle rogue! you filthy famished correctioner; if you be not swunged, I'll forswear half-kirtles.

Bead. Come, come, you she knight-errant, come.

Host. O, that right should thus o'ercome might! well; of sufferance comes ease.

<sup>1</sup> If we shall, &c. This is the reading of the folio; the quarto, "And we shall be merry." And was often printed for an. The "If we shall be merry now" 590 comes in the sweet of the night," appears to us superior to the reading, "And we shall be merry;—now comes in," &c.

Doll. Come, you rogue, come; bring me to a justice.

Host. Yes; come, you starved blood-hound.

Doll. Goodman death! goodman bones!

Host. Thou anatomy thou!

Doll. Come, you thin thing; come, you rascal!

1 Bead. Very well. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A public Place near Westminster Abbey.

Enter Two Grooms, strewing rushes.

1 Groom. More rushes, more rushes.

2 Groom. The trumpets have sounded twice.

1 Groom. It will be two o'clock ere they come from the coronation. [Exeunt Grooms.]

Enter FALSTAFF, SHALLOW, PISTOL, BARDOLPH, and the Page.

Fal. Stand here by me, master Robert Shallow; I will make the king do you grace: I will leer upon him, as he comes by; and do but mark the countenance that he will give me.

Pist. Bless thy lungs, good knight.

Fal. Come here, Pistol; stand behind me.—O, if I had had time to have made new liveries, I would have bestowed the thousand pound I borrowed of you. [To SHALLOW.] But 'tis no matter; this poor show doth better: this doth infer the zeal I had to see him.

Shal. It doth so.

Fal. It shows my earnestness in affection.

Shal. It doth so.

Fal. My devotion.

Shal. It doth, it doth, it doth.

Fal. As it were, to ride day and night; and not to deliberate, not to remember, not to have patience to shift me.

Shal. It is most certain.

Fal. But to stand stained with travel, and sweating with desire to see him: thinking of nothing else; putting all affairs else in oblivion; as if there were nothing else to be done but to see him.

Pist. 'Tis semper idem, for absque hoc nihil est: 'Tis all in every part.

Shal. 'Tis so, indeed.

Pist. My knight, I will inflame thy noble liver, And make thee rage.

Thy Doll, and Helen of thy noble thoughts,

Is in base durance, and contagious prison;

Haul'd thither

By most mechanical and dirty hand:

Rouse up revenge from ebon den with fell Alecto's snake, For Doll is in; Pistol speaks nought but truth.

Fal. I will deliver her.

[Shouts within, and the trumpets sound.]

Pist. There roar'd the sea, and trumpet-clangor sounds.

Enter the KING and his Train, the CHIEF JUSTICE among them.

Fal. Save thy grace, king Hal! my royal Hal!

Pist. The heavens thee guard and keep, most royal imp of fame!

Fal. Save thee, my sweet boy!

King. My lord chief justice, speak to that vain man.

Ch. Just. Have you your wits; know you what 'tis you speak?

Fal. My king! my Jove! I speak to thee, my heart!

King. I know thee not, old man: Fall to thy prayers;

How ill white hairs become a fool and jester!

I have long dream'd of such a kind of man,

So surfeit-swell'd, so old, and so profane;

But, being awake, I do despise my dream.

Make less thy body, hence, and more thy grace;

Leave gormandizing; know, the grave doth gap

For thee thrice wider than for other men:

Reply not to me with a fool-born jest;

Presume not that I am the thing I was:

For heaven doth know, so shall the world perceive,

That I have turn'd away my former self;

So will I those that kept me company.

When thou dost hear I am as I have been,

Approach me; and thou shalt be as thou wast,

The tutor and the feeder of my riots:

Till then, I banish thee, on pain of death,—

As I have done the rest of my misleaders,—

Not to come near our person by ten mile.

For competence of life I will allow you,

That lack of means enforce you not to evil:

And, as we hear you do reform yourselves,

We will, according to your strength and qualities,

Give you advancement. Be it your charge, my lord,

To see perform'd the tenor of our word.

Set on. [Exeunt KING and his Train.]

Fal. Master Shallow, I owe you a thousand pound.

Shal. Ay, marry, sir John; which I beseech you to let me have home with me.

Fal. That can hardly be, master Shallow. Do not you grieve at this; I shall be sent for in private to him: look you, he must seem thus to the world. Fear not your advancement; I will be the man yet that shall make you great.

Shal. I cannot well perceive how; unless you should give me your doublet, and stuff me out with straw. I beseech you, good sir John, let me have five hundred of my thousand.

Fal. Sir, I will be as good as my word: this that you heard was but a colour.

Shal. A colour, I fear, that you will die in, sir John.

Fal. Fear no colours; go with me to dinner. Come, lieutenant Pistol;—come, Bardolph:—I shall be sent for soon at night.

Re-enter PRINCE JOHN, the CHIEF JUSTICE, Officers, &c.

Ch. Just. Go, carry sir John Falstaff to the Fleet; Take all his company along with him.

Fal. My lord, my lord,—

Ch. Just. I cannot now speak: I will hear you soon. Take them away.

Pist. Si fortuna me tormenta, spero me contenta.

[Exeunt FAL., SHAL., PIST., BARD., Page, and Officers.]

P. John. I like this fair proceeding of the king's He hath intent his wonted followers

Shall all be very well provided for;

But all are banish'd till their conversations

Appear more wise and modest to the world.

Ch. Just. And so they are.

P. John. The king hath call'd his parliament, my lord.

Ch. Just. He hath.

P. John. I will lay odds that, ere this year expire, We bear our civil swords, and native fire,

As far as France: I heard a bird so sing,

Whose music, to my thinking, pleas'd the king.

Come, will you hence? [Exeunt.]

EPILOGUE.

[Spoken by a DANCER.]

First, my fear; then, my court'sy; last, my speech. My fear is, your displeasure; my court'sy, my duty; and my speech, to beg your pardons. If you look for a good speech now, you undo me: for what I have to say is of mine own making; and what, indeed, I should say, will, I doubt, prove mine own marring. But to the purpose, and so to the venture.—Be it known to you, (as it is very well,) I was lately here in the end of a displeasing play, to pray your patience for it, and to promise you a better. I did mean, indeed, to pay you with this; which, if, like an ill venture, it come unluckily home, I break, and you, my gentle creditors, lose. Here, I promised you, I would be, and here I commit my body to your mercies: bate me some, and I will pay you some, and, as most debtors do, promise you infinitely.

If my tongue cannot entreat you to acquit me, will you command me to use my legs? and yet that were but light payment,—to dance out of your debt. But a good conscience will make any possible satisfaction, and so will I. All the gentlewomen here have forgiven me; if the gentlemen will not, then the gentlemen do not agree with the gentlewomen, which was never seen before in such an assembly.

One word more, I beseech you. If you be not too much cloyed with fat meat, our humble author will continue the story, with sir John in it, and make you merry with fair Katherine of France: where, for anything I know, Falstaff shall die of a sweat, unless already he be killed with your hard opinions; for Oldcastle died a martyr, and this is not the man. My tongue is weary; when my legs are too, I will bid you good night: and so kneel down before you;—but, indeed, to pray for the queen.

ILLUSTRATIONS TO KING HENRY IV.—PART II.

ACT I.

SOME scattered epithets in Chaucer’s “House of Fame” might have supplied Shakspeare with hints for this description of Rumour. The parallel, however, is not very close. A much nearer resemblance is found in a celebrated passage in the Fourth Book of Virgil’s Aeneid. Dryden’s translation is, as usual, spirited:—

“Millions of opening mouths to fame belong;
And every mouth is furnish’d with a tongue:
And round with listening ears the flying plague is hung.
She fills the peaceful universe with cries;
No slumbers ever close her wakeful eyes.
By day from lofty towers her head she shows:
And spreads, through trembling crowds, disastrous news:
With court-informers’ haunts, and royal spies,
This done relates, not done she feigns, and mingles truth with lies.”

When Leland wrote his “Itinerary” in the time of Henry VIII., Warkworth Castle was described as “well maynteyned and large.” Grose says, “When entire it was far from being destitute of strength, yet its appearance does not excite the idea of one of those rugged fortresses destined solely for war.” Warkworth was anciently the seat and barony of the Claverings, and was bestowed upon Henry Percy, the ancestor of the Earls of Northumberland, by Edward III., and, after several temporary forfeitures, has remained in the Percy family from the twelfth year of Edward IV. “It is not certainly known when this castle was built. from the circumstance of the Percy arms being put up in several parts of the building, some have supposed that it was erected by that family; but by a slight inspection, it is easily perceived that they have been inserted into the walls at an after period. This is clearly proved by one of them having fallen out, and the place where it was fixed appears to be cut in the wall, about six inches deep. The doors, the windows, and everything about the place, attest that it had been built at a more early period.” (Historical and Descriptive View of Northumberland. Newcastle. 1811.)

Johnson, in a note upon this passage, says, “I think that I have observed in old prints the rowel of those times to have been only a single spike.” The commentator here fell into an error, which the lexicographer has avoided. A spur with a single point is not a rowel spur. We find the distinction in Froissart:—“Then the king was apparelled like a prelate of the church, with a cope of red silk, and a pair of spurs, with a point without a rowel.” The word “rowel” is derived from roue, a wheel; and thus it signifies a movable circle, and is applied to a bridle, and to armour, as well as to spurs. Johnson, in his Dictionary, defines “rowel” as “the points of a spur turning on an axis,” and gives this very passage in Shakspeare as an illustration.

Falstaff alludes to a proverbial saying, which is thus given in Burton’s “Anatomy of Melancholy:”—“He that marries a wife out of a suspected inn or ale-house, buys a horse in Smithfield, and hires a servant in Paul’s, as the proverb is, shall likely have a jade to his horse, a knave for his man, an arrant honest woman to his wife.” The middle aisle of the old cathedral of St. Paul’s was the resort of idlers, gamesters, and persons in general who lived by their wits. Ben Jonson calls his Captain Bobadill “a Paul’s man.” But Paul’s was also a sort of exchange; and announcements were fixed upon the pillars that corresponded with the newspaper advertisements of modern times. The “masterless serving-man” set up “his bill in Paul’s,” as well as the tradesman who called attention to his wares. These advertisements were denominated Si quissas. Paul’s was also the resort of newsmongers and politicians, and sometimes was the scene of more important conferences than arose out of the gossip of the day. Bishop Carleton tells us that Babington’s and Ballard’s conspiracy was “conferred upon in Paul’s Church.” Osborne, in his “Memoirs of James I.,” states, that Paul’s was the resort of “the principal gentry, lords, courtiers, and men of all professions.” The spendthrifts resorted there for protection against their creditors, a part of the cathedral being privileged from arrest:—“There you may spend your legs in winter a whole afternoon; converse, plot, laugh, and talk anything; jest at your creditor, even to his face; and in the evening, even by lamplight, steal out.”—(Dekker’s Gull’s Horn Book, 1609.) In Bishop Earle’s “Microcosmography” (1628) we have an exceedingly amusing description of all the general features of Paul’s Walk, of which the following passage will convey a notion of the style:—“It is a heap of stones and men, with a vast confusion of languages; and, were the steeple not sanctified, nothing liker Babel. The noise in it is like that of bees, a strange humming or buzz, mixt of walking, tongues, and feet. It is a kind of still roar, or loud whisper. It is the great exchange of all discourse, and no business whatsoever but is here stirring and a-foot. It is the synod of all pates politick, jointed and laid together in the most serious posture; and they are not half so busy at the parliament.”

The martyr fires of Smithfield are burnt out; but its ancient renown as being the worst horse market in England long survived.

* Burton is the only English author who uses this word in the meaning of an antithetical saying. (See Richardson’s Dictionary.)

Buildings are much more quickly changed than customs; and thus the external part of Smithfield as it was can scarcely be recognised; while he who very recently walked through that arena of dirt and blackguardism on Friday afternoon might still recognise a very fitting place for the purchase of a sorry jade by a modern Bardolph.

This light instrument for the filliping of Falstaff was an instrument used for driving piles, wielded by three men, using its one short and two long handles.

ACT II.

Coleridge, in his celebrated “Essay on Method,” has given this speech of the Hostess,—

“Fermenting o'er with frothy circumstance,”

as an example of “the absence of method, which characterizes the uneducated, occasioned by an habitual submission of the understanding to mere events and images as such, and independent of any power in the mind to classify or appropriate them. The general accompaniments of time and place are the only relations which persons of this class appear to regard in their statements.” Our great philosophical critic, however, most truly adds, that in this speech of Mrs. Quickly “the poor soul's thoughts and sentences are more closely interlinked than the truth of nature would have required, but that the connections and sequence, which the habit of method can alone give, have in this instance a substitute in the fusion of passion.”

Falstaff claimed the protection legally called quidam profecturus. (See Coke upon Littleton, 130 a.) This is one of the many examples of Shakspeare's intimate acquaintance with legal forms and phrases.

In Lodge's “Illustrations of British History,” vol. ii. p. 251, edition 1791, there is a letter from the Earl of Shrewsbury to Thomas Bawdewyn, which the editor inserts on account of the following curious postscript:—“I wold have you bye me glasses to drink in: Send me word what olde plat yeldes the ounce, for I wyll nott leve me a cuppe of sylvare to drink in butt I wyll see the next terme my creditors payde.” Whether the earl sold his plate, and by his example made “glasses” fashionable—“the only drinking”—we are not informed

In the Gentleman's Magazine, 1833, p. 393, is a paper which throws considerable light upon the mode of decorating houses in Shakspeare's time. Steevens speaks of “the German hunting” as a painted cloth brought from Holland, considering it to be the same mode of hanging rooms with drapery as that alluded to in this play, Act III.—“as ragged as Lazarus in the painted cloth.” But it appears that the German hunting in water-work was a fresco painting. Upon Woodford Common, in Essex, there stood, as late as the autumn of 1832, an old house called Grove House, traditionally believed to have been a hunting lodge of Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex. This, however, may be doubted. One of the apartments in this old house was called the ball-room, and in this room were twelve fresco paintings, exhibiting as many subjects of rural life. Six of these paintings were tolerably perfect, but the others were in great part obliterated by a coat of whitewash. The only memorials that have been preserved of these very curious representations have been kindly exhibited to us. They are a series of very faithful drawings by an accomplished lady.

There is little doubt, when Pistol exclaims, “Have we not Hiren here?” that, however the Hostess may mistake him, he alludes to his sword. King Arthur's sword was called Ron. Douce has been enabled to supply a very curious illustration of this passage, by having met with an old rapier on which these lines are inscribed:—

“*Si fortune me tourmente,
L'esperance me contente.*”

This is precisely the meaning of Pistol's bad Italian; and Douce therefore very ingeniously conjectures that Pistol, unmindful of the Hostess's interruption, goes on spouting the inscription upon his sword.

Bardolph was to quoit Pistol down-stairs as quickly as the smooth shilling—the shove-groat—flies along the board. Ben Jonson, in the same allusion to quickness, says, “made it run as smooth off the tongue as a shove-groat shilling.” Shove-groat, in a statute of the 33rd of Henry VIII., is called a new game; and it was also called slide-groat, slide-board, slide-thrift, and slip-thrift. The game was no doubt originally played with the silver groat. The broad shilling of Edward VI. came afterwards to be used in this game, which in all probability varied little from shovel-board. Master Slender, in The Merry Wives of Windsor, had his pocket picked of “two Edward shovel-boards, that cost him two and two pence a piece.” Slender's costly shillings were probably lucky ones.

A roasted pig in Bartholomew fair was a dainty to which Ben Jonson has several allusions; and thus it is used as a term of endearment to Falstaff. Davenant has some lines on the subject, which are quoted by Gifford:—

“*Now London's Mayor on saddle new,
Rides to the fair of Bartlemew;
He twirls his chain and looketh big,
As if to fright the head of pig,
That gaping lies on every stall.*”

ACT III.

Who was Skogan? has produced as fierce a controversy, if not so elaborate, as, Who wrote ‘Icon Basilike?’ It seems there were two Skogans; the one

“*A fine gentleman, and master of arts,
Of Henry the Fourth's time, that made disguises
For the king's sons, and writ in ballad-royal Daintily well.*”

This was Henry Skogan, usually called moral Skogan; and Ben Jonson's brief description of him, given above, will, no doubt, be sufficient for our readers. The other was John Skogan, of the time of Edward IV., who is thus described by Holinshed:—“A learned gentleman, and student for a time in Oxford, of a pleasant wit, and bent to merry devises, in respect whereof he was called into the court, where, giving himself to his natural inclination of mirth and pleasant pastime, he played many sporting parts, although not in such uncivil manner as hath been of him reported.” Shakspeare, say the commentators, committed an anachronism in describing Skogan the jester as having his head broken by Falstaff. No doubt. All that Shakspeare meant to convey was the name of a buffoon whose freedoms were thus punished; and the jests of Skogan, the Joe Miller of Shakspeare's time, was a book with which the poet's audience would be familiar.

“Shakspeare,” says Dr. Gray, “seems to have been unacquainted with the value of money, and the prices of sheep, and other cattle, at the latter end of the reign of King Henry the Fourth.” That is true. In 1411 the price of a sheep is stated at 1s. 10d., but in Shakspeare's own time the price varies from 6s. 8d. to 15s. The local and tem-

Ben Jonson, in his “Discoveries” (a valuable collection of his miscellaneous remarks), says, “You are not to cast a ring for the perfumed terms of the time, as accommodation, complement, spirit, &c., but use them properly in their place, as others.” Every age has its “perfumed terms”—words that originate in fashionable society, and descend to the vulgar like cast-off clothes. Shakspeare could not render accommodate more ridiculous than to put it into the mouth of Bardolph, and make that worthy maintain it “to be a soldier-like word, and a word of exceeding good command.” Jonson, in “Every Man in his Humour,” gives us an example of the fantastic use of the word:—“Hostess, accommodate us with another bed-staff here quickly. Lend us another bed-staff—the woman does not understand the words of action.”

SCENE II.—“I remember at Mile-end green (when I lay at Clement's-inn)—I was then Sir Dagonet in Arthur's show, there was,” &c.

This passage was formerly pointed thus:—“I remember at Mile-end green, (when I lay at Clement's inn, I was then Sir Dagonet in Arthur's show,) there was,” &c. It was considered by the editors, and by Warton especially, that Arthur's show was acted at Clement's Inn, of which society Shallow was a member. It has, however, been found that a society for the exercise of archery, calling themselves Prince Arthur's Knights, existed in Shakspeare's time. This society, according to Richard Mulcaster, master of St. Paul's school (in a tract published in 1581 and 1587), was called “The Friendly and Frank Fellowship of Prince Arthur's Knights in and about the City of London.” That the members of the society personated characters in the romance of Arthur we learn from the same tract; for the author mentions Master Hugh Offley as Sir Launcelot, and Master Thomas Smith as Prince Arthur himself. Justice Shallow might, therefore, very properly personate Sir Dagonet, King Arthur's fool; who, in the Morte d'Arthur, “seems to be introduced like a Shrove-tide cock, for the sake of being buffeted and abused by every one.”—(Gifford.) There is a proof of the ancient flourishing existence of “The Fellowship of Prince Arthur's Knights” to be found in the following passage of an old book, which gives a description of “a great show and shooting” in 1583:—“The prince of famous memory, King Henry the Eighth, having read in the chronicles of England, and seen in his own time, how armies mixed with good archers have evermore so galled the enemy that it hath been great cause of the victory, he being one day at Mile-end, when Prince Arthur and his knights were there shooting, did greatly commend the game, and allowed thereof, lauding them to their encouragement.” It appears also, from an exceedingly rare tract on this society of Prince Arthur (1583), that King Henry VIII. confirmed by charter to the citizens of London the “famous order of Knights of Prince Arthur's Round Table, or society: like as in his life time, when he saw a good archer indeed, he chose him, and ordained such a one for a knight of the same order.” Henry VIII., like many other tyrants, was sometimes pleased to be jocose and familiar with his subjects; and in this spirit, he not only patronised the Knights of the Round Table, but created a celebrated archer of the name of Barlo, Duke of Shoreditch. The dukedom, it seems, was hereditary; and in 1583 the successor to the original duke had a Baron Stirrop in his court. Prince Arthur and the duke were on the most friendly terms; and a deputation from his highness, upon the day of Prince Arthur's shooting in 1583, presented a buck of that season “to Prince Arthur, who was at his tent, which was at Mile-end green.”

In Harsenet's “Declaration of Popish Impostures,” 1603 (quoted in Malone's “History of the Stage,” Boswell, iii. 27), we have the following description of the Vice:—“It was a pretty part in the old church-plays, when the nimble Vice would skip up nimbly like a jack-an-apes into the devil's neck, and ride the devil a course, and belabour him with his wooden dagger, till he made him roar, whereat the people would laugh to see the devil so Vice-haunted.” The origin of the name Vice is involved in considerable obscurity. The subject is highly interesting, but we may more conveniently examine it under the passage in King Richard III.:—

“Thus like the formal Vice, Iniquity,
I moralize two meanings in one word.”

In Aggas's Map of Westminster, drawn 1578, and in another by Norden, 1593, elevations of the tilt-yard are given; and in Smith's “Antiquities of Westminster,” two old pictures are engraved “representing the most material part of St. James's Park, and many of the buildings, part of, or belonging to, the Palace of Whitehall as they were in the time of King Charles II.”

<sup>g</sup> SCENE II.—“The case of a treble hautboy was a mansion for him.”

Formerly there were three kinds of hautboy—the treble, tenor, and bass. We have now but the first of these. The bassoon has superseded the last, and the other is a desideratum. Mersenne describes all three, and gives a woodcut of each.

ACT IV.

This forest is in the North Riding of Yorkshire, and was formerly called Galtres forest. It is thus mentioned by Skelton:—

“Thus stode I in the frythy forest of Galtres.”

Frythy is woody.

The ordinary costume of a bishop, not only when he was performing his episcopal functions, but when he appeared in public, and even when he travelled, was a vestment of white linen. From a passage in a letter of Erasmus, it appears that Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, when he was about to cross the sea, laid aside this linen vest, “which they always use in England.”

SCENE I.—“Their beavers down.”

In Hamlet, Act I. Sc. II., we find this passage—“He wore his beaver up.” In the First Part of Henry IV., p. 551, we have seen that the beaver was sometimes used to express a helmet generally. The passage before us, and the passage in Hamlet, have been considered contradictory; and some have supposed that Shakspeare confounded the beaver and visor. Douce shows that both the beaver and visor moved up,—and when so, the face was exposed; when the beaver was down, the face was covered;—and the beaver and visor were both down in the battle or the tournament. Some helmets were, however, so constructed that the beaver, being composed of falling overlapping plates, exposed the face when it was down. The “armet,” however, appears to have been of an unusual construction. Shakspeare alludes to the common beaver both in Hamlet and in the passage before us; and in these no contradiction is involved.

In Ben Jonson's “Bartholomew Fair” we have the following passage:—“O, sister, do you remember the ballads over the nursery chimney at home, o' my own pasting up? there be brave pictures.” Very few ballads of Shakspeare's time appeared without the decoration of a rude woodcut, sometimes referring to the subject matter of the ballad, sometimes giving a portrait of the queen. These fugitive productions, Gifford says, “came out every term in incredible numbers, and were rapidly dispersed over the kingdom, by shoals of itinerant syrens.”

The forest of Windsor was the favourite hunting-ground of the Court in the sixteenth century, as it was, probably, at a much earlier period. In Lord Surrey's celebrated poem on Windsor Castle, supposed to be written in 1546, we have the following passage :—

"The wild forest, the clothed holts with green;
With reins averted, and swiftly-breathed horse,
With cry of hounds, and merry blast between,
Where we did chase the fearful hart of force."

SCENE IV.—"Hath wrought the mure," &c.

Shakspeare has here borrowed a thought from Daniel. In the Third Book of his "Civil Wars," first published in 1595, we have this couplet :—

"Wearing the wall so thin, that now the mind Might well look thorough, and his frailty find."

Hurd, finding the passage in the complete edition of Daniel's "Civil Wars," published in 1609, and not, perhaps, being aware of the earlier edition, considered that Daniel had imitated Shakspeare. This coincidence strengthens the remarks which we made in the Introductory Notice to Richard II. on Shakspeare's supposed imitations of his poetical friend. The same thought descended from Daniel and Shakspeare to Waller, who has thus modified it :—

The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decay'd,
Lets in new light thro' chinks that time has made."

SCENE IV.—"In that Jerusalem shall Harry die."

Of the Jerusalem Chamber, which is attached to the south-west tower of Westminster Abbey, scarcely any of the original features remain—nothing, indeed, of the interior that probably existed in the time of Henry IV. The original chamber was built about 1362, at a time when the buildings immediately attached to the abbey were extensively repaired or re-erected.

ACT V.

<sup>a</sup> SCENE I.—"By cock and pye."

In a little book of great popularity, originally published in 1601, entitled, "The Plaine Man's Pathway to Heaven," by Arthur Dent, we have the following passage :—"I know a man that will never swear but by cock or py, or mouse-foot. I hope you will not say these be oaths. For he is as honest a man as ever brake bread. You shall not hear an oath come out of his mouth." We here see that the exclamation "by cock and pye" was not of the class of oaths from which Hotspur might choose "a good mouth-filling oath." Steevens supposes that the service-book of the Romish Church being denominated a Pie, the oath had reference to that, and to the sacred name. Douce has, however, given the following very ingenious explanation of the origin of the word :—"It will, no doubt, be recollected that in the days of ancient chivalry it was the practice to make solemn vows or engagements for the performance of some considerable enterprise. This ceremony was usually performed during some grand feast or entertainment, at which a roasted peacock or pheasant, being served up by ladies in a dish of gold or silver, was thus presented to each knight, who then made the particular vow which he had chosen, with great solemnity. When this custom had fallen into disuse, the peacock, nevertheless, continued to be a favourite dish, and was introduced on the table in a pie, the head, with gilded beak, being proudly elevated above the crust, and the splendid tail expanded. Other birds of smaller value were introduced in the same manner, and the recollection of the old peacock-vows might occasion the less serious, or even burlesque, imitation of swearing, not only by the bird itself, but also by the pie; and hence, probably, the oath by cock and pie, for the use of which no very old authority can be found."

The origin of "to curry"—to curry favour—furnishes a remarkable example of the corruption of language. In Chaucer's time the phrase was curry favel. In the Merchant's Second Tale we have—

"As though he had lerned cury favel of some old frere."

Favel was the name of a horse—a name generally given to chestnut horses—as Bayard to a brown horse, and Blanchard to a white. In an old English proverb we have—

"He that will in court dwell,
Must needes currie favel."

It is scarcely necessary to add, that it is agreeable to a horse to be curried, and that, therefore, to curry favel, applied to a courtier or a sycophant, is to bestow such attentions as may bespeak good offices.

<sup>c</sup> SCENE I.—"The wearing-out of six fashions (which is four terms or two actions)."

In the time of Shakspeare the law terms regulated what we now denominate the season. The country gentlemen and their families then came up to town to transact their business and to learn the fashions. "He comes up every term to learn to take tobacco, and see new motions."—(Ben Jonson, "Every Man out of his Humour.") Falstaff computes that six fashions would wear out in four terms, or two actions. This particularity may, perhaps, be taken as another proof of Shakspeare's technical knowledge, and fondness for legal allusions.

Amurath III., Emperor of the Turks, died in 1596. He was succeeded by his eldest son Mahomet, who immediately put to death all his brothers. Malone thinks that Shakspeare alludes to this transaction; for the allusion, although not literally correct, might be sufficient to convey a notion of the difference between a regulated monarchy and a despotism :—

"This is the English, not the Turkish court."

A gentleman very well acquainted with Turkish history and literature has pointed out to us that Amurath, in Greek Αμυράς, is Emeer, the Greek v being pronounced ee. In old books the sultan is sometimes called "the Amyrath;" and the style of Mohammed II., in the Greek version of his treaty with the Genoese of Galata, is "I, the great Effendi and great Emeer (Αμυράς), and son of Mourad Bey" (Μουρατ). We thus find Amurath in the same sentence as distinct from Murad.

Every lover of Shakspeare must recollect that most exquisite passage in the Twelfth Night which describes the higher species of minstrelsy that had found an abiding place in the hearts of the people :—

"Give me some music : but that piece of song,
That old and antique song we heard last night,
Methought it did relieve my passion much;
More than light airs, and recollected terms,
Of these most brisk and giddy-paced times.
* * * * *
Mark it, Cesario; it is old, and plain:
The spinsters and the knitters in the sun,
And the free maids that weave their thread with bones,
Do use to chaunt it; it is silly sooth,
And dallies with the innocence of love,
Like the old age."

The outpouring of snatches of old songs by Master Silence, in this hour when the taciturnity of a feeble intellect was overwhelmed by the stimulant which wine afforded to his memory, is a truly poetical conception. In his prosaic moments the worthy justice is contented to echo his brother of the quorum :—"We shall all follow, cousin." But when his "merry heart" expands in "the sweet of the night," he unravels his fag-ends of popular ditties with a volubility which not even the abuse of Pistol can stop. Beaumont and Fletcher, in "The Knight of the Burning Pestle," have a character, Old Merry-thought, who "evermore laughs, and dances, and sings;" and he introduces himself to us with :—

"Nose, nose, jolly red nose,
And who gave thee this jolly red nose?"

The humour of Old Merry-thought is little better than farce; but the extravagance of Silence is the richest comedy, from the contrast with his habitual character. The snatches which Silence sings are not the "light airs, and recollected terms,

Of these most brisk and giddy-paced times," but fragments of old ballads that had been long heard in the squire's hall and the yeoman's chimney-corner—"old and plain." For example, the expression,

" 'Tis merry in hall, when beards wag all,"

may be found, with a slight alteration, in the poems of Adam Davy, who lived in the time of Edward II. (See Warton's "History of English Poetry," section 6.) In the "Serving Man's Comfort" (1598) we have this passage, descriptive of the merriment in which the retainers of the great partook in the time of Elizabeth:—"Grace said, and the table taken up, the plate presently conveyed into the pantry, the hall summons this consort of companions (upon payne to dine with Duke Humphrey, or to kiss the hare's foot) to appear at the first call; where a song is to be sung, the under song or holding whereof is, 'It is merry in hall, where beards wag all.'" The concluding line, before the command to "carry master Silence to bed," is a portion of the old ballad of "Robin Hood and the Pindar of Wakefield:—"

" All this beheard three wighty yeomen,
'Twas Robin Hood, Scarlet, and John
With that they espy'd the jolly Pindar
As he sate under a throne."

HISTORICAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

ACT I.

It would appear from these scenes, if we did not make due allowance for the principle that "the historical drama is the concentration of history," that the rising of Northumberland, in connection with Scroop and Mowbray, took place immediately after the battle of Shrewsbury. The crafty earl, however, submitted himself to the more politic king, and was restored to some of his honours in the Parliament of 1404. His revolt was in 1405. Holinshed thus describes the progress of the conspiracy:—

"Whilst such doings were in hand betwixt the English and French, the king was minded to have gone into Wales against the Welsh rebels, that under their chieftain, Owen Glendower, ceased not to do much mischief still against the English subjects. But, at the same time, to his further disquieting, there was a conspiracy put in practice against him at home by the Earl of Northumberland, who had conspired with Richard Scrope Archbishop of York, Thomas Mowbray Earl Marshal, son to Thomas Duke of Norfolk, who for the quarrel betwixt him and King Henry had been banished (as before ye have heard), the lords Hastings, Fauconbridge, Berdolf, and diverse others. It was appointed that they should meet all together with their whole power, upon Yorkeswold, at a day assigned, and that the Earl of Northumberland should be chieftain, promising to bring with him a great number of Scots. The archbishop, accompanied with the Earl Marshal, devised certain articles of such matters as it was supposed that not only the commonalty of the realm, but also the nobility, found themselves aggrieved with: which articles they showed first unto such of their adherents as were near about them, and after sent them abroad to their friends further off, assuring them that for redress of such oppressions they would shed the last drop of blood in their bodies, if need were. The archbishop, not meaning to stay after he saw himself accompanied with a great number of men, that came flocking to York to take his part in this quarrel, forthwith discovered his enterprise, causing the articles aforesaid to be set up in the public streets of the city of York, and upon the gates of the monasteries, that each man might understand the cause that moved him to rise in arms against the king, the reforming whereof did not yet appertain unto him. Hereupon knights, esquires, gentlemen, yeomen, and other of the commons, assembled together in great numbers, and the archbishop coming forth amongst them, clad in armour, encouraged, exhorted, and by all means he could, pricked them forth to take the enterprise in hand, and thus not only all the citizens of York, but all other in the countries about, that were able to bear weapon, came to the archbishop and to the Earl Marshal. Indeed the respect that men had to the archbishop, caused them to like the better of the cause, since the gravity of his age, his integrity of life, and incomparable learning, with the reverend aspect of his amiable personage, moved all men to have him in no small estimation."

The Lord Chief Justice, introduced in this scene, and who appears more prominently in the fifth act, was Sir William Gascoyne, Chief Justice of the King's Bench. "He died," says Steevens, "December 17, 1413, and was buried in Harwood Church, in Yorkshire." Fuller states, upon the authority of an inscription on his tomb, that he died on Sunday, December 17th, 1412. This is, however, contradictory, for the 17th December of that year did not fall on a Sunday. The assertion of Fuller, however, gave occasion to one of the charges against Shakspeare of having brought persons upon the scene who had ceased to exist,—the Chief Justice, say the literal critics, died before the accession of Henry V. The point, to our minds, is not worth discussing; but it may be satisfactory to some to know that Shakspeare was here perfectly accurate. The Rev. Mr. Tyler has discovered a will of the Chief Justice made in 1419.

ACT IV.

The following extracts from Holinshed describe the progress of the insurrection of Scroop and Northumberland. These passages are evidently the historical authorities which the poet consulted:—

"Raufe Nevill, Earl of Westmoreland, that was not far off, together with the Lord John of Lancaster, the king's son, being informed of this rebellious attempt, assembled together such power as they might make, and coming into a plain within the forest of Galtree, caused their standards to be pight down in like sort as the archbishop had pight his, over against them, being far stronger in number of people than the other, for (as some write) there were of the rebels at the least eleven thousand men. When the Earl of Westmoreland perceived the force of adversaries, and that they lay still and attempted not to come forward upon him, he subtly devised how to quail their purpose, and forthwith dispatched messengers unto the archbishop to understand the cause, as it were, of that great assemble, and for what cause, contrary to the king's peace, they came so in armour. The archbishop answered, that he took nothing in hand against the king's peace, but that whatever he did, tended rather to advance the peace and quiet of the commonwealth, than otherwise, and where he and his company were in arms, it was for fear of the king, to whom he could have no free access by reason of such a multitude of flatterers as were about him, and therefore he maintained that his purpose was good and profitable, as well for the king himself, as for the realm, if men were willing to understand a truth: and herewith he showed forth a scroll in which the articles were written, whereof before ye have heard. The messengers returning unto the Earl of Westmoreland showed him what they had heard and brought from the archbishop. When he had read the articles, he showed in word and countenance outwardly that he liked of the archbishop's holy and virtuous intent and purpose, promising that he and his would prosecute the same in assisting the archbishop, who, rejoicing hereat, gave credit to the earl, and persuaded the Earl Marshal against his will as it were to go with him to a place appointed for them to commune together. Here, when they were met with like number on either part, the articles were read over, and without any more ado, the Earl of Westmoreland and those that were with him agreed to do their best to see that a reformation might be had according to the same. The Earl of Westmoreland using more policy than the rest: Well (said he) then our travail is come to the wished end; and where our people have been long in armour, let them depart home to their wonted trades and occupations: in the mean time let us drink together, in sign of agreement, that the people on both sides may see it, and know that it is true that we be light at a point. They had no sooner shaked hands together but that a knight was sent straightways from the archbishop to bring word to the people that there was a peace concluded, commanding each man to lay aside arms, and to resort home to their houses. The people beholding such tokens of peace as shaking of hands and drinking together of the lords in loving manner, brake up their field and returned homewards: but in the mean time, whilst the people of the archbishop's side withdrew away, the number of the contrary part increased, according to order given by the Earl of Westmoreland, and yet the archbishop perceived not that he was deceived, till the Earl of Westmoreland arrested both him and the Earl Marshal, with divers other. Their troops being pursued, many were taken, many slain, and many spoiled of that they had about them, and so permitted to go their ways."

"The Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolf, after they had been in Wales, in France, and Flanders, to purchase aid against King Henry, were returned back into Scotland, and had remained there now (1408) for the space of a whole year; and as their evil fortune would, whilst the king held a council of the nobility at London, the said Earl of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf, in a dismal hour, with a great power of Scots, returned into England, recovering divers of the earl's castles and seignories, for the people in great numbers resorted unto them. Hereupon encouraged with hope of good success, they enter into Yorkshire, and there began to destroy the country. The king advertised hereof, caused a great army to be assembled, and came forward with the same towards his enemies: but ere the king came to Nottingham, Sir Thomas (or, as other copies have, Raufe) Rokesby, sheriff of Yorkshire, assembled the forces of the country to resist the earl and his power, coming to Grimbaut Brigges, beside Knaresborough, there to stop them the passage; but they, returning aside, got to Weatherby, and so to Tadcaster, and finally came forward unto Branham Moor, near to Hayselwood, where they chose their ground meet to fight upon. The sheriff was as ready to give battle as the earl to receive it, and so with a standard of St. George spread, set fiercely upon the earl, who, under a standard of his own arms, encountered his adversaries with great manhood. There was a sore encounter and cruel conflict betwixt the parties, but in the end the victory fell to the sheriff. The Earl of Northumberland was slain in the field, and the Lord Bardolf was taken, but sore wounded, so that he shortly after died of the hurts."

ACT V.

In the Introductory Notice, p. 529, we have mentioned the story told by Sir Thomas Elyot, in his book of "The Governor," of the committal of Prince Henry to the Fleet by the Lord Chief Justice. This tradition was believed (perhaps upon the authority of Elyot) by Sir Edward Coke and Sir John Hawkins, and was referred to by them in legal arguments. The anecdote, as detailed by Elyot, is very amusing:—

"A good Judge, a good Prince, a good King.

"The most renowned prince, King Henry V., late king of England, during the life of his father, was noted to be fierce and of wanton courage. It happened that one of his servants whom he favoured well was for felony by him committed arraigned at the King's Bench: whereof the prince being advertised, and incensed by light persons about him, in furious rage came hastily to the bar, where his servant stood as a prisoner, and commanded him to be ungyved and set at liberty. Whereat all men were abashed, reserved the chief justice, who humbly exhorted the prince to be contented that his servant might be ordered according to the ancient laws of this realm; or if he would have him saved from the rigour of the laws, that he should obtain, if he might, of the king his father his gracious pardon, whereby no law or justice should be derogate.

"With which answer the prince nothing appeased, but rather more inflamed, endeavoured himself to take away his servant. The judge considering the perilous example and inconvenience that might thereby ensue, with a valiant spirit and courage commanded the prince upon his allegiance to leave the prisoner and depart his way; at which commandment the prince, being set all in a fury, all chafed, and in a terrible manner, came up to the place of judgment, men thinking that he would have slain the judge, or have done to him some damage: but the judge, sitting still without moving, declaring the majesty of the king's place of judgment, and with an assured and bold countenance, had to the prince these words following:—

"'Sir, remember yourself. I keep here the place of the king your sovereign lord and father, to whom you owe double obedience: wherefore eftsoones in his name, I charge you to desist of your wilfulness and unlawful enterprise, and from henceforth give good example to those which hereafter shall be your proper subjects. And now, for your contempt and disobedience, go you to the prison of the King's Bench, whereunto I commit you, and remain ye there prisoner until the pleasure of the king your father be further known.' With which words being abashed, and also wondering at the marvellous gravity of that worshipful justice, the noble prince, laying his weapon apart, doing reverence, departed and went to the King's Bench as he was commanded. Whereat his servants disdained, came and showed to the king all the whole affair, whereat he a whiles studying, after as a man all ravished with gladness, holding his eyes and hands up towards heaven, abraided with a loud voice: 'O merciful God, how much am I bound to your infinite goodness, specially for that you have given me a judge who feareth not to minister justice, and also a son who can suffer semblably and obey justice.'"

The circumstances which preceded the death of Henry IV., including the story of the prince removing the crown, are thus detailed by Holinshed:—

"In this fourteenth and last year of King Henry's reign, a council was holden in the White Friars in London, at the which, among other things, order was taken for ships and galleys to be builded and made ready, and all other things necessary to be provided, for a voyage which he meant to make into the Holy Land, there to recover the city of Jerusalem from the infidels. The morrow after Candlemas-day began a Parliament which he had called at London; but he departed this life before the same Parliament was ended: for now that his provisions were ready, and that he was furnished with all things necessary for such a royal journey as he pretended to take into the Holy Land, he was eftsoones taken with a sore sickness, which was not a leprosy (saith Master Hall), as foolish friars imagined, but a very apoplexy. During this, his last sickness, he caused his crown (as some write) to be set on a pillow at his bed's-head, and suddenly his pangs so sore troubled him, that he lay as though all his vital spirits had been from him departed. Such as were about him, thinking verily that he had been departed, covered his face with a linen cloth. The prince his son being hereof advertised, entered into the chamber, took away the crown, and departed. The father, being suddenly revived out of that trance, quickly perceived the lack of his crown, and having knowledge that the prince his son had taken it away, caused him to come before his presence, requiring of him what he meant so to misuse himself: the prince with a good audacity answered, Sir, to mine, and all men's judgements, you seemed dead in this world; wherefore I, as your next heir apparent, took that as mine own, and not as yours. Well fair son, said the king (with a great sigh), what right I had to it, God knoweth. Well, quoth the prince, if you die king, I will have the garland, and trust to keep it with the sword against all mine enemies, as you have done. Then, said the king, I commit all to God, and remember you to do well; and with that turned himself in his bed, and shortly after departed to God, in a chamber of the Abbots of Westminster called Jerusalem. We find that he was taken with his last sickness while he was making his prayers at Saint Edward's shrine, there as it were to take his leave, and so to proceed forth on his journey: he was so suddenly and grievously taken, that such as were about him feared lest he would have died presently; wherefore, to relieve him, if it were possible, they bare him into a chamber that was next at hand belonging to the Abbot of Westminster, where they laid him on a pallet before the fire, and used all remedies to revive him: at length he recovered his speech and understanding, and perceiving himself in a strange place which he knew not, he willed to know if the chamber had any particular name, whereunto answer was made, that it was called Jerusalem. Then said the king, laudes be given to the Father of Heaven, for now I know that I shall die here in this chamber, according to the prophesy of me declared, that I should depart this life in Jerusalem."

We close our Historical Illustrations with a passage from Holinshead descriptive of the change of life in Henry V. :—

"This king was the man that, according to the old proverb, declared and shewed in what sort honours ought to change manners; for immediately after that he was invested king, and had received the crown, he determined with himself to put upon him the shape of a new man, turning insolency and wildness into gravity and soberness: and whereas he had passed his youth in wanton pastime, and riotous disorder, with a sort of misgoverned mates, and unthrifty playseers, he now banished them from his presence (not unrewarded, nor yet unpreferred), inhibiting them, upon a great pain, not once to approach, lodge, or sojourn, within ten miles of his court or mansion: and in their places he elected and chose men of gravity, wit, and high policy."

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTICE.

PARTS I. AND II.

"IN the Shaksperian drama there is a vitality which grows and evolves itself from within—a key-note which guides and controls the harmonies throughout."* It is under the direction of a deep and absolute conviction of the truth of this principle—not only as applied to the master-pieces of Shakspeare, the Lear, the Macbeth, the Othello, but to all his works without exception,—that we can alone presume to understand any single drama of this poet,—much less to attempt to lead the judgment of others. Until by long and patient thought we believe that we have traced the roots, and seen the branches and buddings, of that "vitality,"—until by frequent listening to those "harmonies" we hear, or fancy we hear, that "key-note,"—we hold ourselves to be utterly unfitted even to call attention to a solitary poetical beauty, or to develop the peculiarities of a single character. Shakspeare is not to be taken up like an ordinary writer of fiction, whose excellence may be tested by a brilliant dialogue here, or a striking situation there. The proper object of criticism upon Shakspeare is to show the dependence of the parts upon the whole; for by that principle alone can we come to a due appreciation even of the separate parts. Dull critics, and brilliant critics, equally blunder about Shakspeare, when they reject this safe guide to the comprehension of his works. We have a Frenchman before us—M. Paul Duport—who gives us an "Analyse Raisonnée" of our poet, which is perfectly guiltless of any imaginative power to hide or adorn the dry bones of the Analysis.† Mark the confidence with which this gentleman speaks of the two plays before us! Of the First Part he says, "This piece has still less of action and interest than those which preceded it—(John and Richard II.) It is only an historical picture, the various circumstances of which have no relation amongst themselves. There is no personage who predominates over the others, so as to fix the attention of the audience. It is the anarchy of the Scene. What, however, renders it worthy an attentive examination is, its division into a tragic and a comic portion. The two species are here very distinct. The tragic portion is cold, disjointed, undecided; but the comic, although absolutely foreign to the shadow of the action which makes the subject of the piece, merits sometimes to be placed by the side of the better passages of the Regnards, and even of the Molières." This is pretty decided for a blockhead; and, indeed, the decision with which he speaks could only proceed from a blockhead par excellence. Had this Frenchman not been supremely dull and conceited, he would have had some glimmerings of the truth, though he might not have seen the whole truth. Our own Johnson had too strong a sympathy with the marvellous talent which runs through the scenes of the Henry IV., not to speak of these plays with more than common enthusiasm. The great events, he says, are interesting; the slighter occurrences diverting; the characters diversified with the profoundest skill; Falstaff is the unimitated, unimitable. But now comes the qualification—the result of Johnson looking at the parts instead of the whole:—"I fancy every reader, when he ends this play, cries out with Desdemona, 'O most lame and impotent conclusion!' As this play was not, to our knowledge, divided into acts by the author, I could be content to conclude it with the death of Henry the Fourth." Let us endeavour, in going through the scenes of these plays, with the help of the great guiding principle that Shakspeare "worked in the spirit of nature by evolving the germ from within, by the imaginative power according to an idea;"‡ let us endeavour to prove—not, indeed, that these plays do not want action and interest, and that the tragic parts are not cold, disjointed, and undecided—but that all the circumstances have relation amongst themselves, and that the comic parts, so far from being absolutely foreign to the action, entirely depend upon it, and, to a certain extent, direct it. If we succeed in our attempt, we shall show that, from the preliminary and connecting lines in Richard II.,

"Can no man tell of my unthrifty son?"

to "the most lame and impotent conclusion," which Johnson would suppress, nothing can be spared—nothing can be altered; that Dame Quickly and Justice Silence are as essential to the progress of the action as Hotspur and the king;—that the prince could not advance without Falstaff, nor Falstaff without the prince;—that the poetry and the wit are co-dependent and inseparable;—and, above all, that the minute shades of character generally, and especially the extraordinary fusion of many contrary qualities in the character of Falstaff, are to be completely explained and reconciled, only by reference to their connection with the dramatic action,—the key-note which guides and controls the harmonies throughout."

Some seventy lines from the commencement of this play (we shall find it convenient to speak of the two parts as forming one drama), the "key-note" is struck. The king communicates to his friends "the smooth and welcome news" of the battle of Holmedon. His exultation is unbounded:—

"And is not this an honourable spoil?
A gallant prize? ha, cousin, is it not?"

But when the king is told

It is a conquest for a prince to boast of,"

the one circumstance—the

"One fatal remembrance, one sorrow that throws
Its deep shade alike o'er his joys and his woes,"—.

the shame that extinguishes the right to boast, comes across his mind :—

“ Yea, there thou mak'st me sad, and mak'st me sin,
In envy that my lord Northumberland
Should be the father of so blest a son :
A son who is the theme of honour's tongue ;
Amongst a grove the very straightest plant ;
Who is sweet fortune's minion, and her pride :
Whilst I, by looking on the praise of him,
See riot and dishonour stain the brow
Of my young Harry. O, that it could be prov'd,
That some night-tripping fairy had exchang'd
In cradle-clothes our children where they lay,
And call'd mine Percy, his Plantagenet !
Then would I have his Harry, and he mine.
But let him from my thoughts.”

The king forces his “ young Harry ” from his thoughts, and talks of “ young Percy's pride.” But the real action of the drama has commenced, in this irrepressible disclosure of the king's habitual feelings. It is for the poet to carry on the exhibition of the “ riot and dishonour,”—their course,—their ebbings and flowings,—the circumstances which control, and modify, and subdue them. The events which determine the career of the prince finally conquer the habits by which he was originally surrounded ; and it is in the entire disclosure of these habits, as not incompatible with their growing modification and ultimate overthrow by those events which constitute what is called the tragic action of the drama—that every incident and every character becomes an integral part of the whole—a branch, or a leaf, or a bud, or a flower, of the one “ vitality.”

We have seen in what spirit the prince of the old play which preceded Shakspeare was conceived. We have seen, also, the character of the associates by whom he was surrounded. We feel that the whole of such a representation must be untrue. The depraved and unfeeling blackguard of that play could never have become the hero of Agincourt. There was no unity of character between the prince of the beginning and of the end of that play ; and therefore there could have been no unity of action. Perhaps no mind but Shakspeare's could have reconciled the apparent contradiction which appears to lie upon the surface both of the events by which the prince was moulded, and the characters by which he was surrounded. It was for him alone to exhibit a species of profligacy not only capable of being conquered by the higher energy which made the prince chivalrously brave and daring, but absolutely akin to that higher energy. This was to be effected, not only by the peculiar qualities of the prince's own mind, but by the still more peculiar qualities of his associates. As the prince of Shakspeare, while he never ceased to feel, in the depths of his nobler nature, “ thus we play the fools with the time, and the spirits of the wise sit in the clouds, and mock us ; ” so he never could have been surrounded by the “ Ned ” and “ Tom ” of the old play, who must have extinguished all thoughts of “ the wise,” and have produced irredeemable “ dishonour.” Falstaff, the “ unimitated, unimitable Falstaff,” was the poetical creation that was absolutely necessary to the conduct of the great dramatic action,—the natural transformation of “ the mad-cap prince of Wales ” into King Henry V. So, indeed, were all the satellites which revolve round Falstaff, sharing and reflecting his light. It is the perfect characterization of this drama which makes the incidents consistent : the characters cannot live apart from the incidents ; the incidents cannot move on without the characters. If we attempt to unravel the characters, and the complicated character of Falstaff especially, without reference to the incidents, we are speedily in a labyrinth. The vulgar notion of Falstaff, for example, is the stage notion. Mrs. Inchbald truly remarks, “ To many spectators, all Falstaff's humour is comprised in his unwieldy person.” But the same lady adopts an equally vulgar stage generalisation, and calls him the “ cowardly Falstaff.” The “ wit ” of Falstaff, though slightly received into the stage conception of the character, is a very vague notion, compared with the bulk and the cowardice of Falstaff.

Mrs. Inchbald (we are quoting from her prefaces to the acted plays) says, “ The reader who is too refined to laugh at the wit of Sir John, must yet enjoy Hotspur's picture of a coxcomb.” The refinement of the players is even more sensitive ; for they altogether leave out in the representation the scene where Falstaff and the prince alternately stand for the king and Harry—a scene to which nothing of comic that ever was written, except, perhaps, a passage or two in Cervantes, can at all approach. The players, however, are consistent. Their intolerance of poetry and of wit are equal. Not a line do they keep of the matchless first scene of the third act, than which Shakspeare never wrote anything more spirited, more individualised, more harmonious. But we are digressing. Falstaff, then, we see in the rude general conception of his character, is fat, cowardly, and somewhat witty. The players always double and quadruple the author's notion of his fat and his cowardice ; and they kindly allow us a modicum of his wit. To be fat and to be cowardly, and even to have some wit, would go far to make an excellent butt for a wild young prince ; but they would not make a Falstaff. These qualities would be, to such a prince as Shakspeare has conceived, little better than Bardolph's nose, or the Drawer's “ anon, anon, sir.” To understand Falstaff, however, we must take him scene by scene, and incident by incident ; we must study his character in its development by the incidents. “ Thou art so fat-witted, with drinking of old sack, and unbuttoning thee after supper, and sleeping upon benches after noon.” Here is the sensualist introduced to us. We have here a vista of “ the halfpenny-worth of bread to the intolerable deal of sack.” But if we look closely, we shall see that the prince is exaggerating, and that Falstaff humours the exaggeration. It is Falstaff's cue to heighten all his own infirmities and frailties. “ Men of all sorts,” he says, “ take a pride to gird at me.” But he has himself a pride in the pride which they take :—“ The brain of this foolish-compounded clay, man, is not able to invent anything that tends to laughter, more than I invent, or is invented on me : I am not only witty in myself, but the cause that wit is in other men.” How immediately Falstaff turns the prince from bantering, to a position in which he has to deal with an antagonist ! The thrusts of wit are exchanged like the bouts of a fencing match. The sensualist, we see, has a prodigious activity of intellect ; and he at once passes out of the slough of vulgar sensuality. But the man of wit is also a man of action. He is ready for “ purse-taking ; ”—'tis his “ vocation.” Is not this again meant to be an exaggeration ? The “ night's exploit on Gadshill ” was the single violence, as far as we know, of Falstaff as well as of the prince. His “ vocation ” was that of a soldier. It is as a soldier that we for the most part see him throughout this drama ;—a soldier having charge and authority. But in the days of Henry IV., and long after, the “ vocation ” of a soldier was that of a plunderer, and “ purse-taking ” was an object not altogether unfamiliar to Falstaff's professional vision. That Shakspeare ever meant to paint him as an habitual thief, or a companion of thieves, is, in our view, one of those absurdities which has grown up out of stage exaggeration. The prince and Poins are equally obnoxious to the charge. And yet, although Poins, the intimate of the prince, proposes to them, “ My lads, my lads, to-morrow morning, by four o'clock early at Gadshill,” the prince refuses to go till Poins shows him that he hath “ a jest to execute.” The prince, in the soliloquy which is intended to keep him right with those who look forward to the future king, does not talk of Falstaff and Poins as of utterly base companions :—

“ I know you all, and will awhile uphold
The unyok'd humour of your idleness.”

He saw in Falstaff and Poins the same “ idleness ” which was in himself—the idleness of preferring the passing pleasure, whether of sensual gratification, or of mental excitement without an adequate end—which led him to their society. His resolution to forsake the “ idleness ” was a very feeble one. He would for “ awhile uphold ” it.

The prince is looking forward to the “ virtue of the jest ” that will follow the adventure on Gadshill. The once proud allies, but now haughty rivals, of his father are, at the same time, bearding that father in his palace. Worcester is dismissed, for his "presence is too bold and peremptory." Hotspur defends the denial of his prisoners in that most characteristic speech which reveals his rough and passionate spirit. All the strength of his nature,—the elevation without refinement,—the force of will rising into poetry even by its own chafings,—are fully brought out in the rapid movement of this scene. Never was the sublimity of an over-mastering passion more consummately displayed. No disjointed ravings, no callings upon the gods, no clenchings of the fist or tearings of the hair, no threats without a purpose,—none of the commonplaces which make up the staple of ordinary tragedy;—but the uncontrollable rush of an energetic mind, abandoning itself from a sense of injury to impulses impossible to be guided by will or circumstance, and which finally sweeps into its own torrent all the feeble barriers of prudence which inferior natures would oppose to it. It runs its course like a mad blood-horse; and every attempt to put on the bridle produces a new impatience. Exhaustion at last comes, and then how complete is the exhaustion: "I have done in sooth;"—a word or two of question, a word or two of assent, to the calm proposals of Worcester;—and the passion of talk is ready to become the passion of action. We may now understand what Shakspeare meant by approximating the ages of Hotspur and Henry of Monmouth. Let us make Hotspur forty-five years of age, and Henry sixteen, as the literalists would have it, and the whole dramatic structure crumbles into dust. Under the poet's hand we see that Hotspur is the good destiny of the young Henry that his higher qualities are to fire the prince's ambition; that his rashness is to lead to the prince's triumph. Eastcheap is Hal's holiday scene; but the field of Shrewsbury will be Harry's working-place.

All the minor characters and situations of this drama are wonderfully wrought up. The inn-yard at Rochester is one of those little pictures which live for ever in the memory, because they are thoroughly true to nature. Who that has read this scene, and has looked out upon the darkness of a winter morning, has not thought of "Charles' wain over the new chimney?" Who has not speculated upon the grief of the man with one idea, of Robin ostler, who "never joyed since the price of oats rose?" We see not the "franklin from the wild of Kent, who hath brought three hundred marks with him in gold;" but we form a notion of that sturdy and portly English yeoman. The "eggs and butter" which the travellers have at breakfast even interest us. This is the art by which a fiction becomes a reality,—the art of a Defoe, as well as of a Shakspeare. But all this is but a preparation for the exploit of Gadshill. We hardly know what limits there are to the comedy of humour, but it seems impossible to go beyond this. Practical wit is here carried as far as it can well go. There are other scenes in this play, where the sense of the comic is brought from a deeper region of the heart; but there are none more laughter-provoking. The helplessness of Falstaff without his horse is in itself a humorous situation; but how doubly rich does the humour become by the contrast of his nimbleness of mind with his heaviness of body! His soliloquies are always rich, but they are especially so in connection with the odd situations out of which they grow. Here his own sense of the ludicrousness of his position carries off the ill-humour which he feels at those who have placed him in it. "Have you any levers to lift me up again, being down?" And then how characteristic is his abuse of his tormentors: "An I have not ballads made upon you all, and sung to filthy tunes, let a cup of sack be my poison." In the very act of the robbery Falstaff's habit of laughing at himself is as predominant as when he is making fun for the prince: "Hang ye, gorbellied knaves; are ye undone? No, ye fat chuffs; I would your store were here! On, bacons, on! What, ye knaves, young men must live." The robbery is complete. "The thieves have bound the true men." The prince and Poins rob the thieves:—

"Each takes his fellow for an officer."

The question here arises whether Falstaff, thus discomfited, was meant by Shakspeare for a coward. A long essay, and a very able one, has been written to prove that Falstaff was not a coward.* This essay, which was originally published in 1777, is, considering the time at which it appeared, a remarkable specimen of genial criticism upon Shakspeare. The author then stood almost alone in the endeavour to understand the poet in his admiration of him. It would be beside our purpose to furnish any analysis of this essay; and indeed this one disputed point of Falstaff's character is made to assume a disproportionate importance by being the subject of an elaborate defence. Mackenzie, in the "Lounger," appears to us to have put the point very neatly: "Though I will not go so far as a paradoxical critic has done, and ascribe valour to Falstaff; yet, if his cowardice is fairly examined, it will be found to be not so much a weakness as a principle. In his very cowardice there is much of the sagacity I have remarked in him; he has the sense of danger, but not the discomposure of fear."

The interval between the double robbery and the fun which is to result from it, carries us back to Hotspur. We are admitted to a glimpse of the dangers which begin to surround him: the falling off of friends,—the confidence that rises over difficulties, even to the point of rashness. But we have a new interest in Hotspur. He has a wife,—one of those women that Shakspeare only has painted;—timid, restless, affectionate, playful, submissive,—a lovely woodbine hanging on the mighty oak. The indifference of Hotspur to every thought but the one dominant idea is beautifully wrought out in this little scene; and the whole carries on the action unobtrusively, but decidedly: it has the combined beauty of repose and movement. To those who cannot see the connection of the action, in Hotspur and his wife at Warkworth and the prince and Falstaff at Eastcheap, we would commend M. Paul Duport.

Shakspeare has opened to us a secret in the scene between the prince and the Drawer. "This scene," says Johnson, "helped by the distraction of the Drawer and the grimaces of the prince, may entertain upon the stage, but affords not much delight to the reader. The author has judiciously made it short." The scene, as we apprehend, was introduced by Shakspeare to show the quality of the prince's wit when unsustained by that of Falstaff. The prince goes to this boy-play with the Drawer, "to drive away the time till Falstaff come." With Poins, who is a cold, gentlemanly hanger-on, the prince has no exuberance; he is playful, smart, voluble, but not witty. Falstaff is necessary to him, to call out the higher qualities of his intellect. He fancies that he is laughing at Falstaff; while, in truth, the sagacity, the readiness, the presence of mind, the covert sarcasm, the unrestrained impudence, and the crowning wit of that extraordinary humorist, at once rouse the prince's mind into a state of activity which in itself would be pleasurable, but is doubly fascinating in connection with the self-complacency which tells him that the man who thus stimulates him has a thousand prominent points to be ridiculed, and that the subject of the ridicule will be the first to enjoy the jest. It would be vain for us to attempt any dissection of the great scene which follows. We would, however, observe that, to our minds, "the incomprehensible lies" which Falstaff tells,—the "two or three and fifty upon poor old Jack,"—the "two rogues in buckram suits,"—the four, the seven, the nine, the eleven,—the "three misbegotten knaves in Kendal green,"—are lies that are intended to be received as lies,—an incoherent exaggeration for the purpose of drawing out the real facts. The unconquerable good humour and elation of spirit which Falstaff displays throughout the whole scene, show as if he had a glimpse or a shrewd suspicion of the truth. But in the midst of the revelry, the "villainous news abroad" penetrates even to the Boar's Head. Yet the fun never stops; and Falstaff is desirous to "play out the play," even when the sheriff is at the door. When the sheriff demands the "gross fat man," whom the "hue and cry hath followed," the prince replies—

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTICE.

"The man, I do assure you, is not here."

Falstaff was behind the arras. We do not go along with Steevens, who says, "Every reader must regret that Shakspeare would not give himself the trouble to furnish Prince Henry with some more pardonable excuse; without obliging him to have recourse to an absolute falsehood, and that too uttered under the sanction of so strong an assurance." We do not agree with Steevens, because, in our belief, it was Shakspeare's intention to show that the prince could not come out of these scenes without a moral contamination. The lie was an inevitable consequence of the participation in the robbery. The money might be restored, but the accomplice must be protected.

Is it by accident that we are now to pass from the region of the highest wit into the region of the highest poetry? Brilliant as the scenes at the Boar's Head are, they leave an unsatisfactory impression upon the moral sense; and they are meant to do so. The character of Falstaff is essentially anti-poetical. It may appear a truism to say this; and yet he has fancy enough for a large component part of a poet. His wit is for the most part a succession of images; but his imagination sees only the ludicrous aspect of things, and thus the images are all of the earth—they cannot go out of our finite nature. Thus it is that when in company with Falstaff the prince exhibits no one particle of that enthusiasm which goes to form the chivalrous portion of his after character. Up to this point, then, his nature appears essentially less elevated than the natures of his enemies. Hotspur is a being of lofty passions—Glendower one of wild and mysterious imaginations. How singularly are their characters developed in the scenes at Bangor! The solemn credulity of the reputed magician,—the sarcastic unbelief of the impatient warrior,—are equally indications of men in earnest. Harry of Monmouth up to this time has been playing a part. Excellently as he has played it, he was still only the second actor; for Falstaff beats him out and out, through the rich geniality of his temperament. Falstaff at this time approaches much nearer to the earnestness of Glendower than Harry does to the exaltation of Hotspur. When Falstaff exclaims, "Banish plump Jack, and banish all the world," we feel that he is as sincere as when Glendower says—

"I say, the earth did shake when I was born."

But the poetical elevation of the scenes at Bangor is a fit introduction also to the new situation in which we shall see the prince. It is skilfully interposed between the revels at the Boar's Head and the penitential interview of Henry with his father. The players, discarding this poetical scene, allow us no resting-place between the debauch and the repentance. In the "private conference" between Henry IV. and his son, the character of Bolingbroke is sustained with what we may truly call historical accuracy. The solemn dignity of the offended father, displaying itself in the very structure of the verse—

"I know not whether God will have it so,
For some displeasing service I have done,
That in his secret doom, out of my blood
He'll breed revengement and a scourge for me:"— the calm and calculating prudence with which the king runs over the successful passages of his own history—the example that he holds up to his son's ambition, of Percy, who

"—doth fill fields with harness in the realm:"—

the striking picture of the dangers with which his throne is surrounded—and the final most bitter reproof—

"Why, Harry, do I tell thee of my foes, Which art my near'st and dearest enemy?"— all this exhibits the masterly politician, but it does not show us the deep passion of the father; nor does it hold up to the prince the highest motives for a change of life. The answer of the prince partakes somewhat of his father's policy. He is not moved to any deep and agonizing remorse; he extenuates the offences that are laid to his charge; his ambition, indeed, is roused, and he proposes to "salve the long grown wounds" of his "intemperance" by redeeming "all on Percy's head." The king is more than satisfied. The change of character of the prince was in progress, but not in completion. It was for the old chroniclers to talk of his miraculous conversion; it was for Shakspeare to show the gradations of its course.

The character of Falstaff is developing; but it is not improving. His sensuality puts on a grosser aspect when he is alone with Bardolph his satellite. We see, too, that if his vocation be not absolutely to "taking purses," his principles do not stand in the way of his success. When the Hostess asks him for money that he owes, he insults her. When the prince tells him he is good friends with his father, "rob me the exchequer the first thing thou doest," is the inopportune answer. The prince replies not. He is evidently in a more sober vein. Falstaff, however, has "a charge of foot;" and the alacrity which he shows is quite evidence enough that Shakspeare had no intention to make him a constitutional coward. The prince and he are going to the same battle-field. They may exchange a passing jest or two, but the ties of intimate connection between them seem somewhat loosened. The higher portions of the prince's nature are expanding;—the grosser qualities of Falstaff are coming more and more into view. Shakspeare seldom attempts to add anything, by the descriptions of others, to the power which his characters have of developing themselves; but in this case it was necessary to present a distinct image to the spectator of the altered Harry of the Boar's Head, before he came himself upon another scene. The description of Vernon—

"I saw young Harry,—with his beaver on,
His cuisses on his thighs, gallantly arm'd,—
Rise from the ground like feather'd Mercury,
And vaulted with such ease into his seat
As if an angel dropp'd down from the clouds,
To turn and wind a fiery Pegasus,
And witch the world with noble horsemanship:"—

this fine description is the preparation for the gallant bearing of the prince in the fifth act.

The historical action of the First Part of Henry IV. is the first insurrection of the Percies, which was put down by the battle of Shrewsbury. These events are the inevitable consequence of the circumstances which attended the deposition of Richard II. Bolingbroke mounted the throne by the treachery of Richard's friends; his partisans were too great to remain merely partisans:—

"King Richard might create a perfect guess,
That great Northumberland, then false to him,
Would, of that seed, grow to a greater falseness."

The struggles for power which followed the destruction of the legitimate power have been here painted by Shakspeare with that marvellous impartiality of which we have already spoken in the notice upon Richard II. Our sympathies would be almost wholly with Hotspur and his friends had not the poet raised up a new interest in the chivalrous bearing of Henry of Monmouth, to balance the noble character of the young Percy. The prudence and moderation of the king, accompanied, too, with high courage, still further divide the interest; and the guilt of Worcester, in falsifying the issue of his mission, completes this division, and carries out the great political purpose of the poet, which was to show how, if a nation's internal peace be once broken, the prosperity and happiness of millions are put at the mercy of the weakness and the wickedness of the higher agents, who call themselves the interpreters of a nation's voice. Personal fear and personal ambition are, in all such cases, substituted for the public principles upon which the leaders on either side profess to act. Shakspeare shows us in these scenes the hollowness of all motives but those which result from high principles or impulses. Rash, proud, ambitious, prodigal of blood, as Hotspur is, we feel that there is not an atom of meanness in his composition, and that his ambition is even virtue under a system of opinion that makes "the hero" out of those qualities which have inflicted most suffering upon humanity. When he exclaims—

“ Let them come ;
They come like sacrifices in their trim,
And to the fire-eyed maid of smoky war,
All hot, and bleeding, will we offer them :
The mailed Mars shall on his altar sit,
Up to the ears in blood ! ”—

our spirit is moved “ as with a trumpet.” He would carry us away with him, were it not for the milder courage of young Harry—the courage of principle and of mercy. Frank, liberal, prudent, gentle, but yet brave as Hotspur himself, the prince shows us that, even in his wildest excesses, he has drunk deeply of the fountains of truth and wisdom. The wisdom of the king is that of a cold and subtle politician ; Hotspur seems to stand out from his followers as the haughty feudal lord, too proud to have listened to any teacher but his own will ; but the prince, in casting away the dignity of his station to commune freely with his fellow-men, has attained that strength which is above all conventional power ; his virtues as well as his frailties belong to our common humanity—the virtues capable, therefore, of the highest elevation—the frailties not pampered into crimes by the artificial incentives of social position. His challenge to Hotspur exhibits all the attributes of the gentleman as well as the hero—mercy, sincerity, modesty, courage :—

“ In both our armies there is many a soul
Shall pay full dearly for this encounter,
If once they join in trial. Tell your nephew,
The prince of Wales doth join with all the world
In praise of Henry Percy : By my hopes,—
This present enterprise set off his head,—
I do not think a braver gentleman,
More active-valiant, or more valiant-young,
More daring, or more bold, is now alive,
To grace this latter age with noble deeds.
For my part, I may speak it to my shame,
I have a truant been to chivalry ;
And so, I hear, he doth account me too :
Yet this before my father’s majesty,—
I am content that he shall take the odds
Of his great name and estimation ;
And will, to save the blood on either side,
Try fortune with him in a single fight.”

Could the prince have reached this height amidst the cold formalities of his father’s court ? We think that Shakspeare meant distinctly to show that Henry of Monmouth, when he “ sounded the very base-string of humility,” gathered out of his dangerous experience that spirit of sympathy with human actions and motives from which a sovereign is almost necessarily excluded ; and thus the prince himself believes that “ in everything the purpose must weigh with the folly.” In the march from Harfleur to Agincourt, the Henry V. of Shakspeare says, “ When lenity and cruelty play for a kingdom the gentler gamester is the soonest winner.” Where did he learn this ? Was it in the same school where his brother, John of Lancaster, learnt the cold treachery which the poet and the historian have both exhibited in his conduct to Scroop, and Mowbray, and Hastings ? Henry of Monmouth, when he supposes Falstaff dead, drops a tear over him :—

“ What ! old acquaintance ! could not all this flesh
Keep in a little life ? Poor Jack, farewell !
I could have better spared a better man.
O, I should have a heavy miss of thee,
If I were much in love with vanity.”

Henry here shows the restraint which he had really put upon himself in his wildest levities ; but he feels as a man the supposed loss of his “ old acquaintance : ” John of Lancaster, on the other hand, has no frailties, but he has no sympathies. Falstaff hits off his character in a word or two : “ a man cannot make him laugh.”

Thus far have we shown the unity of purpose with which Shakspeare, in tracing the course of the civil troubles which followed the usurpation of Henry IV., has exhibited the process by which the character of Henry V. was established. The “ mad-wag ” of Gads-hill is the hero of the field of Shrewsbury :—

“ Thou hast redeem’d thy lost opinion.”

The Percy lies at his feet. He looks upon his adversary dead, with the same gentle and chivalrous spirit as he manifested towards him living :—

“ Fare thee well, great heart ! ”

It is in the same spirit that he deals with “ the noble Scot : ”—

“ Go to the Douglas, and deliver him
Up to his pleasure, ransomless, and free :
His valour, shown upon our crests to-day,
Hath shown us how to cherish such high deeds
Even in the bosom of our adversaries.”

The Second Part of this drama is bound up with the first, through the most skilful management of the poet. Each part was, of course, acted as a distinct play in Shakspeare’s time. In our own day, the Second Part is very seldom produced ; but when it is, the players destroy the connecting-link, by suppressing one of the finest scenes which Shakspeare ever wrote—the scene between Northumberland, Lord Bardolph, and Morton, at Warkworth Castle. Colley Cibber, however, wrenched the scene out of its place ; and cutting it up into a dozen bits, stuck it here and there throughout his alteration of Richard III. Many false Cremonas are thus manufactured out of one real one ; and the musical dupe is contented with the neck, or the sounding-board, of the true fiddle, while the knave who has broken it up has destroyed the one thing which constituted its highest value—the perfect adaptation of all its parts. Let this outrage upon Shakspeare, however, pass. We live in a time when it cannot be repeated. The connecting scene between the First and Second Part brings us back to the Northumberland of Richard II. We have scarcely seen him in the First Part of Henry IV., but here we are made to feel that the retribution which awaited his treacherous and selfish actions has arrived. He betrayed Richard to Bolingbroke—he insulted the unhappy king in his hour of misery—he incited his son and his brother to revolt from Henry, and then deserted them in their need. We feel, then, that the misery which produces his “ strained passion ” is a just visitation :—

“ Now let not Nature’s hand
Keep the wild flood confin’d ! let order die !
And let this world no longer be a stage,
To feed contention in a lingering act ;
But let one spirit of the first-born Cain
Reign in all bosoms, that, each heart being set
On bloody courses, the rude scene may end,
And darkness be the burier of the dead ! ”

His cold and selfish policy destroyed his son at Shrewsbury, and he endures to be reproached for it by that son’s widow :—

“ The time was, father, that you broke your word,
When you were more endear’d to it than now ;
When your own Percy, when my heart’s dear Harry,
Threw many a northward look, to see his father
Bring up his powers ; but he did long in vain.”

He again yields to his own fears, even more than to the entreaties of his wife and daughter, and once more waits for “ time and vantage.” His eventual fall, therefore, moves no pity ; and we feel that the poet properly dismisses him and his fate in three lines :—

“ The earl Northumberland, and the lord Bardolph,
With a great power of English and of Scots,
Are by the sheriff of Yorkshire overthrown.”

The conspirators against Henry IV., who are now upon the scene, are far less interesting than those of the former part. We have no character that can at all compare with Hotspur, or Glendower, or Douglas. Hastings has, indeed, the rashness of Hotspur, but without his fire and brilliancy ; the Archbishop is dignified and sententious ; Lord Bardolph sensible and prudent. Neither the characters nor the incidents afford any scope for the highest poetry. The finest thing in the scenes where the conspirators appear is the speech of the Archbishop :—

“ An habitation giddy and unsure
Hath he that buildeth on the vulgar heart.”

To the conspirators are opposed John of Lancaster and Westmoreland. In the scene where these leaders (fitting representatives, indeed, of the cruel and treacherous times which we call the days of chivalry) tempt Hastings, and Mowbray, and the Archbishop, to disband their forces, and then arrest them for treason, Shakspeare has contrived to make us hate the act and the actors with an intensity which is the natural result of his dramatic power. Johnson, however, says, "It cannot but raise some indignation to find this horrid violation of faith passed over thus slightly by the poet, without any note of censure or detestation." Malone agrees in this complaint:—"Shakspeare, here, as in many other places, has merely followed the historians, who related this perfidious act without animadversion. But there is certainly no excuse; for it is the duty of a poet always to take the side of virtue." Holinshed, in a marginal note, describes this treachery as "the subtill policie of the earle of Westmerland." Now, we quite admit that it was the duty of the historian to call this "subtill policie" by some much harder name; but we utterly deny that it was the duty of the poet to introduce a fine declamation about virtue and honour, such as Johnson himself would have introduced,

"To please the boys, and be a theme at school."

Shakspeare has made it perfectly evident that the treachery by which the Archbishop and his friends were sacrificed was deliberately arranged by Prince John and Westmoreland. When the young general is becoming violent with Hastings, Westmoreland most artfully reminds him that all this is waste of time,—that they have something in store more effective than reproaches:—

"Pleaseth your grace, to answer them directly,
How far-forth you do like their articles?"

The crafty prince answers to his cue without hesitation:—

"I like them all, and do allow them well;"

and he follows up the promise of redress by—

"here, between the armies,
Let's drink together friendly, and embrace."

To this duplicity are opposed the frankness of Hastings and the wisdom of the Archbishop:—

A peace is of the nature of a conquest;
For then both parties nobly are subdued,
And neither party loser."

In full contrast to the confiding honesty of these men stands out the dirty equivocation of Prince John:—

"Arch. Will you thus break your faith?
Prince John. I pawn'd thee none:
I promis'd you redress of these same grievances
Whereof you did complain."

Is there anything more wanting to make us detest "this horrid violation of faith?" One thing, which the poet has given us,—the cruelty which follows the perfidy:—

"Strike up our drums, pursue the scatter'd stray."

To our minds, after this dramatic picture, we can well dispense with any didactic explanations. The simple question of Mowbray (which is evaded)—

"Is this proceeding just and honourable?"— is quite enough to show the dullest that the poet did "take the side of virtue."

The scene, in the first act of the Second Part, between Falstaff and the Lord Chief Justice, takes us back to the field of Shrewsbury:—

"Atten. Falstaff, an't please your lordship.
Ch. Just. He that was in question for the robbery?
Atten. He, my lord: but he hath since done good service at Shrewsbury; and, as I hear, is now going with some charge to the lord John of Lancaster."

We have seen Falstaff, in his progress to that battle-field, an unscrupulous extortioner, degrading his public authority by making it the instrument for his private purposes: "I have misused the king's press damnably. I have got, in exchange of a hundred and fifty soldiers, three hundred and odd pounds." We have seen his deportment in the battle: "I have led my ragamuffins where they are peppered:"—this is not cowardice. We have seen him in the heat of the fight jesting and dallying with his bottle of sack:—this is not cowardice. Himself is his best expositor: "I like not such grinning honour as Sir Walter hath: Give me life: which if I can save, so; if not, honour comes unlooked for, and there's an end." Again: "The better part of valour is discretion; in the which better part, I have saved my life." What is this but the absence of that higher quality of the mind, be it a principle or a feeling, which constitutes the heroic character,—the poetry of action? We find the absence of this quality in Iago as well as in Falstaff. Look at his reply to Cassio's lament: "I have lost the immortal part, sir, of myself, and what remains is bestial.—My reputation, Iago, my reputation." "As I am an honest man, I thought you had received some bodily wound; there is more offence in that, than in reputation. Reputation is an idle and most false imposition." 'This is perfectly equivalent to Falstaff's "Can honour set to a leg? Honour is a mere scutcheon." Falstaff's assault, too, upon the dead Percy is exactly in the same spirit, and so are the lie and the boast which follow the exploit: "I'll take it upon my death, I gave him this wound in the thigh: if the man were alive, and would deny it, I would make him eat a piece of my sword." Shakspeare has drawn a liar, a braggart, and a coward in Parolles.* He has also in the play before us, and in Henry V., given us Pistol, a braggart and a coward. But how essentially different are both these characters from Falstaff! And yet Johnson, with a singular want of discrimination in one who relished Falstaff so highly, says "Parolles has many of the lineaments of Falstaff." Helena, in All's Well that Ends Well, thus truly describes Parolles:—

"I know him a notorious liar, Think him a great way fool, solely a coward."

Parolles is a braggadocio who puts himself into a difficulty by undertaking an adventure for which he has not the requisite courage, and then in his double cowardice endeavours to lie himself out of the scrape. How entirely different is this from Falstaff! He volunteers no prodigious feat from which he shrinks. He exercises his accustomed sagacity to make the most of his situation by the side of the dead Percy: "Nothing confutes me but eyes, and nobody sees me;"—and when the lie is told, "We rose both at an instant, and fought a long hour by Shrewsbury clock," it is precisely of the same character as the "incomprehensible lies" about the men in buckram—something that the utterer and the hearers cannot exactly distinguish for jest or earnest. The prince thus receives the story:—

"This is the strangest fellow, brother John."

Again, look at Pistol swallowing the leek in Henry V., and Pistol kicked down-stairs by Falstaff in this play,—and note the difference between "a counterfeit cowardly knave" and Falstaff. The truth is, all these generalities about Falstaff, and false comparisons arising out of the generalities, are popular mistakes too hastily received into criticism. There is infinitely more truth in Mackenzie's parallel between Falstaff and Richard III. than in Johnson's comparison of Falstaff with Parolles. "Both," says Mackenzie, "are men of the world; both possess that sagacity and understanding which is fitted for its purposes; both despise those refined feelings, those motives of delicacy, those restraints of virtue, which might obstruct the course they have marked out for themselves. Both use the weaknesses of others, as skilful players at a game to the ignorance of their opponents; they enjoy the advantage, not only without self-reproach, but with the pride of superiority. Indeed, so much does Richard in the higher walk of villainy resemble Falstaff in the lower region of roguery and dissipation, that it were not difficult to show, in the dialogue of the two characters, however dissimilar in situation, many passages and expressions in a style of remarkable resemblance." †

† Lounger, No. 69.

Mackenzie has given us no example of the remarkable resemblance of passages and expressions; and, indeed, after a careful comparison, we doubt whether such resemblances of "expression" do exist. But what is more to the purpose, and more in confirmation of Mackenzie's theory, Falstaff and Richard, throughout their career, display the same "alacrity of spirit," the same "cheer of mind," the same readiness in meeting difficulties, the same determination to surmount them. One parallel, and that a very remarkable one, will sufficiently illustrate this. The first scene between the Lord Chief Justice and Falstaff,—that scene of matchless impudence and self-reliance,—and the scene where Richard evades Buckingham's claim to the earldom of Hereford, are as similar as the difference of circumstances will allow them to be. We give the parallel passages:—

FALSTAFF.

Ch. Just. Sir John Falstaff, a word with you.

Fal. My good lord!—Give your lordship good time of day. I am glad to see your lordship abroad: I heard say your lordship was sick: I hope your lordship goes abroad by advice. Your lordship, though not clean past your youth, hath yet some smack of age in you, some relish of the saltness of time; and I most humbly beseech your lordship to have a reverend care of your health.

Ch. Just. Sir John, I sent for you before your expedition to Shrewsbury.

Fal. If it please your lordship, I hear his majesty is returned with some discomfort from Wales.

Ch. Just. I talk not of his majesty:—you would not come when I sent for you.

Fal. And I hear, moreover, his highness is fallen into this same whoreson apoplexy.

Ch. Just. Well, heaven mend him! I pray let me speak with you.

Fal. This apoplexy is, as I take it, a kind of lethargy, a sleeping in the blood, a whoreson tingling.

Ch. Just. What tell you me of it? be it as it is.

Fal. It hath its original from much grief; from study, and perturbation of the brain: I have read the cause of his effects in Galen: it is a kind of deafness.

Ch. Just. I think you are fallen into the disease; for you hear not what I say to you.

RICHARD III.

Buck. My lord, I claim the gift, my due by promise,
For which your honour and your faith is pawn'd;
The earldom of Hereford, and the moveables,
Which you have promised I shall possess.

K. Rich. Stanley, look to your wife; if she convey
Letters to Richmond, you shall answer it.

Buck. What says your highness to my just request?

K. Rich. I do remember me,—Henry the Sixth
Did prophesy, that Richmond should be king,
When Richmond was a little peevish boy.
A king!—perhaps—

Buck. My lord,—

K. Rich. How chance, the prophet could not at that time,
Have told me, I being by, that I should kill him?

Buck. My lord, your promise for the earldom,—

K. Rich. Richmond!—When last I was at Exeter,
The mayor in courtesy show'd me the castle,
And called it Rouge-mont: at which name I started;
Because a bard of Ireland told me once
I should not live long after I saw Richmond.

Buck. My lord,—

K. Rich. Ay, what's o'clock?

Buck. I am thus bold to put your grace in mind
Of what you promised me.

K. Rich. Well, but what's o'clock?

Buck. Upon the stroke of ten.

K. Rich. Well, let it strike.

Falstaff, again, not unfrequently reminds us of Iago. We have already noticed this resemblance in one particular. The humorous rogue and the sarcastic villain are equally unscrupulous in their attacks upon the property of others. Falstaff making the Hostess withdraw the action, and lend him more money, and Iago's advice to Roderigo, "put money in thy purse," supply an obvious example. Falstaff, in his schemes upon Justice Shallow, hugs himself in the very philosophy of roguery: "If the young dace be a bait for the old pike, I see no reason in the law of nature, but I may snap at him." Iago thinks it would be a disgrace to his own intellectual superiority if he did not plunder his dupe:—

"Thus do I ever make my fool my purse:
For I mine own gain'd knowledge should profane,
If I would time expend with such a snipe,
But for my sport and profit."

Falstaff, however, is not all knave, as Richard and Iago are each all villain. Richard and Iago are creatures of antipathies; Falstaff is a creature of sympathies. There is something genial even in his knavery. With Dame Quickly and Doll, with Bardolph and the Page, his good humour is irresistible: his followers evidently love him. The Hostess speaks their thoughts:—"Well, fare thee well: I have known thee these twenty-nine years, come peascod-time; but an honest and truer-hearted man—Well, fare thee well." He extracts Shallow's money from his purse as much by his sociality as his cunning. Even the grave Lord Chief Justice is half moved to laugh at him and with him. We have already spoken of the fascination which he exercised over the mind of the prince; and even when Harry is in many respects a changed man—when he has shown us the heroic side of his character, we still learn that he has been "so much engrafted to Falstaff." The dominion which he exercised over all his associates he exercises over every reader of Shakspeare. We are never weary of him; we can never hate him; we doubt if we can despise him; we are half angry with the prince for casting him off; we are quite sure that there was no occasion to send him to the Fleet; when we hear, in Henry V., that the "king has killed his heart," we are certain that with all his selfishness there were many kind and loving feelings about that heart, which neglect and desertion would deeply touch; and when at last we see him, in poor Dame Quickly's description of his death-bed, "fumble with the sheets, and play with flowers, and smile upon his fingers' ends," we involuntarily exclaim, "Poor Jack, farewell!"

We must now recall the attention of our readers to the principle with which we set out,—that the great dramatic action of these plays is the change of character in the Prince of Wales. In the First Part we have seen his levities cast away, when his ambition called upon him to answer the reproofs of his father by heroic actions:—

"And in the closing of some glorious day,
Be bold to tell you that I am your son."

Years pass on after the battle of Shrewsbury; and the prince has not entirely cast aside his habits. The duty of meeting the insurrection under Scroop is not committed to him. We find him in London, playing the fool with the time, but yet "sad," looking forward to higher things: "let the end try the man." His sense of duty is, however, roused into instant action at the news from the north:—

"By heaven, Poins, I feel me much to blame,
So idly to profane the precious time;
When tempest of commotion, like the south,
Borne with black vapour, doth begin to melt,
And drop upon our bare unarmed heads.
Give me my sword and cloak:—Falstaff, good night."

The prince and Falstaff never again meet in fellowship. Falstaff goes to the wars; and he throws a spirit into those scenes of treachery and bloodshed, which we look for in vain amidst the policy of Westmoreland and the solemnity of John of Lancaster. In Falstaff and his recruits we see the under-current of all warfare—the things of common life that are mixed up with great and fearful events—the ludicrous by the side of the tragic. The scene of Falstaff choosing his recruits—the corruption of Bardolph—the defence of that corruption by his most impudent captain—the amazement of the justices,—the different tempers with which the recruits meet their lot,—furnish altogether one of the richest realities of this unequalled drama. We here see how war, and especially civil war, presses upon the comforts even of the lowliest: "my old dame will be undone now for one to do her husbandry." Is he who won the crown by civil tumult, and who wears it unasily as the consequence of his usurpation—is he happier than the peasant who is dragged from his hut to fight in a cause which he neither cares for nor understands? Beautifully has Shakspeare shown us what happiness Bolingbroke gained by the deposition of Richard:—

"How many thousand of my poorest subjects
Are at this hour asleep!—O sleep, O gentle sleep,
Nature's soft nurse, how have I frighted thee,
That thou no more wilt weigh my eyelids down,
And steep my senses in forgetfulness?"

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTICE.

Henry is a politic and wise king ; but he is a melancholy man. The conduct of the prince still lies heavy at his heart, and his grief in dread of the “ rotten times ” that would ensue when the prince’s riot hath no curb. The king, too, is “ much ill : ”—

“ Stretches itself beyond the hour of death,”

“ The incessant care and labour of his mind
Hath wrought the mure that should confine it in,
So thin, that life looks through, and will break out.”

We are approaching that final scene when the reformation of the prince is to be fully accomplished in the spectacle of his father’s death-bed. The king has swooned. The prince enters gaily—

“ How now ! rain within doors, and none abroad !
How doth the king ? ”

But his gaiety is presently subdued,—

“ I will sit and watch here by the king.

The French critic (a very unfit representative of the present state of opinion in France as to the merits of Shakspeare) gives us the following most egregious description of the scene which follows :—“ The king wakes. He calls out—misses his crown—commands the prince to come to him—and overwhelms him with reproaches for that impatience to seize upon his inheritance, which will not wait even till his father’s body is cold. Henry, with an hypocrisy worse than the action which he would defend, pretends only to have taken away the crown through indignation that it had shortened the days of his father ! ” This is to read poetry in a literal spirit. We commend the fourth scene of the fourth act (Part II.) to our readers, without another remark that may weaken the force of M. Paul Dupont’s objections.

Through that great trial which has for awhile softened and purified the hearts of most men—the death of a father—has Henry passed. But he has also put on the state of a king. He has done so amidst the remembrances and fears of his brothers and advisers :—

“ You all look strangely on me.”

The scene with the Lord Chief Justice ensues—written with all Shakspeare’s rhetorical power. Henry has solemnly taken up his position :—

“ The tide of blood in me
Hath proudly flow’d in vanity till now :
Now doth it turn, and ebb back to the sea.”

It is in this solemn assurance, publicly made upon the first occasion of meeting his subjects, that we must rest the absolute and inevitable necessity of Henry’s harshness to Falstaff. The poet has most skilfully contrived to bring out the worst parts of Falstaff’s character, when he learns the death of Henry IV.—his presumption—his rapacity—his evil determinations : “ Let us take any man’s horses ; —the laws of England are at my commandment. Happy are they which have been my friends ; and woe to my Lord Chief Justice.” When he plants himself in the way of the coronation procession to “ leer ” upon the king—when he exclaims, “ God save thy grace, king Hal,”—Henry was compelled to assert his consistency by his severity. Warburton has truly observed that in his homily to Falstaff, Henry makes a trip, and is sliding into his old habit of laughing at Falstaff’s bulk :—

“ Know, the grave doth gape
For thee thrice wider than for other men.”

He saw the rising smile and the smothered retort upon Falstaff’s lip, and he checks him with—

“ Reply not to me with a fool-born jest ;
Presume not that I am the thing I was.”

The very struggle, in this moment of trial, which the king had between his old habits and affections, and his new duties, demands this harshness. We understand from Prince John, that though Falstaff is taken to the Fleet, he is not to be utterly deserted

‘ He hath intent his wonted followers
Shall all be very well provided for ;
But all are banish’d till their conversations
Appear more wise and modest to the world.”

The dramatic action is complete. Henry of Monmouth has passed through the dangerous trial of learning the great lessons of humanity amidst men with whom his follies made him an equal. The stains of this contact were on the surface. His heart was first elevated by ambition—then purified by sorrow—and so “ Consideration like an angel came,

And whipp’d th’ offending Adam out of him.”

KING HENRY V.

INTRODUCTORY NOTICE.

STATE OF THE TEXT, AND CHRONOLOGY, OF KING HENRY V.

HENRY V. was first printed in 1600, under the following title:—“The Chronicle History of Henry the Fifth, with his battell fought at Agin Court in France. Together with auntient Pistoll. As it hath bene sundry times played by the Right Honourable the Lord Chamberlaine his Servants. London printed by Thomas Creede for Thomas Millington and John Busby.” This copy, which differs most materially from the text of the folio, was reprinted in 1602, and again in 1608.

We have pointed out, in our foot-notes, the more important additions which the folio copy contains, as compared with the quartos. The reprint of the quarto of 1608, in Steevens's collection of twenty plays, runs only to 1,800 lines; whilst the lines in the folio edition amount to 3,500. Not only is the play thus augmented by the additions of the choruses and new scenes, but there is scarcely a speech, from the first scene to the last, which is not elaborated. In this elaboration the old materials are very carefully used up; but they are so thoroughly refitted and dovetailed with what is new, that the operation can only be compared to the work of a skilful architect, who, having an ancient mansion to enlarge and beautify, with a strict regard to its original character, preserves every feature of the structure, under other combinations, with such marvellous skill, that no unity of principle is violated, and the whole has the effect of a restoration in which the new and the old are undistinguishable. Unless we were to reprint the original copy, page by page, with the present text, it would be impossible to convey a satisfactory notion of the exceeding care with which this play has been recast. The alterations are so manifestly those of the author working upon his first sketch, that we are utterly at a loss to conceive upon what principle some of our editorial predecessors have reconciled the differences upon the easy theory of a surreptitious copy. Malone, for example, says “The fair inference to be drawn from the imperfect and mutilated copies of this play, published in 1600, 1602, and 1608, is, not that the whole play, as we now have it, did not then exist, but that those copies were surreptitious; and that the editor in 1600, not being able to publish the whole, published what he could.” Again, Malone says “The quarto copy of this play is manifestly an imperfect transcript procured by some fraud, and not a first draught or hasty sketch of Shakspeare's. The choruses, which are wanting in it, and which must have been written in 1599, before the quarto was printed, prove this.” Now, to our minds, the choruses and all the other passages not found in the quarto prove precisely the contrary. The theory of Steevens as to the cause of the difference of the two copies is this:—“The elder was, perhaps, taken down, during the representation, by the contrivance of some bookseller, who was in haste to publish it; or it might, with equal probability, have been collected from the repetitions of actors invited to a tavern for that purpose.

The second and more ample edition (in the folio, 1623), may be that which regularly belonged to the play-house.” Admitting this theory to be correct (and it is certainly neither improbable nor impossible), why, we would ask, could not we have had from the copy of the amanuensis, or the recitation of the actor, something of the choruses, however mutilated and imperfect? But of these the quarto copies present us not a line. Why not, also, the first scene between the two bishops; the scene between Macmorris and Jamy; the speech of Henry before Harfleur; and his solemn address after the interview with the soldiers,—of which the quartos present us not a line? It would have been quite as easy for the bookseller's man to have taken down, or the player at the tavern to have recited, these parts of the play, as well as those which the quartos do present to us. Why, upon such a theory, was the editor not able to publish the whole, and published only what he could?

A passage in the chorus to the fifth act proves, beyond doubt, that the choruses formed a part of the performance in 1599; but it does not prove that there was not an earlier performance without the choruses. The first quarto was printed in 1600, after the choruses were brought upon the stage; but because they are not found in that first quarto, it is asserted that the copy from which that edition was printed was “not a first draught or hasty sketch.” Malone and Steevens appear to us to have fallen into the mistake that a copy could not, at one and the same time, be a piracy and a sketch. According to their theory, if it is procured by fraud it must be an “imperfect transcript.” Is it not much more easy to believe that, after a play had been thoroughly remodelled, the original sketch which existed in some playhouse copy might be printed without authority, and continue so to be printed, rather than that an imperfect transcript should be printed, and continue to be printed, in which the most striking and characteristic passages of the play were omitted? But the question of “imperfect transcript” or “hasty sketch” may, to our minds, be at once disposed of by internal evidence. We have, therefore, given in our foot-notes various passages from the quarto of 1608, which our readers may compare with the parallel passages as we print them from the text of the folio.

Our belief then is, that the original quarto of 1600 was printed after the play had appeared in its amended and corrected form, such as we have received it from the folio of 1623; but that this quarto and the subsequent quartos were copies of a much shorter play, which had been previously produced, and, perhaps, hastily written for some temporary occasion. We further believe that the text of these quartos was surreptitiously obtained from the early playhouse copy, and continued through three editions to be palmed upon the public—the author and his co-proprietors in the Globe Theatre not choosing, as we shall subsequently show, that the amended copy should be published.

The single passage in the play which furnishes any evidence as to its date is found in the chorus of the fifth act:—

“Were now the general of our gracious empress
(As, in good time, he may,) from Ireland coming,
Bringing rebellion broached on his sword,
How many would the peaceful city quit,
To welcome him?”

The allusion cannot be mistaken. “About the end of March” (1599), says Camden, “the Earl of Essex set forward for Ireland, and was accompanied out of London with a fine appearance of nobility, and gentry, and the most cheerful huzzas of the common people.” Essex returned to London on the 28th of September of the same year. This play, then, with the choruses, must have been performed in the summer of 1599. Without the choruses there is nothing to show that it might not have been performed earlier.

INTRODUCTORY NOTICE.

Francis Meres, however, does not mention it in his list of 1598. We know from the epilogue to the Second Part of Henry IV. that Henry V. followed that play; and we consider that as it stands in the quartos, it was somewhat hastily written, that the pledge might be redeemed which was given in that epilogue,—“our humble author will continue the story.”

The old play of “The Famous Victories of Henry the Fifth,” which we have fully noticed in the Introduction to Henry IV., presents us with the battle of Agincourt, and some scenes between Henry and Katharine; but, amongst the rude and undramatic dialogues of this play, we can find no passage which offers the slightest resemblance to Shakspeare, excepting the following:—

“Henry V. What castle is this, so neer adjoining to our camp?
Herald. And it please your majestie,
 ’Tis call’d the Castle of Agincourt.
King. Well then, my lords of England,
 For the more honour of our Englishmen,
 I will that this be for ever call’d the battle of Agincourt.”

In the fifth act of Shakspeare’s play Katharine says to Henry, “Is it possible dat I should love the enemy of France?” In “The Famous Victories” she says, “How should I love thee, which is my father’s enemy?”

In calling attention to the variations between the text of the quarto editions of this play, and of the folio, it may be well for us here to express our opinion as to the question which must arise in this and in other cases, whether the quarto editions published before the folio of 1623 were issued with Shakspeare’s authority or sanction, either direct or delegated. We have taken some pains to investigate this subject with reference to all the plays (fifteen in number) published before the folio of 1623; and we have come to the conclusion that, with five exceptions, all these plays were published upon some distinct arrangement either with the author, or with the proprietors of the theatres to whom the copies were delivered by the author; and that, with these exceptions, the common belief that they were furnished clandestinely to the publishers by persons connected with the theatres, or published from a shorthand copy, has no foundation. The question involves some very interesting circumstances, and we therefore make no apology for discussing it at some length.

As a foundation for our inquiry we will present our readers with a tabular arrangement of all the plays published before the folio of 1623, according to the date of their publication, with the dates of their entries at Stationers’ Hall, and the names of the first publishers. In this statement we propose to omit all consideration of the doubtful plays of Pericles and Titus Andronicus, and of the Three Parts of Henry VI.

Name of Play published in Quarto.	Date of First Edition.	Date of entry at Stationers’ Hall.	Publishers’ Names.
1. Richard II.	1597	1597	Andrew Wise.
2. Richard III.	1597	1597	William Wise.
3. Romeo and Juliet	1597		(No publisher’s name.)
Ditto, “corrected and augmented”	1599		Cuthbert Burby.
4. Love’s Labour’s Lost	1598		Cuthbert Burby.
5. Henry IV., Part I.	1598	1597	Andrew Wise.
6. Henry IV., Part II.	1600	1600	Andrew Wise and Wm. Apsley.
7. Merchant of Venice	1600	1598	Thomas Heyes.
8. Midsummer Night’s Dream	1600	1600	Thomas Fisher.
9. Much Ado about Nothing	1600	1600	A. Wise and W. Apsley.
10. Henry V.	1600	1600	Thos. Millington & John Busby.
11. Merry Wives of Windsor	1602	1601	Arthur Johnson.
12. Hamlet	1603	1602	N. L. and John Trundell.
Ditto, “enlarged to almost as much again as it was”	1604	..	N. Landure.
13. Lear	1608	1607	Nat. Butter.
14. Troilus and Cressida	1609	1608	R. Bonian and H. Walley.
15. Othello	1622	1621	Thomas Walkley.

* We are indebted for several valuable suggestions connected with this inquiry to the late Mr. Thomas Rodd, who united to the most accurate professional knowledge as a bookseller, an intimate acquaintance with our early literature, and with that of the times of Shakspeare especially.

The editors of the first folio, in their preface, use these words: “Before, you were abused with divers stolen and surreptitious copies, maimed and deformed by the frauds and stealths of injurious impostors that exposed them.” It is necessary that we should examine to which of the fifteen plays published before the folio this strong charge applies. It has been thought to involve a sweeping condemnation of all the previous editions; but this is not so: it applies only to “divers stolen and surreptitious copies.” We believe that it does not apply to the first nine of the plays included in the list which we have just given. Upon the quarto editions of those plays, the text of the folio, with slight alterations, is unquestionably founded.† Verbal corrections, and in one or two cases additions and omissions, are found in the folio; but they are only such as an author, having his printed works before him during at least sixteen years, would naturally make. The most considerable additions are to the Second Part of Henry IV.—These nine plays do not furnish the slightest internal evidence of appearing to be printed from an imperfect copy. Further, in seven out of the nine cases, the proprietary interest of the original publishers of these plays never lapses. Andrew and William Wise, in connection with William Apsley, are the original publishers of Richard II., Richard III., the Two Parts of Henry IV., and Much Ado about Nothing; they, and their assign or partner, Matthew Law, print many editions of the historical plays, from 1597 to 1622; and then Apsley becomes a proprietor of the folio, to which his name is affixed as one of the publishers. Cuthbert Burby is the original publisher of the “augmented” Romeo and Juliet, and of Love’s Labour’s Lost; in 1607 he assigns his interest to John Smethwick: they publish several editions of Romeo and Juliet, from 1599 to 1609; and Smethwick finally becomes a proprietor also of the folio of 1623. With regard to The Merchant of Venice and Midsummer Night’s Dream, we cannot trace the proprietary interest of their original publishers down to the publication of the folio by any entries in the books of the Stationers’ Company.‡ Of each of these plays there were also editions in 1600, but none after—one of each bearing the name of a publisher, and the other of a printer, J. Roberts.

The tenth and eleventh plays on our list—Henry V. and The Merry Wives of Windsor—we have no doubt were piracies:—they distinctly belong to the class of “stolen and surreptitious copies.” We have already pointed out the vast additions which we find in the folio copy of Henry V.—all the choruses, the whole of the first scene of Act I., and some of the most spirited speeches. The entire play is indeed recast; and yet, although it is perfectly evident, from the allusion to Essex in the chorus to the fifth act, that the choruses were introduced in 1599, they appear not in the first edition of 1600, nor in the second of 1602, nor in the third of 1608. There can be no question, we think, that the original play of Henry V., as exhibited in these quartos, was a hasty sketch, afterwards worked up into the perfect form in which we now find it; that the piratical publishers had obtained a copy of that sketch, but that they were effectually prevented obtaining a copy with the additions and amendments. This play was entered at Stationers’ Hall, by Thomas Pavier, in 1600; was published in its imperfect state by Thomas Millington and John Busby in that year; and subsequently twice republished by Thomas Pavier. This Thomas Pavier published no other of Shakspeare’s plays; but it is remarkable that he published, as Shakspeare’s, “Sir John Oldcastle” and the Yorkshire tragedy; and he also published, in 1619, “The whole Contention between the two famous Houses, Lancaster and York”—as “written by William Shakespeare,”—but which edition does not contain our poet’s supposed improvements in the Second and Third Parts of Henry VI., which first appeared in the folio. The Merry Wives of Windsor stands precisely on the same ground. The first edition of Arthur Johnson in 1602, and a subsequent edition of 1619, present only the sketch of the play as we now have it from the folio. The improvements and additions in this case are as numerous and important as in the Henry V. But they were never suffered to be published till they appeared in the folio. Busby, who appears as one of the publishers of the first Henry V., is the person who first enters The Merry Wives of Windsor at Stationers' Hall. He was probably the jackal who pointed out what was worth preying upon. We find him entering Lear in 1607—of which presently.

† We of course speak of the “corrected and augmented” edition of Romeo and Juliet.

‡ The books of the Stationers’ Company were examined by Steevens, and he transcribed and published all the entries which could bear upon the works of Shakspeare; but he made no deductions from the facts.

Hamlet differs from the two preceding instances, from a genuine copy having been brought out immediately after the appearance of what was most probably a piratical one. The unique first edition in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire (reprinted in 1825) is, like Henry V. and The Merry Wives of Windsor, a sketch as compared with the finished play. It was published by N. L. (Nicholas Ling) and John Trundell, in 1603; but in 1604 an edition was published by N. Landure, "newly imprinted and enlarged to almost as much againe as it was, according to the true and perfect coppie." This is the play, with very slight variations, as we now possess it; and this edition was reprinted four times in Shakspeare's life, having become the property of John Smethwick, who, as we have mentioned, became one of the publishers of the folio.

Lear was published by Nathaniel Butter in 1608, and in that year he produced three editions. It was in all likelihood piratical, and was probably suppressed, for no future edition appears till that of the folio, while Hamlet, and Romeo and Juliet, are constantly reprinted. Butter was undoubtedly not a publisher authorised by Shakspeare; for he printed, in 1605, "The London Prodigal"—one of the plays fraudulently ascribed to our poet. Butter's edition of Lear is, however, a correct one. He must have had a genuine copy.

Troilus and Cressida, published by R. Bonian and H. Walley, in 1609, though a genuine copy, is an acknowledged piracy.

Othello, published in 1622, is a genuine copy. It was probably authorised by the possessors of the copy after Shakspeare's death.

On the publication of the folio of 1623, the publishers of that collected edition entered in the books of the Stationers' Company their claim to "Mr. William Shakespeare's Comedies, Histories, and Tragedies, so many of the said copies as are not formerly entered to other men," viz. :—

COMEDIES.	{	The Tempest. Two Gentlemen of Verona. Measure for Measure. Comedy of Errors. As You Like It. All's Well that Ends Well. Twelfth Night. The Winter's Tale.
HISTORIES.	{	Third Part of Henry VI. Henry VIII.
TRAGEDIES.	{	Coriolanus. Timon of Athens. Julius Cæsar. Macbeth. Antony and Cleopatra. Cymbeline.

In the above list of plays then unpublished, which should also have included Taming of the Shrew and King John, we have only three mentioned which were unquestionably written before 1603, the date of the publication of Hamlet, viz.—The Two Gentlemen of Verona, Comedy of Errors, and Henry VI., Part III. We would ask, then, is it not in the highest degree remarkable that of the plays which were written by Shakspeare after 1603, only two (Lear, and Troilus and Cressida) were published during his lifetime; while of all the undoubted plays written before 1603, only three (Two Gentlemen of Verona, Comedy of Errors, King John) were not published? Could this be accident? Malone assigns as a reason for this remarkable circumstance that "if we suppose him to have written for the stage during a period of twenty years, those pieces which were produced in the latter part of that period were less likely to pass through the press in his lifetime, as the curiosity of the public had not been so long engaged by them as by his early compositions." This reasoning is singularly erroneous. We see by the tabular list that not a single play was printed before 1597, although in 1598, according to Meres's list, Shakspeare had produced at least eleven plays;—that three were printed in 1597, two in 1598, five in 1600, only one in 1602, and only one in 1603. What does this circumstance show but that his reputation had become so great in 1600, that all the plays he had then written were published, except three; and that the public demand was so considerable that five distinct plays were published in one year? Further, nearly all these plays then first published were reprinted again and again before the poet's death. Of Richard II. there are four quarto editions; of Richard III., four; of Romeo and Juliet, four; of Henry IV., Part I., five; of Henry IV., Part II., two; of Henry V., three; of The Merchant of Venice, two; of Midsummer Night's Dream, two; of The Merry Wives, two; of Hamlet, five. Here was abundant encouragement to publish the more important plays which were written after 1603—the masterpieces of the great author. Why, then, were they not published? The preface to the "stolen" Troilus and Cressida gives the explanation. The copy of that play is acknowledged by the editor to have been obtained by some artifice. He says in his preface, "Thank fortune for the scape it hath made amongst you; since, by the grand possessors' wills, I believe you should have pray'd for them rather than been pray'd." It is difficult to understand this clearly; but we learn that the copy had an escape from some powerful possessors. It appears to us that these possessors were powerful enough to prevent a single copy of any one of the plays which Shakspeare produced in his "noon of fame," with the exception of Troilus and Cressida, and Lear, being printed till after his death; and that between his death in 1616, and the publication of the folio of 1623, they continued the exercise of their power, so as to allow only one edition of one play, which had not been printed in his lifetime (Othello), to appear. The clear deduction from this statement of facts is, that the original publication of the fourteen plays published in Shakspeare's lifetime was, with the exceptions we have pointed out, authorised by some power having the right to prevent the publication;—that after 1603 till the publication of the folio, that right was not infringed or conceded, except in three instances. Is it not clear that all this was the effect of arrangement; that up to 1603 the consent to publish was given;—and that after 1603, till 1623, it was withheld effectually, except in three solitary instances, one of which is an undoubted piracy? What are we to infer? Our belief is that the poet derived a profit from the publication of his works from 1597 till 1603; but that he then made an arrangement with the "grand possessors," the proprietors of the Globe Theatre (of which he himself was one of the chief proprietors), by which he relinquished this profit to give them an absolute monopoly in his later and most important productions.

COSTUME.

The civil costume of the reign of Henry V. seems to have differed in no very material degree from that of the reigns of Henry IV. and Richard II.

The illuminated MSS. and other authorities of this period present us with the same long and short gowns, each with extravagantly large sleeves, almost trailing on the ground, and scalloped at the edges. They are generally at this period, however, painted of a different colour from the body of the garment, and were probably separate articles of dress (as we find them in the next century), to be changed at pleasure. Chaperons with long tippets, tights, hose, and pointed shoes or half-boots.

For the dress of the sovereign himself we have but slender authority. His mutilated effigy in Westminster Abbey represents him in the dalmatic, cope, and mantle of royalty, differing only from those of preceding sovereigns in their lack of all ornaments or embroidery. An illuminated MS. in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, has a representation of Henry seated on his throne (which is powdered with the letter S.), not in his robes, although crowned, but in a dress of the time, with a curious girdle and collar. There are two or three portraits of Henry, on wood, in the royal and other collections, each bearing a suspicious likeness to the other, and neither authenticated, although from one of them Mr. Vertue copied the head engraved for the History of England, and which has been received as the likeness of Henry from that period.

From an anecdote in Monstrelet's Chronicles it would seem that one peculiarity of Henry's ordinary attire was, his attachment to the half-boots we have mentioned as in fashion at this time.

In the old English poem on the Siege of Rouen, A.D. 1418, Henry is described as dressed in black damask, with a peytrelle (poitral) of gold hanging about his neck, a rich collar, probably such as he is represented with in the illumination above mentioned, and which might very properly be called a "poitral," from its similarity to the ornamental piece of horse-furniture so named at this period.

A "pendaunte" is said also to have hung behind him down to the earth, "it was so long;" but whether the author meant by that any ornament of his dress, or a "pennon," or streamer, carried behind him, is not clear. In favour of the former supposition, however, we find that, a few years later (A.D. 1432), the Lord Mayor of London is described as wearing "a baldrick of gold about his neck, trailing down behind."

The great characteristic of this reign is the close-cropping of the hair round above the ears, in contradistinction to the fashion of the last century, and the equally close shaving of the chin—beards being worn only by aged personages, and moustaches but rarely, even by military men: the king is always represented without them.

Of the Dukes of Gloster and Bedford, and the Earl of Warwick, the representations that exist are of a later date.

Of the Duke of Exeter (Thomas Beaufort, son of John of Gaunt) and the Duke of York (the Aumerle of Richard II.), we know no representation.

In the armour of this period there are many and striking novelties. It was completely of plate. Even the camail, or chain neck-piece, was superseded or covered by the gorget, or hausse col of steel. A fine specimen of the armour of this time exists on the effigy of Michael de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk (who was killed at the siege of Harfleur), in Wingfield Church, Suffolk.

The jupon, with its military girdle, and the loose surcoat of arms, were both occasionally worn, and in many instances were furnished with long hanging sleeves, indented at the edges like those of the robes. Sometimes the sleeves only are seen with the armour; and it is then difficult to ascertain whether, in that case, the breast and back plates cover the rest of the garment, or whether they (the sleeves) are separate articles fastened to the shoulders. Cloaks, with scalloped edges, were also worn with armour at this period. Two circular or shield-shaped plates, called pallettes, were sometimes fastened in front by aiguillettes, so as to protect the armpits. St. Remy, a writer who was present at the battle of Agincourt, describes Henry, at break of day, hearing mass in all his armour, excepting that for his head and his cote d'armes (i.e. emblazoned surcoat or jupon). After mass had been said, they brought him the armour for his head, which was a very handsome bascinet à barriere (query baviere), upon which he had a very rich crown of gold (a description and valuation of "la couronne d'Or pur le Bacinet," garnished with rubies, sapphires, and pearls, to the amount of £679 5s., is to be seen in the Rolls of Parliament, vol. iv. p. 215), circled like an imperial crown (query arched). Henry IV. is said, by Froissart, to have been crowned with a diadem "archée en croix," the earliest mention of an arched crown in England that we have met with).

Elmham, another contemporary historian, says, "Now the king was clad in secure and very bright armour: he wore, also, on his head, a helmet, with a large splendid crest, and a crown of gold and jewels; and, on his body, a surcoat with the arms of England and France, from which a celestial splendour issued; on the one side, from three golden flowers, planted in an azure-field (Henry V. altered the arms of France, in the English shield, from semi of fleurs-de-lys to three fleurs-de-lys, Charles VI. of France having done so previously), on the other, from three golden leopards sporting in a ruby field." By a large splendid crest may be meant, either the royal heraldic crest of England, the lion passant guardant, or a magnificent plume of feathers,—that elegant and chivalric decoration, for the first time after the Conquest, appearing in this reign. It was called the panache; and knights are said to have worn three or more feathers, esquires only one: but we have no positive authority for the latter assertion, and the number would seem to have been a matter of fancy. Robert Chamberlayne, the king's esquire, is represented with two feathers issuing from the apex of the bascinet. He wears an embroidered jupon and the military belt. With respect to the crown round Henry's bascinet, it was twice struck and injured by the blows of his enemies. The Duke of Alençon struck off part of it with his battle-axe; and one of the points or flowers was cut off by a French esquire, who, with seventeen others, swore to perform some such feat, or perish.

The helmet of Henry V., suspended over his tomb in Westminster Abbey, is a tilting helmet—not the bascinet à baviere (visored or beavered bascinet), which was the war-helmet of the time. The shield and saddle which hang near it may, according to the tradition, have been really used by him at Agincourt.

The English archers at the battle of Agincourt were, for the most part (according to Monstrelet), without armour, and in jackets, with their hose loose, and hatchets, or swords, hanging to their girdles. Some, indeed, were barefooted, and without hats or caps; and St. Remy says they were dressed in pourpoints (stitched or quilted jackets), and adds that some wore caps of boiled leather (the famous cuir bouilli), or of wicker-work, crossed over with iron. In the army of Henry V. at Rouen there were several bodies of Irish, of whom, says Monstrelet, the greatest part had one leg and foot quite naked. They were armed with targets, short javelins, and a strange sort of knife (the skein).

The French men-at-arms engaged at Agincourt are described as being armed in long coats of steel reaching to their knees (the taces introduced at this period), below which was armour for their legs, and above, white harness (i.e. armour of polished plate, so called in contradistinction to mail), and bascinets with camails (chain neck-pieces).

The banners borne in the English army, besides those of the king and the principal leaders, were, as usual, those of St. George, St. Edward, and the Trinity.

The French, in addition to the royal and knightly banners, displayed the oriflamme, which was of bright scarlet, embroidered with gold, and terminating in several swallow tails. It is so represented in the hands of Henri Seigneur de Metz, Maréchal de France, in the church of Notre Dame de Chartres.

The female costume of this period was disfigured by a most extravagantly high and projecting horned head-dress, curious examples of which are to be seen in the royal MS. marked 15 D. 3, and in the effigy of Beatrice, Countess of Arundel, engraved in Stothard's "Monumental Effigies." The rest of the habit was rather graceful than otherwise; consisting, in general, of a long and full robe confined by a rich girdle, high in the neck, the waist moderately short, and the sleeves, like those of the men, reaching almost to the ground, and scalloped at the edges.

A representation of Katharine, Queen of England, exists in the carving of an oak chest in the Treasury of York Cathedral.

Isabelle of Bavaria, her mother, is engraved in Montfaucon, from a MS. in the French Royal Library, wearing the high, heart-shaped head-dress, introduced into England in the reign of Henry VI., but probably worn earlier in France. There are several other portraits of her in the steeple head-dress, a still later fashion, contemporary in England with the reign of Edward IV.

ACT I.

CHORUS.

O for a muse of fire, that would ascend
The brightest heaven of invention!
A kingdom for a stage, princes to act,
And monarchs to behold the swelling scene!
Then should the warlike Harry, like himself,
Assume the port of Mars; and, at his heels,
Leash'd in like hounds, should famine, sword, and fire,

Crouch for employment.<sup>a</sup> But pardon, gentles all,
The flat unraised spirit, that hath dared,
On this unworthy scaffold to bring forth
So great an object: Can this cockpit hold
The vasty fields of France? or may we cram
Within this wooden O the very casques
That did affright the air at Agincourt?<sup>b</sup>
O, pardon! since a crooked figure may
Attest, in little place, a million;
And let us, ciphers to this great accompt,
On your imaginary forces work:
Suppose, within the girdle of these walls
Are now confin'd two mighty monarchies,
Whose high upreared and abutting fronts
The perilous, narrow ocean parts asunder.
Piece out our imperfections with your thoughts;
Into a thousand parts divide one man,
And make imaginary puissance:
Think, when we talk of horses, that you see them
Printing their proud hoofs i' the receiving earth:
For 'tis your thoughts that now must deck our kings,
Carry them here and there; jumping o'er times;
Turning the accomplishment of many years
Into an hour-glass; For the which supply,
Admit me chorus to this history;
Who, prologue-like, your humble patience pray,
Gently to hear, kindly to judge, our play.<sup>1</sup>

SCENE I.—London. An Ante-chamber in the King's Palace.

Enter the ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, and BISHOP OF ELY.

Cant. My lord, I'll tell you,—that self bill is urg'd,
Which, in the eleventh year o' the last king's reign,
Was like, and had indeed against us pass'd,
But that the scrambling<sup>2</sup> and unquiet time
Did push it out of further question.

Ely. But how, my lord, shall we resist it now

Cant. It must be thought on. If it pass against us,
We lose the better half of our possession:
For all the temporal lands, which men devout
By testament have given to the church,
Would they strip from us; being valued thus,—
As much as would maintain, to the king's honour,
Full fifteen earls, and fifteen hundred knights;
Six thousand and two hundred good esquires;
And, to relief of lazars, and weak age,
Of indigent faint souls, past corporal toil,
A hundred alms-houses, right well supplied;
And to the coffers of the king beside
A thousand pounds by the year: Thus runs the bill.

Ely. This would drink deep.

Cant. 'Twould drink the cup and all.

Ely. But what prevention?

Cant. The king is full of grace and fair regard.

Ely. And a true lover of the holy church.

Cant. The courses of his youth promis'd it not.
The breath no sooner left his father's body,
But that his wildness, mortified in him,
Seem'd to die too: yea, at that very moment,
Consideration like an angel came,
And whipp'd the offending Adam out of him;
Leaving his body as a paradise,
To envelop and contain celestial spirits.
Never was such a sudden scholar made:
Never came reformation in a flood,

<sup>2</sup> Scrambling. Percy thinks that to scamble and to scramble are synonymous. The "scrambling time" is the disorderly time in which authority is unrespected.

With such a heady currance,<sup>1</sup> scouring faults ;
Nor never Hydra-headed wilfulness
So soon did lose his seat, and all at once,
As in this king.

Ely. We are blessed in the change.

Cant. Hear him but reason in divinity,<sup>2</sup>
And, all-admiring, with an inward wish
You would desire the king were made a prelate :
Hear him debate of commonwealth affairs,
You would say it hath been all-in-all his study :
List his discourse of war, and you shall hear
A fearful battle render'd you in music :
Turn him to any cause of policy,
The Gordian knot of it he will unloose,
Familiar as his garter ; that, when he speaks,
The air, a charter'd libertine, is still,
And the mute wonder lurketh in men's ears,
To steal his sweet and honey'd sentences ;
So that the art and practick part of life
Must be the mistress to this theorick :<sup>3</sup>
Which is a wonder, how his grace should glean it,
Since his addiction was to courses vain :
His companies<sup>3</sup> unletter'd, rude, and shallow ;
His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports ;
And never noted in him any study,
Any retirement, any sequestration
From open haunts and popularity.

Ely. The strawberry grows underneath the nettle ;
And wholesome berries thrive and ripen best
Neighbour'd by fruit of baser quality :
And so the prince obscur'd his contemplation
Under the veil of wildness ; which, no doubt,
Grew like the summer grass, fastest by night,
Unseen, yet cressive in his faculty.

Cant. It must be so ; for miracles are ceas'd ;
And therefore we must needs admit the means
How things are perfected.

Ely. But, my good lord,
How now for mitigation of this bill
Urg'd by the commons ? Doth his majesty
Incline to it, or no ?

Cant. He seems indifferent :
Or, rather, swaying more upon our part,
Than cherishing the exhibitors against us :
For I have made an offer to his majesty,—
Upon our spiritual convocation ;
And in regard of causes now in hand,
Which I have open'd to his grace at large,
As touching France,—to give a greater sum
Than ever at one time the clergy yet
Did to his predecessors part withal.

Ely. How did this offer seem receiv'd, my lord ?

Cant. With good acceptance of his majesty ;
Save, that there was not time enough to hear
(As I perceiv'd his grace would fain have done,)
The severals,<sup>4</sup> and unhidden passages,

Of his true titles to some certain dukedoms ;
And, generally, to the crown and seat of France,
Deriv'd from Edward, his great grandfather.

Ely. What was the impediment that broke this off ?

Cant. The French ambassador, upon that instant,
Crav'd audience : and the hour, I think, is come
To give him hearing : Is it four o'clock ?

Ely. It is.

Cant. Then we go in, to know his embassy ;
Which I could, with a ready guess, declare,
Before the Frenchman speak a word of it.

Ely. I'll wait upon you ; and I long to hear it.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The same. A Room of State in the same.

Enter KING HENRY, GLOSTER, BEDFORD, EXETER, WARWICK, WESTMORELAND, and Attendants.

K. Hen. Where is my gracious lord of Canterbury ?

Exe. Not here in presence.

K. Hen. Send for him, good uncle.<sup>5</sup>

West. Shall we call in the ambassador, my liege ?

K. Hen. Not yet, my cousin ; we would be resolv'd,
Before we hear him, of some things of weight
That task our thoughts, concerning us and France.

Enter the ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, and BISHOP OF ELY.

Cant. God and his angels guard your sacred throne,
And make you long become it !

K. Hen. Sure, we thank you.<sup>6</sup>

My learned lord, we pray you to proceed :
And justly and religiously unfold,
Why the law Salique, that they have in France,
Or should, or should not, bar us in our claim.
And God forbid, my dear and faithful lord,
That you should fashion, wrest, or bow your reading,
Or nicely charge your understanding soul
With opening titles miscreate,<sup>7</sup> whose right
Suits not in native colours with the truth ;
For God doth know, how many, now in health,
Shall drop their blood in approbation
Of what your reverence shall incite us to :
Therefore take heed how you impawn<sup>8</sup> our person,
How you awake our sleeping sword of war :
We charge you in the name of God, take heed :
For never two such kingdoms did contend
Without much fall of blood ; whose guiltless drops
Are every one a woe, a sore complaint,
'Gainst him whose wrongs give edge unto the swords
That make such waste in brief mortality.
Under this conjuration, speak, my lord :
For we will hear, note, and believe in heart,

<sup>1</sup> Currance. So the original folio. It was changed to currant in the second and third folios, and to current in the fourth folio. If it be necessary to modernise Shakspeare's phraseology, the correction was right ; but currance is the French courance, from which we have compounded concurrance and occurrence.
<sup>2</sup> Theorick. Malone says, "In our author's time this word was always used where we now use theory." Shakspeare, indeed, never uses theory, although he has theorick in two other passages. In All's Well we have "the theorick of war ;" in Othello, "the bookish theorick." The word was occasionally used as late as in the time of the Tatler ; but in Bishop Hall, a contemporary of Shakspeare, we find theory, and in Fuller's "Worthies" both theory and theorick.
<sup>6</sup> The differences in the text of the folio and the quarto editions are so numerous, and so minute, that it would be impossible for us to attempt to follow them, beyond indicating the principal omissions. We shall, however, occasionally give a passage to show the exceeding care with which the later copy was worked up. This speech of the king is the first example that presents itself. In the quartos we have merely—

<sup>8</sup> Impawn. A pawn and a gage are the same. In Richard II. we have, "take up mine honour's pawn." To "impawn our person" is equivalent, therefore, to engage our person.

That what you speak is in your conscience wash'd
As pure as sin with baptism.

Cant. Then hear me, gracious sovereign; and you peers
That owe yourselves, your lives, and services,<sup>1</sup>
To this imperial throne:—There is no bar
To make against your highness' claim to France,
But this, which they produce from Pharamond,—
“In terram Salicam mulieres ne succedant,”
“No woman shall succeed in Salique land:”
Which Salique land the French unjustly gloze<sup>2</sup>
To be the realm of France, and Pharamond
The founder of this law and female bar.
Yet their own authors faithfully affirm
That the land Salique is in Germany,
Between the floods of Sala and of Elbe:
Where Charles the Great, having subdued the Saxons,
There left behind and settled certain French;
Who, holding in disdain the German women,
For some dishonest<sup>3</sup> manners of their life,
Establish'd then this law,—to wit, no female
Should be inheretrix in Salique land;
Which Salique, as I said, 'twixt Elbe and Sala,
Is at this day in Germany call'd Meisen.
Then doth it well appear, the Salique law
Was not devised for the realm of France;
Nor did the French possess the Salique land
Until four hundred one and twenty years
After defunction of king Pharamond,
Idly suppos'd the founder of this law;
Who died within the year of our redemption
Four hundred twenty-six; and Charles the Great Subdued the Saxons, and did seat the French
Beyond the river Sala, in the year
Eight hundred five. Besides, their writers say,
King Pepin, which deposed Childerick,
Did, as heir general, being descended
Of Blithild, which was daughter to king Clothair,
Make claim and title to the crown of France.
Hugh Capet also,—who usurp'd the crown
Of Charles the duke of Loraine, sole heir male
Of the true line and stock of Charles the Great,—
To find his title,<sup>4</sup> with some shows of truth,
(Though, in pure truth, it was corrupt and naught,)
Convey'd himself as th' heir to th' lady Lingare,
Daughter to Charlemain, who was the son
To Lewis the emperor, and Lewis the son
Of Charles the Great: Also king Lewis the Tenth,<sup>5</sup>
Who was sole heir to the usurper Capet,
Could not keep quiet in his conscience,
Wearing the crown of France, till satisfied
That fair queen Isabel, his grandmother,
Was lineal of the lady Ermengare,

We, of course, copy the folio; but we ask upon what principle the earlier modern editors arbitrarily made up a text out of the first imperfect copy engrafted upon the second complete one? In this single scene we have a dozen such substitutions,—some trifling, indeed, such as and instead of for, the instead of our, that instead of who,—but still unauthorised. We shall, in most cases, silently restore the true reading.

<sup>4</sup> To find his title. The quarto reads, “to fine his title,” which has been adopted by most modern editors. Warburton says, to fine is to refine. Johnson would read to line. The reading of the folio, find, requires little defence. We have an analogous expression, to find a bill. Hugh Capet, to deduce a title, conveyed himself, &c.

<sup>6</sup> Imbar. The folio gives this word imbarre, which some modern editors, upon the authority of Theobald, have changed into imbare. Rowe, somewhat more boldly, reads make bare. There can be no doubt, we think, that imbar is the Daughter to Charles the foresaid duke of Loraine:

By the which marriage, the line of Charles the Great
Was re-united to the crown of France.
So that, as clear as is the summer's sun,
King Pepin's title, and Hugh Capet's claim,
King Lewis his satisfaction, all appear
To hold in right and title of the female;
So do the kings of France unto this day:
Howbeit they would hold up this Salique law,
To bar your highness claiming from the female;
And rather choose to hide them in a net,
Than amply to imbar<sup>6</sup> their crooked titles
Usurp'd from you and your progenitors.

K. Hen. May I, with right and conscience, make this claim?

Cant. The sin upon my head, dread sovereign!
For in the book of Numbers is it writ,—
When the man<sup>7</sup> dies, let the inheritance
Descend unto the daughter. Gracious lord,
Stand for your own; unwind your bloody flag;
Look back into your mighty ancestors:
Go, my dread lord, to your great grandsire's tomb,
From whom you claim; invoke his warlike spirit,
And your great uncle's, Edward the black prince;
Who on the French ground play'd a tragedy,
Making defeat on the full power of France;
Whiles his most mighty father on a hill
Stood smiling, to behold his lion's whelp
Forage in blood of French nobility.

O noble English, that could entertain
With half their forces the full pride of France;
And let another half stand laughing by,
All out of work, and cold for action!<sup>8</sup>

Ely. Awake remembrance of these valiant dead,
And with your puissant arm renew their feats:
You are their heir, you sit upon their throne;
The blood and courage, that renowned them,
Runs in your veins; and my thrice-puissant liege
Is in the very May-morn of his youth,
Ripe for exploits and mighty enterprises.

Exe. Your brother kings and monarchs of the earth
Do all expect that you should rouse yourself,
As did the former lions of your blood.

West. They know your grace hath cause, and means, and might:

So hath your highness;<sup>9</sup> never king of England
Had nobles richer, and more loyal subjects;
Whose hearts have left their bodies here in England,
And lie pavilion'd in the fields of France.

Cant. O, let their bodies follow, my dear liege,
With blood, and sword, and fire, to win your right:
In aid whereof, we of the spirituality right word. It might be taken as placed in opposition to bar. To bar is to obstruct; to imbar is to bar in, to secure. They would hold up the Salique law, “to bar your highness,” hiding “their crooked titles” in a net, rather than amply defending them. But it has been suggested to us that imbar is here used for “to set at the bar”—to place their crooked titles before a proper tribunal. This is ingenious and plausible.

<sup>7</sup> Man. So the folio; the quarto, son. This reading is perhaps the better. The passage in the Book of Numbers, as quoted by Hall and Holinshed, is—“When a man dieth without a son, let the inheritance descend to his daughter.” Scripture was quoted on the other side of the controversy:—“Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin,” was held to apply to the arms of France, the lilies. Voltaire, with a sly solemnity, proves, with reference to this, that the arms of France never had any affinity with lilies, but were spear-heads.

<sup>8</sup> Cold for action. Malone says, “cold for want of action.” This, we think, is to interpret too literally. The unemployed forces, seeing the work done to their hands, stood laughing by and indifferent for action—unmoved to action. It is the converse of “hot for action.”

<sup>9</sup> They know, &c. Coleridge's emphatic reading of this passage is certainly the true one; and it involves no change in the original, even of punctuation:—

“They know your grace hath cause, and means, and might:
So hath your highness; never king of England
Had nobles richer.”

What the “monarchs of the earth” know, Westmoreland confirms. This is much better than Monck Mason's interpretation of so for also, making his grace have cause, and his highness means and might.

Will raise your highness such a mighty sum,
As never did the clergy at one time
Bring in to any of your ancestors.<sup>1</sup>

K. Hen. We must not only arm to invade the French,
But lay down our proportions to defend Against the Scot, who will make road upon us
With all advantages.

Cant. They of those marches,<sup>2</sup> gracious sovereign, Shall be a wall sufficient to defend
Our inland from the pilfering borderers.

K. Hen. We do not mean the coursing snatchers only,
But fear the main intendment of the Scot,
Who hath been still a giddy neighbour to us ;
For you shall read, that my great grandfather
Never went with his forces into France,<sup>3</sup>
But that the Scot on his unfurnish'd kingdom
Came pouring, like the tide into a breach,
With ample and brim fulness of his force ;
Galling the gleaned land with hot essays ;
Girding with grievous siege castles and towns :
That England, being empty of defence,
Hath shook and trembled at th' ill-neighbourhood.

Cant. She hath been then more fear'd than harm'd, my liege :

For hear her but exempl'd by herself,—
When all her chivalry hath been in France,
And she a mourning widow of her nobles,
She hath herself not only well defended,
But taken, and impounded as a stray,
The king of Scots ; whom she did send to France,
To fill king Edward's fame with prisoner kings ;
And make your chronicles<sup>3</sup> as rich with praise
As is the ooze and bottom of the sea
With sunken wrack and sumless treasuries.

West. But there's a saying, very old and true,—

If that you will France win
Then with Scotland first begin ;

For once the eagle England being in prey,
To her unguarded nest the weasel Scot
Comes sneaking, and so sucks her princely eggs ;
Playing the mouse, in absence of the cat,
To taint<sup>4</sup> and havock more than she can eat.

Exe. It follows, then, the cat must stay at home :
Yet that is but a crush'd necessity ;<sup>5</sup>
Since we have locks to safeguard necessities,
And pretty traps to catch the petty thieves.
While that the armed hand doth fight abroad,
The advised head defends itself at home :
For government, through high, and low, and lower,<sup>6</sup>
Put into parts, doth keep in one concert ;
Congreeing in a full and natural close,
Like music.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Taint. The folio, tame ; the quarto, spoil. To tame is to subdue—to subject by fear. But the mouse does not tame, neither does she spoil, in the sense in which that word was formerly used. Theobald suggested that tame was a misprint for taint. Rowe printed tear.

<sup>6</sup> This passage has been supposed to be founded upon a fragment of Cicero's "De Republica." It has been imperfectly quoted by Theobald. We give it in full :—

"Ut in fidibus, ac tibiis, atque cantu ipso, ac vocibus concertus est quidam tenendus ex distinctis sonis, quem immutatam, ac discrepantem aures eruditæ ferre non possunt, isque concertus ex dissimillarum vocum moderatione concors tamen efficitur & congruens : sic ex summis, & infimis, & mediis interjectis ordinibus, ut sonis, moderata ratione civitas consensu dissimillarum concinit, & quæ harmoniâ a musicis dicitur in cantu, ea est in civitate concordia, artissimum

Cant. Therefore doth heaven divide
The state of man in divers functions,
Setting endeavour in continual motion ;
To which is fixed, as an aim or butt,
Obedience : for so work the honey bees ;<sup>7</sup>
Creatures, that, by a rule in nature, teach
The act of order to a peopled kingdom.
They have a king, and officers of sorts :
Where some, like magistrates, correct at home ;
Others, like merchants, venture trade abroad ;
Others, like soldiers, armed in their stings,
Make boot upon the summer's velvet buds ;
Which pillage they with merry march bring home
To the tent-royal of their emperor :
Who, busied in his majesty, surveys
The singing masons building roofs of gold ;
The civil citizens kneading up the honey ;
The poor mechanic porters crowding in
Their heavy burthens at his narrow gate ;
The sad-eyed justice, with his surly hum,
Delivering o'er to éxecutors pale
The lazy yawning drone. I this infer,—
That many things, having full reference
To one concert, may work contrariously ;
As many arrows, loosed several ways,
Come to one mark ; as many ways meet in one town ;<sup>7</sup>
As many fresh streams meet in one salt sea ;<sup>8</sup>
As many lines close in the dial's centre ;
So may a thousand actions, once afoot,
End in one purpose, and be all well borne
Without defeat. Therefore to France, my liege,
Divide your happy England into four ;
Whereof take you one quarter into France,
And you withal shall make all Gallia shake.
If we, with thrice such powers left at home,
Cannot defend our own doors from the dog,
Let us be worried ; and our nation lose
The name of hardiness, and policy.

K. Hen. Call in the messengers sent from the Dauphin.

[Exit an Attendant. The KING ascends his throne.]

Now are we well resolv'd ; and, by God's help,
And yours, the noble sinews of our power,
France being ours, we'll bend it to our awe,
Or break it all to pieces : Or, there we'll sit,
Ruling, in large and ample empery,
O'er France and all her almost kingly dukedoms,
Or lay these bones in an unworthy urn,
Tombless, with no remembrance over them :
Either our history shall with full mouth
Speak freely of our acts ; or else our grave,
Like Turkish mute, shall have a tongueless mouth,
Not worshipp'd with a waxen epitaph.<sup>9</sup>

atque optimum omni in republica vinculum incolunitatis : quæ sine justitia nullo pacto esse potest." (See Illustration e, Act I.)

<sup>7</sup> So the folio. The ordinary reading, "several ways," is that of the quarto.

<sup>8</sup> So the folio. A former made-up text gave us—

"As many fresh streams run in one self sea."

<sup>9</sup> Waxen epitaph. In the quartos this speech of the king consists only of seven lines :—

"Call in the messenger sent from the Dauphin ;
And by your aid, the noble sinews of our land,
France being ours we'll bring it to our awe,
Or break it all in pieces.
Either our chronicles shall with full mouth speak
Freely of our acts, or else like tongueless mutes—
Not worshipp'd with a paper epitaph."

The paper epitaph here is clearly the record of the chronicles. We have nothing here about the "urn" and the "grave." And yet the commentators give us two pages of notes disputing whether paper or waxen be the better word in the present text, without reference to the extension of the passage ; and Malone finally adopts paper. We can have no doubt about restoring waxen, which may be taken to mean a perishable epitaph of wax : not worshipped even with a waxen epitaph. The opposition of wax and marble is a familiar image in the old poets. Gifford's interpretation that a waxen epitaph is a copy of verses affixed upon a tomb with wax, appears to us somewhat forced ; and yet there is no doubt that such a practice prevailed :—

"Let others, then, sad epitaphs invent,
And paste them up about thy monument."

Enter Ambassadors of France.

Now are we well prepar'd to know the pleasure
Of our fair cousin Dauphin; for, we hear,
Your greeting is from him, not from the king.

Amb. May't please your majesty, to give us leave
Freely to render what we have in charge;
Or shall we sparingly show you far off
The Dauphin's meaning, and our embassy?

K. Hen. We are no tyrant, but a Christian king;
Unto whose grace our passion is as subject,
As are our wretches fetter'd in our prisons:
Therefore, with frank and with uncurbed plainness
Tell us the Dauphin's mind.

Amb. Thus then, in few.
Your highness, lately sending into France,
Did claim some certain dukedoms, in the right
Of your great predecessor, king Edward the Third.
In answer of which claim, the prince our master
Says, that you savour too much of your youth;
And bids you be advis'd, there's naught in France
That can be with a nimble galliard<sup>1</sup> won:
You cannot revel into dukedoms there.

He therefore sends you, meeter for your spirit,
This tun of treasure; and, in lieu of this,
Desires you, let the dukedoms that you claim
Hear no more of you. This the Dauphin speaks.

K. Hen. What treasure, uncle?

Exe. Tennis-balls, my liege.

K. Hen. We are glad the Dauphin is so pleasant with us;
His present, and your pains, we thank you for:
When we have match'd our rackets to these balls,
We will in France, by God's grace, play a set
Shall strike his father's crown into the hazard:
Tell him, he hath made a match with such a wrangler,
That all the courts of France will be disturb'd
With chases. And we understand him well,
How he comes o'er us with our wilder days,
Not measuring what use we made of them.
We never valued this poor seat of England;<sup>2</sup>
And therefore, living hence, did give ourself
To barbarous licence; as 'tis ever common,
That men are merriest when they are from home.
But tell the Dauphin,—I will keep my state;
Be like a king, and show my sail of greatness,
When I do rouse me in my throne of France:
For that I have laid by my majesty,
And plodded like a man for working-days;
But I will rise there with so full a glory,
That I will dazzle all the eyes of France,
Yea, strike the Dauphin blind to look on us.
And tell the pleasant prince, this mock of his Hath turn'd his balls to gun-stones; and his soul
Shall stand sore charged for the wasteful vengeance
That shall fly with them: for many a thousand widows
Shall this his mock mock out of their dear husbands;
Mock mothers from their sons, mock castles down:
And some are yet ungotten and unborn,
That shall have cause to curse the Dauphin's scorn.
But this lies all within the will of God,
To whom I do appeal; and in whose name,
Tell you the Dauphin, I am coming on
To venge me as I may, and to put forth
My rightful hand in a well-hallow'd cause.
So, get you hence in peace; and tell the Dauphin,

His jest will savour but of shallow wit,
When thousands weep, more than did laugh at it.
Convey them with safe conduct.—Fare you well.

[Exeunt Ambassadors.]

Exe. This was a merry message.

K. Hen. We hope to make the sender blush at it.

[Descends from his throne.]

Therefore, my lords, omit no happy hour,
That may give furtherance to our expedition:
For we have now no thought in us but France;
Save those to God, that run before our business.
Therefore, let our proportions for these wars
Be soon collected; and all things thought upon,
That may, with reasonable swiftness, add
More feathers to our wings; for, God before,
We'll chide this Dauphin at his father's door.
Therefore, let every man now task his thought,
That this fair action may on foot be brought.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

CHORUS.<sup>3</sup>

Now all the youth of England are on fire,
And silken dalliance in the wardrobe lies;
Now thrive the armourers, and honour's thought
Reigns solely in the breast of every man
They sell the pasture now to buy the horse;
Following the mirror of all Christian kings,
With winged heels, as English Mercuries.
For now sits Expectation in the air;
And hides a sword, from hilts unto the point,
With crowns imperial, crowns and coronets,<sup>a</sup>
Promis'd to Harry, and his followers.
The French, advis'd by good intelligence
Of this most dreadful preparation,
Shake in their fear; and with pale policy
Seek to divert the English purposes.
O England! model to thy inward greatness,
Like little body with a mighty heart,
What might'st thou do, that honour would thee do,
Were all thy children kind and natural!
But see thy fault! France hath in thee found out
A nest of hollow bosoms, which he fills
With treacherous crowns; and three corrupted men,—
One, Richard earl of Cambridge; and the second,
Henry lord Scroop of Masham; and the third,
Sir Thomas Grey, knight, of Northumberland,—
Have, for the gilt of France, (O guilt indeed!)
Confirm'd conspiracy with fearful France;
And by their hands this grace of kings must die,
(If hell and treason hold their promises,)
Ere he take ship for France, and in Southampton.
Linger your patience on, and we'll digest
The abuse of distance; force a play.<sup>4</sup>
The sum is paid; the traitors are agreed;
The king is set from London; and the scene
Is now transported, gentles, to Southampton:
There is the playhouse now, there must you sit:
And thence to France shall we convey you safe,
And bring you back, charming the narrow seas

“Linger your patience on; and well digest
The abuse of distance, while we force a play.”

Pope changed the wee'l of the folio to well, and added while we. The passage is evidently corrupt; and we believe that the two lines were intended to be erased from the author's copy; for “the abuse of distance” is inapplicable as the lines stand.

<sup>2</sup> We never valued, &c. The poor seat, we take it, is the throne. The king, it appears to us, is speaking tauntingly and ironically—“he comes over us with our wilder days”—“we (as he thinks) never valued this poor seat of England, and therefore,” &c. “But tell the Dauphin,” &c.

To give you gentle pass; for, if we may,
We'll not offend one stomach with our play.
But, till the king come forth, and not till then,
Unto Southampton do we shift our scene.<sup>1</sup>

SCENE I.—Eastcheap.

Enter NYM and BARDOLPH.

Bard. Well met, corporal Nym.

Nym. Good morrow, lieutenant Bardolph.<sup>2</sup>

Bard. What, are ancient Pistol and you friends yet?

Nym. For my part, I care not: I say little; but when time shall serve, there shall be smiles; but that shall be as it may. I dare not fight; but I will wink, and hold out mine iron: It is a simple one; but what though? It will toast cheese; and it will endure cold as another man's sword will: and there's an end.

Bard. I will bestow a breakfast to make you friends; and we'll be all three sworn brothers to France; let it be so, good corporal Nym.

Nym. 'Faith, I will live so long as I may, that's the certain of it; and when I cannot live any longer, I will do as I may:<sup>3</sup> that is my rest, that is the rendezvous of it.

Bard. It is certain, corporal, that he is married to Nell Quickly: and, certainly, she did you wrong; for you were troth-plight to her.

Nym. I cannot tell; things must be as they may: men may sleep, and they may have their throats about them at that time; and, some say, knives have edges. It must be as it may: though patience be a tired mare,<sup>4</sup> yet she will plod. There must be conclusions. Well, I cannot tell.

Enter PISTOL and MRS. QUICKLY.<sup>5</sup>

Bard. Here comes ancient Pistol, and his wife:—good corporal, be patient here.—How now, mine host Pistol?

Pist. Base tike,<sup>6</sup> call'st thou me host?

Now, by this hand I swear, I scorn the term;
Nor shall my Nell keep lodgers.

Quick. No, by my troth, not long: for we cannot lodge and board a dozen or fourteen gentlewomen, that live honestly by the prick of their needles, but it will be thought we keep a bawdy-house straight. [NYM draws his sword.] O well-a-day, Lady, if he be not drawn. Now we shall see wilful adultery and murder committed.<sup>7</sup> Good lieutenant Bardolph—

Bard. Good corporal, offer nothing here.

Nym. Pish!

Pist. Pish for thee, Iceland dog! thou prick-eared cur of Iceland.<sup>8</sup>

Quick. Good corporal Nym, show thy valour, and put up thy sword.

Nym. Will you shog off? I would have you solus.

[Sheathing his sword.]

Pist. Solus, egregious dog? O viper vile!

The solus in thy most marvellous face;

The solus in thy teeth, and in thy throat,

And in thy hateful lungs, yea, in thy maw, perdy;
And, which is worse, within thy nasty mouth!
I do retort the solus in thy bowels;
For I can take,<sup>8</sup> and Pistol's cock is up,
And flashing fire will follow.

Nym. I am not Barbason,<sup>9</sup> you cannot conjure me. I have an humour to knock you indifferently well: If you grow foul with me, Pistol, I will scour you with my rapier, as I may say, in fair terms: if you would walk off, I would prick your guts a little, in good terms, as I may say; and that's the humour of it.

Pist. O braggard vile, and damned furious wight!
The grave doth gape, and doting death is near;
Therefore exhale. [PISTOL and NYM draw.]

Bard. Hear me, hear me what I say:—he that strikes the first stroke, I'll run him up to the hilts, as I am a soldier. [Draws.]

Pist. An oath of mickle might; and fury shall abate.
Give me thy fist, thy fore-foot to me give;
Thy spirits are most tall.

Nym. I will cut thy throat, one time or other, in fair terms; that is the humour of it.

Pist. Coupe le gorge, that's the word!—I thee defy again.
O hound of Crete, think'st thou my spouse to get?
No; to the spital go,

And from the powdering tub of infamy
Fetch forth the lazar kite of Cressid's kind,
Doll Tear-sheet she by name, and her espouse:
I have and I will hold the quondam Quickly
For the only she: and—Pauca, there's enough. Go to.

Enter the Boy.

Boy. Mine host Pistol, you must come to my master,—and you, hostess;—he is very sick, and would to bed.—Good Bardolph, put thy face between his sheets, and do the office of a warming-pan; 'faith, he's very ill.

Bard. Away, you rogue.

Quick. By my troth, he'll yield the crow a pudding one of these days; the king has killed his heart.—Good husband, come home presently.

[Exeunt MRS. QUICKLY and Boy.]

Bard. Come, shall I make you two friends? We must to France together. Why the devil should we keep knives to cut one another's throats?

Pist. Let floods o'erswell, and fiends for food howl on!

Nym. You'll pay me the eight shillings I won of you at betting?

Pist. Base is the slave that pays.

Nym. That now I will have; that's the humour of it.

Pist. As manhood shall compound: push home.

[They draw.]

Bard. By this sword, he that makes the first thrust I'll kill him; by this sword, I will.

Pist. Sword is an oath, and oaths must have their course.

Bard. Corporal Nym, an thou wilt be friends, be friends: an thou wilt not, why then be enemies with me too. Pri-thee, put up.

Nym. I shall have my eight shillings I won of you at betting.

<sup>1</sup> The chorus plainly says,—after having described the treason which is to take place “in Southampton,”—not till the king come forth do we shift our scene to that place. The previous scene in Eastcheap occurs before the king does come forth. This intimation of the chorus was to prevent the scene in Eastcheap coming abruptly upon the audience. The first “till,” however, should be “when,” to make the sense clear.

<sup>2</sup> Bardolph, according to some commentators, ought to be “corporal,” and not “lieutenant.” They have overlooked the tone of authority which he uses both to Pistol and Nym. It appears from an old MS. in the British Museum, that amongst the canonniers serving in Normandy in 1435 were Wm. Pistail and R. Bardolf.

<sup>3</sup> Mason would read “die as I may.” It is not necessary, we think, to make Nym's common-places antithetical.

<sup>7</sup> The folio reads thus:—“O well-a-day, Lady, if he be not heune now, we shall see,” &c. The first quarto has “O Lord, here's corporal Nym, now shall we have wilful adultery,” &c. Hanmer suggested drawn now. We adopt drawn, but give Now to the beginning of the next sentence.

<sup>8</sup> I can take. Malone considers that take is a corruption, and that we should follow the quarto, talk. Is there any more difficulty in “I can take,” than in the familiar expression, “Do you take?” Mason says Pistol means, “I can take fire.” He, in his obscure language, only means, “I understand you”—“I know what you are about.”

Pist. A noble shalt thou have, and present pay ;
And liquor likewise will I give to thee,
And friendship shall combine, and brotherhood :
I'll live by Nym, and Nym shall live by me ;—
Is not this just ?—for I shall sutler be Unto the camp, and profits will accrue.
Give me thy hand.

Nym. I shall have my noble ?

Pist. In cash most justly paid.

Nym. Well then, that's the humour of it.

Re-enter MRS. QUICKLY.

Quick. As ever you came of woman, come in quickly to sir John : Ah, poor heart ! he is so shaken of a burning quotidian tertian, that it is most lamentable to behold.
Sweet men, come to him.

Nym. The king hath run bad humours on the knight,
that's the even of it.

Pist. Nym, thou hast spoke the right ;
His heart is fractured, and corroborate.

Nym. The king is a good king : but it must be as it may ; he passes some humours, and careers.

Pist. Let us condole the knight ; for lambkins we will live.<sup>1</sup> [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Southampton. A Council Chamber.

Enter EXETER, BEDFORD, and WESTMORELAND.

Bed. 'Fore God, his grace is bold, to trust these traitors.

Exe. They shall be apprehended by and by.

West. How smooth and even they do bear themselves !
As if allegiance in their bosoms sat,
Crowned with faith and constant loyalty.

Bed. The king hath note of all that they intend,
By interception which they dream not of.

Exe. Nay, but the man that was his bedfellow,<sup>2</sup>
Whom he hath dull'd and cloy'd with gracious favours,<sup>2</sup>—
That he should, for a foreign purse, so sell
His sovereign's life to death and treachery !

Trumpet sounds. Enter KING HENRY, SCROOP, CAMBRIDGE, GREY, Lords, and Attendants.

K. Hen. Now sits the wind fair, and we will aboard.
My lord of Cambridge, and my kind lord of Masham,
And you, my gentle knight, give me your thoughts :
Think you not, that the powers we bear with us
Will cut their passage through the force of France ;
Doing the execution, and the act,
For which we have in head assembled them ?

Scroop. No doubt, my liege, if each man do his best.

K. Hen. I doubt not that : since we are well persuaded
We carry not a heart with us from hence
That grows not in a fair concert with ours ;
Nor leave not one behind, that doth not wish
Success and conquest to attend on us.

Cam. Never was monarch better fear'd and lov'd
Than is your majesty ; there's not, I think, a subject
That sits in heart-grief and uneasiness
Under the sweet shade of your government.

Grey. True : those that were your father's enemies
Have steep'd their galls in honey ; and do serve you
With hearts create of duty and of zeal.

K. Hen. We therefore have great cause of thankfulness ;
And shall forget the office of our hand
Sooner than quittance of desert and merit,
According to the weight and worthiness.

Scroop. So service shall with steeled sinews toil,
And labour shall refresh itself with hope,
To do your grace incessant services.

K. Hen. We judge no less.—Uncle of Exeter,
Enlarge the man committed yesterday,
That rail'd against our person : we consider
It was excess of wine that set him on ;
And, on his more advice, we pardon him.

Scroop. That's mercy, but too much security ;
Let him be punish'd, sovereign ; lest example
Breed, by his sufferance, more of such a kind.

K. Hen. O, let us yet be merciful.

Cam. So may your highness, and yet punish too.

Grey. Sir, you show great mercy if you give him life,
After the taste of much correction.

K. Hen. Alas, your too much love and care of me
Are heavy orisons 'gainst this poor wretch.
If little faults, proceeding on distemper,
Shall not be wink'd at, how shall we stretch our eye
When capital crimes, chew'd, swallow'd, and digested,
Appear before us ?—We'll yet enlarge that man,
Though Cambridge, Scroop, and Grey, in their dear care
And tender preservation of our person,
Would have him punish'd. And now to our French causes
Who are the late commissioners ?

Cam. I, one, my lord ;
Your highness bade me ask for it to-day.

Scroop. So did you me, my liege.

Grey. And I, my royal sovereign.

K. Hen. Then, Richard, earl of Cambridge, there is yours ;

There yours, lord Scroop of Masham : and, sir knight,
Grey of Northumberland, this same is yours :
Read them ; and know, I know your worthiness.
My lord of Westmoreland, and uncle Exeter,
We will aboard to-night.—Why, how now, gentlemen ?
What see you in those papers, that you lose
So much complexion ?—look ye, how they change !
Their cheeks are paper.—Why, what read you there,
That hath so cowarded and chas'd your blood
Out of appearance ?

Cam. I do confess my fault ;
And do submit me to your highness' mercy.

Grey, Scroop. To which we all appeal.

K. Hen. The mercy, that was quick in us but late,
By your own counsel is suppress'd and kill'd :
You must not dare, for shame, to talk of mercy ;
For your own reasons turn into your bosoms,
As dogs upon their masters, worrying you.<sup>3</sup>
See you, my princes, and my noble peers,
These English monsters ! My lord of Cambridge here,—
You know how apt our love was, to accord
To furnish him with all appertinents
Belonging to his honour ; and this man
Hath, for a few light crowns, lightly conspir'd,
And sworn unto the practices of France,
To kill us here in Hampton : to the which,
This knight, no less for bounty bound to us
Than Cambridge is, hath likewise sworn. But O !
What shall I say to thee, lord Scroop ; thou cruel,
Ingrateful, savage, and inhuman creature !
Thou, that didst bear the key of all my counsels,
That knew'st the very bottom of my soul,

But if the quarto is to be followed the editors should have left out the three lines which Westmoreland speaks—“How smooth,” &c.

That almost might'st have coin'd me into gold,
 Wouldst thou have practis'd on me for thy use?
 May it be possible, that foreign hire
 Could out of thee extract one spark of evil,
 That might annoy my finger? 'tis so strange,
 That, though the truth of it stands off as gross
 As black from white,<sup>1</sup> my eye will scarcely see it.
 Treason and murder ever kept together,
 As two yoke-devils sworn to either's purpose,
 Working so grossly in a natural cause,
 That admiration did not whoop at them:
 But thou, 'gainst all proportion, didst bring in Wonder, to wait on treason, and on murder:
 And whatsoever cunning fiend it was
 That wrought upon thee so preposterously,
 Hath got the voice in hell for excellence:
 And other devils, that suggest by treasons,
 Do botch and bungle up damnation
 With patches, colours, and with forms being fetch'd
 From glistening semblances of piety;
 But he that temper'd thee bade thee stand up,
 Gave thee no instance why thou shouldst do treason,
 Unless to dub thee with the name of traitor.
 If that same dæmon, that hath gull'd thee thus,
 Should with his lion gait walk the whole world,
 He might return to vasty Tartar back,
 And tell the legions, I can never win
 A soul so easy as that Englishman's.
 O, how hast thou with jealousy infected
 The sweetness of affiance! Show men dutiful?
 Why, so didst thou: Seem they grave and learned?
 Why, so didst thou: Come they of noble family?
 Why, so didst thou: Seem they religious?
 Why, so didst thou: Or are they spare in diet;
 Free from gross passion, or of mirth, or anger;
 Constant in spirit, not swerving with the blood;
 Garnish'd and deck'd in modest complement;
 Not working with the eye without the ear,
 And, but in purged judgment, trusting neither—
 Such, and so finely bolted, didst thou seem:
 And thus thy fall hath left a kind of blot,
 To mark the full-fraught man and best indued,
 With some suspicion.<sup>2</sup> I will weep for thee;
 For this revolt of thine, methinks, is like
 Another fall of man.<sup>3</sup>—Their faults are open,
 Arrest them to the answer of the law;
 And God acquit them of their practices!

Exe. I arrest thee of high treason, by the name of Richard earl of Cambridge.

I arrest thee of high treason, by the name of Henry lord
 Scroop of Masham.

I arrest thee of high treason, by the name of Thomas
 Grey, knight of Northumberland.

Scroop. Our purposes God justly hath discover'd;
 And I repent my fault more than my death;
 Which I beseech your highness to forgive,
 Although my body pay the price of it.

Cam. For me,—the gold of France did not seduce;
 Although I did admit it as a motive,
 The sooner to effect what I intended:

"To make the full-fraught man, and best, indued
 With some suspicion."

<sup>3</sup> The thirty-eight lines here ending are not found in the quartos. We are greatly mistaken if these lines, as well as the choruses and other passages which we shall point out, do not exhibit the hand of the master elaborating his original sketch.

<sup>4</sup> Christom child. The chrisom was a white cloth placed upon the head of an infant at baptism, when the chrisom, or sacred oil of the Romish church, was used in that sacrament. The white cloth which was worn by the child at baptism was subsequently called a chrisom, and if the child died within a month of its birth that cloth was used as a shroud. Children dying under the age of a month were

But God be thanked for prevention;
 Which I in sufferance heartily will rejoice,
 Beseeching God, and you, to pardon me.

Grey. Never did faithful subject more rejoice
 At the discovery of most dangerous treason,
 Than I do at this hour joy o'er myself,
 Prevented from a damned enterprise:
 My fault, but not my body, pardon, sovereign.

K. Hen. God quit you in his mercy! Hear your sentence.

You have conspir'd against our royal person,
 Join'd with an enemy proclaim'd, and from his coffers
 Receiv'd the golden earnest of our death;
 Wherein you would have sold your king to slaughter,
 His princes and his peers to servitude,
 His subjects to oppression and contempt,
 And his whole kingdom into desolation.
 Touching our person, seek we no revenge;
 But we our kingdom's safety must so tender,
 Whose ruin you have sought, that to her laws
 We do deliver you. Get you therefore hence,
 Poor miserable wretches, to your death:
 The taste whereof, God, of his mercy, give you
 Patience to endure, and true repentance
 Of all your dear offences!—Bear them hence.

[Exeunt Conspirators, guarded.]

Now, Lords, for France; the enterprise whereof
 Shall be to you, as us, like glorious.

We doubt not of a fair and lucky war;
 Since God so graciously hath brought to light
 This dangerous treason, lurking in our way,
 To hinder our beginnings;—we doubt not now
 But every rub is smoothed on our way.
 Then, forth, dear countrymen; let us deliver
 Our puissance into the hand of God,
 Putting it straight in expedition.
 Cheerly to sea; the signs of war advance:
 No king of England, if not king of France. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—London. Mrs. Quickly's House in Eastcheap.

Enter PISTOL, MRS. QUICKLY, NYM, BARDOLPH, and Boy.

Quick. Prithee, honey-sweet husband, let me bring thee to Staines.

Pist. No; for my manly heart doth yearn.
 Bardolph, be blithe;—Nym, rouse thy vaunting veins;
 Boy, bristle thy courage up; for Falstaff he is dead,
 And we must yearn therefore.

Bard. 'Would I were with him, wheresome'er he is, either in heaven, or in hell!

Quick. Nay, sure he's not in hell; he's in Arthur's bosom, if ever man went to Arthur's bosom. 'A made a finer end, and went away, an it had been any christom child;<sup>4</sup> 'a parted even just between twelve and one, e'en at the turning o' the tide:<sup>5</sup> for after I saw him fumble with the sheets, and play with flowers, and smile upon his fingers' ends,<sup>6</sup> I knew there was but one way; for his nose was as sharp as a pen, and 'a babbled of green fields.<sup>7</sup> How now, sir John?

called chrisoms in the old Bills of Mortality. Mrs. Quickly's "christom" is one of her emendations of English.

quoth I: what, man! be of good cheer. So 'a cried out—God, God, God! three or four times: now I, to comfort him, bid him 'a should not think of God; I hoped there was no need to trouble himself with any such thoughts yet: So, 'a bade me lay more clothes on his feet: I put my hand into the bed, and felt them, and they were as cold as any stone; then I felt to his knees, and so upward, and upward, and all was as cold as any stone.

Nym. They say, he cried out of sack.

Quick. Ay, that 'a did.

Bard. And of women.

Quick. Nay, that 'a did not.

Boy. Yes, that 'a did; and said they were devils incarnate.

Quick. 'A could never abide carnation: 'twas a colour he never liked.

Boy. 'A said once the devil would have him about women.

Quick. 'A did in some sort, indeed, handle women: but then he was rheumatic; and talked of the whore of Babylon.

Boy. Do you not remember, 'a saw a flea stick upon Bardolph's nose; and 'a said it was a black soul burning in hell?

Bard. Well, the fuel is gone that maintained that fire: that's all the riches I got in his service.

Nym. Shall we shog? the king will be gone from Southampton.

Pist. Come, let's away.—My love, give me thy lips.

Look to my chattels, and my moveables:

Let senses rule; the word is, Pitch and pay;

Trust none:

For oaths are straws, men's faiths are wafer-cakes,

And hold-fast is the only dog, my duck;

Therefore, caveto be thy counsellor.

Go, clear thy crystals.<sup>1</sup>—Yoke-fellows in arms,

Let us to France! like horse-leeches, my boys;

To suck, to suck, the very blood to suck!

Boy. And that is but unwholesome food, they say.

Pist. Touch her soft mouth, and march.

Bard. Farewell, hostess. [Kissing her.]

Nym. I cannot kiss, that is the humour of it; but adieu.

Pist. Let housewifery appear; keep close, I thee command.

Quick. Farewell; adieu. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—France. A Room in the French King's Palace.

Enter the French KING attended; the DAUPHIN, the DUKE OF BURGUNDY, the CONSTABLE, and others.

Fr. King. Thus come the English with full power upon us; And more than carefully it us concerns,

To answer royally in our defences.

Therefore the dukes of Berry, and of Bretagne,

Of Brabant, and of Orleans, shall make forth,

And you, prince Dauphin,—with all swift despatch,

To line and new repair our towns of war,

With men of courage, and with means defendant:

For England his approaches makes as fierce

As waters to the sucking of a gulf.

It fits us then to be as provident

As fear may teach us, out of late examples

Left by the fatal and neglected English

Projection appears here to be used for forecast, preparation. The proportions of defence which are filled by estimating the enemy as more mighty than he seems, of (through) a weak and niggardly projection, spoil the coat, &c. The false concord between proportions and doth does not interfere with this explanation.

Dau. My most redoubted father,
It is most meet we arm us 'gainst the foe:
For peace itself should not so dull a kingdom,
(Though war nor no known quarrel were in question,) But that defences, musters, preparations,
Should be maintain'd, assembled, and collected,
As were a war in expectation.
Therefore, I say, 'tis meet we all go forth,
To view the sick and feeble parts of France;
And let us do it with no show of fear;
No, with no more, than if we heard that England
Were busied with a Whitsun morris-dance:<sup>d</sup>
For, my good liege, she is so idly king'd,
Her sceptre so fantastically borne
By a vain, giddy, shallow, humorous youth,
That fear attends her not.

Con. O, peace, prince Dauphin!
You are too much mistaken in this king:
Question, your grace, the late ambassadors,—
With what great state he heard their embassy,
How well supplied with noble counsellors,
How modest in exception, and withal
How terrible in constant resolution,—
And you shall find, his vanities fore-spent
Were but the outside of the Roman Brutus,
Covering discretion with a coat of folly;
As gardeners do with ordure hide those roots
That shall first spring and be most delicate.

Dau. Well, 'tis not so, my lord high constable,
But though we think it so, it is no matter:
In cases of defence, 'tis best to weigh
The enemy more mighty than he seems:
So the proportions of defence are fill'd;
Which, of a weak and niggardly projection,<sup>2</sup>
Doth like a miser spoil his coat with scanting
A little cloth.

Fr. King. Think we king Harry strong;
And, princes, look you strongly arm to meet him.
The kindred of him hath been flesh'd upon us;
And he is bred out of that bloody strain,
That haunted us in our familiar paths:
Witness our too much memorable shame,
When Cressy battle fatally was struck,
And all our princes captiv'd, by the hand
Of that black name, Edward black prince of Wales;
Whiles that his mountain<sup>3</sup> sire,—on mountain standing,
Up in the air, crown'd with the golden sun,—
Saw his heroical seed, and smiled to see him
Mangle the work of nature, and deface
The patterns that by God and by French fathers
Had twenty years been made. This is a stem
Of that victorious stock; and let us fear
The native mightiness and fate of him.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Ambassadors from Harry king of England
Do crave admittance to your majesty.

Fr. King. We'll give them present audience. Go, and bring them.

[Exeunt Mess. and certain Lords.]

You see, this chase is hotly follow'd, friends.

Dau. Turn head, and stop pursuit: for coward dogs
Most spend their mouths, when what they seem to threaten Runs far before them. Good my sovereign,
Take up the English short; and let them know

tion, and may be justified by abundant examples in our old writers. If we could venture upon a correction of the text, we might read—

“Of which a weak and niggardly projection,” &c.

The transposition at once gives us sense and grammatical concord.

Of what a monarchy you are the head :
Self-love, my liege, is not so vile a sin
As self-neglecting.

Re-enter Lords, with EXETER and Train.

Fr. King. From our brother of England ?

Exe. From him ; and thus he greets your majesty.
He wills you, in the name of God Almighty,
That you divest yourself and lay apart
The borrow'd glories, that, by gift of heaven,
By law of nature, and of nations, 'long
To him, and to his heirs ; namely, the crown,
And all wide stretched honours that pertain,
By custom and the ordinance of times,
Unto the crown of France. That you may know
'Tis no sinister nor no awkward claim,
Pick'd from the worm-holes of long-vanish'd days,
Nor from the dust of old oblivion rak'd,
He sends you this most memorable line,<sup>1</sup> [Gives a paper.
In every branch truly demonstrative ;
Willing you, overlook this pedigree :
And, when you find him evenly deriv'd
From his most fam'd of famous ancestors,
Edward the Third, he bids you then resign
Your crown and kingdom, indirectly held
From him the native and true challenger.

Fr. King. Or else what follows ?

Exe. Bloody constraint ; for if you hide the crown
Even in your hearts, there will he rake for it :
Therefore in fierce tempest is he coming,
In thunder, and in earthquake, like a Jove,
That, if requiring fail, he will compel ;
And bids you, in the bowels of the Lord,
Deliver up the crown ; and to take mercy
On the poor souls for whom this hungry war
Opens his vasty jaws : and on your head
Turning the widows' tears, the orphans' cries,
The dead men's blood, the pining<sup>2</sup> maidens' groans,
For husbands, fathers, and betrothed lovers,
That shall be swallowed in this controversy.
This is his claim, his threat'ning, and my message ;
Unless the Dauphin be in presence here,
To whom expressly I bring greeting too.

Fr. King. For us, we will consider of this further :
To-morrow shall you bear our full intent
Back to our brother of England.

Dau. For the Dauphin,
I stand here for him : What to him from England ?

Exe. Scorn and defiance ; slight regard, contempt,
And anything that may not misbecome
The mighty sender, doth he prize you at.
Thus says my king : and, if your father's highness
Do not, in grant of all demands at large,
Sweeten the bitter mock you sent his majesty,
He'll call you to so hot an answer of it,
That caves and wombly vaultages of France
Shall chide<sup>3</sup> your trespass, and return your mock
In second accent of his ordnance.

Dau. Say, if my father render fair return,
It is against my will : for I desire
Nothing but odds with England ; to that end,
As matching to his youth and vanity,
I did present him with the Paris balls.

Exe. He'll make your Paris Louvre shake for it,<sup>c</sup>
Were it the mistress court of mighty Europe ;

And, be assur'd, you'll find a difference,
(As we, his subjects, have in wonder found,)
Between the promise of his greener days,
And these he masters now ; now he weighs time,
Even to the utmost grain ; that you shall read
In your own losses, if he stay in France.

Fr. King. To-morrow shall you know our mind at full.

Exe. Despatch us with all speed, lest that our king
Come here himself to question our delay ;
For he is footed in this land already.

Fr. King. You shall be soon despatch'd, with fair conditions :

A night is but small breath, and little pause,
To answer matters of this consequence. [Exeunt.

RECENT NEW READING.

Sc. III. p. 617.—“For his nose was as sharp as a pen, and a' babbled of green fields.”

The emendation of Theobald is now to be rejected on the authority of Mr. Collier's old Corrector. “Writing-tables,” says Mr. Collier, “were, no doubt, at that period often covered with green cloth ; and it is to the sharpness of a pen, as seen in strong relief on a table so covered, that Mrs. Quickly likens the nose of the dying wit and philosopher—‘for his nose was as sharp as a pen on a table of green frieze.’” We have had such guesses as that of the old Corrector before now. One of the commentators, Smith, has a similar prosaic suggestion in defence of the original table, and would read, “for his nose was as sharp as a pen on a table of green fells,” for, says he, “on table books silver or steel pens, very sharp pointed, were formerly, and still are, fixed to the backs or covers.” Mr. Collier calls Theobald's emendation fanciful ; formerly he called it judicious. In our minds it is judicious, because it is fanciful ; and being fanciful, is consistent with the excited imagination that often attends the solemn parting hour. What does Dame Quickly say in this sentence ? “After I saw him fumble with the sheets, and play with the flowers, and smile upon his fingers' ends, I knew there was but one way ; for his nose was as sharp as a pen, and a' babbled of green fields.” And so the pen must lie upon a “table of green frieze” before the comparison of the sharp nose can be felt ; and we must lose one of the most beautiful examples of the conjunction of poetry and truth, because some authority chooses to read frieze for fields.

ACT III.

CHORUS.

Thus with imagin'd wing our swift scene flies,
In motion of no less celerity
Than that of thought. Suppose that you have seen
The well appointed king at Hampton pier<sup>4</sup>
Embark his royalty ; and his brave fleet
With silken streamers the young Phoebus fanning.
Play with your fancies ; and in them behold,
Upon the hempen tackle ship-boys climbing :
Hear the shrill whistle which doth order give
To sounds confus'd : behold the threaten sails,
Borne with the invisible and creeping wind,
Draw the huge bottoms through the furrow'd sea,
Breasting the lofty surge : O, do but think
You stand upon the rivage,<sup>5</sup> and behold
A city on the inconstant billows dancing ;
For so appears this fleet majestic,
Holding due course to Harfleur. Follow, follow !
Grapple your minds to sternage<sup>6</sup> of this navy ;
And leave your England, as dead midnight still,
Guarded with grandsires, babies, and old women,
Either past, or not arrived to, pith and puissance :
For who is he, whose chin is but enrich'd
With one appearing hair, that will not follow
These cull'd and choice-drawn cavaliers to France ?

expressive word. Chaucer, Gower, Spenser, and Hall and Holinshed, have it frequently.

<sup>6</sup> Sternage. Malone thinks Shakspeare wrote steerage. The meaning of the words is the same, but sternage is the more antique form. Holinshed uses stern as a verb in the sense of steer ; and Chapman in his Homer has “the sternsman.” The “sternage of this navy” is, the course of this navy.

Work, work, your thoughts, and therein see a siege :
Behold the ordnance on their carriages,
With fatal mouths gaping on girded Harfleur.
Suppose, the ambassador from the French comes back ;
Tells Harry, that the king doth offer him
Katharine his daughter ; and with her, to dowry,
Some petty and unprofitable dukedoms.
The offer likes not : and the nimble gunner
With linstock<sup>1</sup> now the devilish cannon<sup>2</sup> touches, [Alarum ; and chambers (small cannon) go off.
And down goes all before them. Still be kind,
And eke out our performance with your mind. [Exit.]

SCENE I.—The same. Before Harfleur.<sup>3</sup>

Alarums. Enter KING HENRY, EXETER, BEDFORD, GLOSTER, and Soldiers, with scaling ladders.

K. Hen. Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more ;
Or close the wall up with our English dead !
In peace, there's nothing so becomes a man
As modest stillness and humility :
But when the blast of war blows in our ears,
Then imitate the action of the tiger ;
Stiffen the sinews, summon<sup>4</sup> up the blood,
Disguise fair nature with hard-favour'd rage :
Then lend the eye a terrible aspect ;
Let it pry through the portage<sup>5</sup> of the head,
Like the brass cannon ; let the brow o'erwhelm it,
As fearfully as doth a galled rock
O'erhang<sup>6</sup> and jutty<sup>7</sup> his confounded<sup>8</sup> base,
Swill'd with the wild and wasteful ocean.
Now set the teeth, and stretch the nostril wide ;
Hold hard the breath, and bend up every spirit
To his full height !—On, on, you nobless English,<sup>9</sup>
Whose blood is fet<sup>10</sup> from fathers of war-proof !
Fathers that, like so many Alexanders,
Have in these parts from morn till even fought,
And sheath'd their swords for lack of argument.
Dishonour not your mothers ; now attest
That those whom you call'd fathers did beget you !
Be copy now to men of grosser blood,
And teach them how to war !—And you, good yeomen,
Whose limbs were made in England, show us here
The mettle of your pasture ; let us swear
That you are worth your breeding : which I doubt not ;
For there is none of you so mean and base
That hath not noble lustre in your eyes.
I see you stand like greyhounds in the slips,
Straining upon the start. The game's afoot ;

“ As when that devilish iron engine, wrought
In deepest hell, and fram'd by furies' skill,
With windy nitre and quick sulphur fraught,
And ramm'd with bullet round, ordain'd to kill,
Conceiveth fire,” &c.—Fairy Queen, book i. canto vii. 13.

<sup>9</sup> Nobless English. The original of 1623 prints Noblisch English. In the second folio Noblisch becomes noblest, which Steevens follows. Malone adopts noble. The nobless English is the English nobility—the barons “ whose blood is fet from fathers of war-proof.” Henry first addresses the nobless—then the yeomen. There is an analogous position of the adjective in this play. In Act V. Henry says—

And the French king responds with “ princes English.”

Follow your spirit : and, upon this charge,
Cry—God for Harry ! England ! and Saint George !
[Exeunt. Alarum, and chambers go off.

SCENE II.—The same.

Forces pass over ; then enter NYM, BARDOLPH, PISTOL, and Boy.

Bard. On, on, on, on, on ! to the breach, to the breach !
Nym. 'Pray thee, corporal,<sup>11</sup> stay ; the knocks are too hot ; and, for mine own part, I have not a case of lives :<sup>12</sup> the humour of it is too hot, that is the very plain-song of it.

Pist. The plain-song is most just ; for humours do abound ;

Knocks go and come ; God's vassals drop and die ;
And sword and shield,
In bloody field,
Doth win immortal fame.

Boy. 'Would I were in an alehouse in London ! I would give all my fame for a pot of ale and safety.<sup>13</sup>

Pist. And I :

If wishes would prevail with me,
My purpose should not fail with me,
But thither would I hie.

Boy. As duly, but not as truly,
As bird doth sing on bough.<sup>14</sup>

Enter FLUELLEN.<sup>15</sup>

Flu. Up to the preach, you dogs ! avaunt, you cullions.<sup>16</sup> [Driving them forward.

Pist. Be merciful, great duke, to men of mould !

Abate thy rage, abate thy manly rage !

Abate thy rage, great duke !<sup>17</sup>

Good bawcock, bate thy rage ! use lenity, sweet chuck !

Nym. These be good humours !—your honour wins bad humours.

[Exeunt NYM, PISTOL, and BARDOLPH, followed by FLUELLEN.

Boy. As young as I am, I have observed these three washers. I am boy to them all three : but all they three, though they would serve me, could not be man to me ; for, indeed, three such antics do not amount to a man. For Bardolph,—he is white-livered, and red-faced ; by the means whereof 'a faces it out, but fights not. For Pistol,—he hath a killing tongue and a quiet sword ; by the means whereof 'a breakswords, and keeps whole weapons. For Nym,—he hath heard that men of few words are the best men ; and therefore he scorns to say his prayers, lest 'a should be thought a coward : but his few bad words are matched with as few <sup>10</sup> Fet. Pope changed this into fetch'd, but Steevens properly restored it. The word is not only found in Chaucer and Spenser, but in our present translation of the Bible, although in many cases, some of which Dr. Grey has enumerated, it has been thrust out in some editions to make way for fetch'd. Our Anglo-Saxon language has thus been deteriorated. Fette is the participle of the Anglo-Saxon verb fet-ian, to fetch.

<sup>12</sup> A case of lives—several lives—as “ a case of pistols,” “ a case of poniards ”—expressions in use in Elizabeth's time.

<sup>13</sup> In the quarto the passage is thus :—“ Boy. Would I were in London, I'd give all my honour for a pot of ale.” Nym has just said, “ 'Tis honour, and there's the humour of it.” The whole scene is greatly changed and enlarged in the folio. The boy's speech, as it now stands, would seem more appropriate to Nym or Bardolph.

<sup>14</sup> Pistol's snatch of an old song is printed as prose in the folio. The passage does not occur in the quartos. Douce suggested that the words of the boy were the close of the ditty, and we have followed his recommendation to print them as verse. If bough is read bigh we have rhyme. The Saxon verb bigan, to bend, would give us bigh, as bugan gives us bough ; and we have still bight to express a bend, such as that of the elbow.

good deeds; for 'a never broke any man's head but his own, and that was against a post, when he was drunk. They will steal anything, and call it—purchase. Bardolph stole a lute-case; bore it twelve leagues, and sold it for three halfpence. Nym and Bardolph are sworn brothers in filching;<sup>1</sup> and in Calais they stole a fire-shovel: I knew, by that piece of service, the men would carry coals.<sup>2</sup> They would have me as familiar with men's pockets, as their gloves or their handkerchers: which makes much against my manhood, if I should take from another's pocket, to put into mine; for it is plain pocketing up of wrongs. I must leave them, and seek some better service: their villainy goes against my weak stomach, and therefore I must cast it up. [Exit Boy.]

Re-enter FLUELLEN, GOWER following.

Gow. Captain Fluellen, you must come presently to the mines; the duke of Gloster would speak with you.

Flu. To the mines! tell you the duke it is not so good to come to the mines: For, look you, the mines is not according to the disciplines of the war; the concavities of it is not sufficient; for, look you, th' athversary (you may discuss unto the duke, look you,) is digged himself four yards under the countermines;<sup>3</sup> by Cheshu, I think 'a will plow up all, if there is not better directions.

Gow. The duke of Gloster, to whom the order of the siege is given, is altogether directed by an Irishman; a very valiant gentleman, i' faith.

Flu. It is captain Macmorris, is it not?

Gow. I think it be.

Flu. By Cheshu, he is an ass as in the 'orld: I will verify as much in his peard: he has no more directions in the true disciplines of the wars, look you, of the Roman disciplines, than is a puppy-dog.

Enter MACMORRIS and JAMY, at a distance.<sup>4</sup>

Gow. Here 'a comes; and the Scots captain, captain Jamy, with him.

Flu. Captain Jamy is a marvellous falorous gentleman, that is certain; and of great expedition, and knowledge, in the ancient wars, upon my particular knowledge of his directions: by Cheshu, he will maintain his argument as well as any military man in the 'orld, in the disciplines of the pristine wars of the Romans.

Jamy. I say, gud-day, captain Fluellen.

Flu. God-den to your worship, goot captain Jamy.

Gow. How now, captain Macmorris? have you quit the mines? have the pioneers given o'er?

Mac. By Chrish la, tish ill done: the work ish give over, the trumpet sound the retreat. By my hand I swear, and my father's soul, the work ish ill done; it ish give over; I would have blowed up the town, so Chrish save me, la, in an hour. O, tish ill done, tish ill done; by my hand, tish ill done!

Flu. Captain Macmorris, I peseech you now, will you voutsafe me, look you, a few disputations with you, as partly touching or concerning the disciplines of the war, the Roman wars, in the way of argument, look you, and friendly communication; partly to satisfy my opinion, and partly for the satisfaction, look you, of my mind, as touching the direction of the military discipline; that is the point.

<sup>3</sup> Johnson says, “Fluellen means that the enemy had digged himself countermines four yards under the mines.” But why not take Fluellen literally? why not countermines under countermines? and then the enemy “will plow up all.”

Jamy. It sall be very gud, gud feith, gud captains bath; and I sall quit you<sup>5</sup> with gud leve, as I may pick occasion, that sall I, marry.

Mac. It is no time to discourse, so Chrish save me; the day is hot, and the weather, and the wars, and the king, and the dukes: it is no time to discourse. The town is beseeched, and the trumpet calls us to the breach; and we talk, and, by Chrish, do nothing: 'tis shame for us all: so God sa' me, 'tis shame to stand still; it is shame, by my hand: and there is throats to be cut, and works to be done; and there ish nothing done, so Chrish sa' me, la.

Jamy. By the mess, ere these eyes of mine take themselves to slumber, aile do gude service, or aile ligge i' the grund for it; ay, or go to death; and aile pay it as valorously as I may, that sall I surely do, that is the breff and the long: Mary, I wad full fain heard some question 'tween you tway.

Flu. Captain Macmorris, I think, look you, under your correction, there is not many of your nation—

Mac. Of my nation! What ish my nation? What ish my nation? Who talks of my nation, ish a villain, and a bastard, and a knave, and a rascal.<sup>6</sup>

Flu. Look you, if you take the matter otherwise than is meant, captain Macmorris, peradventure I shall think you do not use me with that affability as in discretion you ought to use me, look you; being as goot a man as yourself, both in the disciplines of wars, and in the derivation of my birth, and in other particularities.

Mac. I do not know you so good a man as myself: so Chrish save me, I will cut off your head.

Gow. Gentlemen both, you will mistake each other.

Jamy. Au! that's a foul fault. [A parley sounded.]

Gow. The town sounds a parley.

Flu. Captain Macmorris, when there is more better opportunity to be required, look you, I will be so bold as to tell you, I know the disciplines of war; and there is an end. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The same. Before the Gates of Harfleur.

The Governor and some Citizens on the walls; the English Forces below. Enter KING HENRY and his Train.

K. Hen. How yet resolves the governor of the town? This is the latest parle we will admit: Therefore, to our best mercy give yourselves; Or like to men proud of destruction, Defy us to our worst: for, as I am a soldier, (A name that in my thoughts becomes me best,) If I begin the battery once again, I will not leave the half-achieved Harfleur Till in her ashes she lie buried. The gates of mercy shall be all shut up; And the flesh'd soldier, rough and hard of heart, In liberty of bloody hand shall range With conscience wide as hell; mowing like grass Your fresh-fair virgins and your flowering infants. What is it then to me, if impious war, Array'd in flames, like to the prince of fiends, Do, with his smirch'd complexion, all fell feats Enlink'd to waste and desolation? What is't to me, when you yourselves are cause, If your pure maidens fall into the hand Of hot and forcing violation?

“Of my nation? What ish my nation? Ish a villain, and a bastard, and a knave, and a rascal. What ish my nation? Who talks of my nation.”

This is evidently one of the mistakes that often occur in printing. The second and third lines changed places, and the “Ish a” of the first line should have been at the end of what is printed as the third, whilst “What” of the second line should have gone at the end of the first.

What rein can hold licentious wickedness
 When down the hill he holds his fierce career?
 We may as bootless spend our vain command
 Upon the enraged soldiers in their spoil,
 As send precepts to the Leviathan
 To come ashore. Therefore, you men of Harfleur,
 Take pity of your town, and of your people,
 Whiles yet my soldiers are in my command:
 Whiles yet the cool and temperate wind of grace
 O'erblows the filthy and contagious clouds
 Of headly<sup>1</sup> murder, spoil, and villainy.
 If not, why, in a moment, look to see
 The blind and bloody soldier with foul hand
 Defile the locks of your shrill-shrieking daughters;
 Your fathers taken by the silver beards,
 And their most reverend heads dash'd to the walls;
 Your naked infants spitted upon pikes;
 Whiles the mad mothers with their howls confus'd
 Do break the clouds, as did the wives of Jewry
 At Herod's bloody-hunting slaughtermen.<sup>2</sup>
 What say you? will you yield, and this avoid?
 Or, guilty in defence, be thus destroy'd?

Gov. Our expectation hath this day an end:
 The Dauphin, whom of succours we entreated,
 Returns us—that his powers are yet not ready
 To raise so great a siege. Therefore, great king
 We yield our town and lives to thy soft mercy:
 Enter our gates; dispose of us and ours;
 For we no longer are defensible.

K. Hen. Open your gates.—Come, uncle Exeter,
 Go you and enter Harfleur; there remain,
 And fortify it strongly 'gainst the French:
 Use mercy to them all. For us, dear uncle,—
 The winter coming on, and sickness growing
 Upon our soldiers,—we will retire to Calais.
 To-night in Harfleur will we be your guest;
 To-morrow for the march are we adrest.

[Flourish. The KING, &c., enter the town.]

SCENE IV.—Rouen. A Room in the Palace.

Enter KATHARINE and ALICE.

Kath. <sup>a</sup> Alice, tu as été en Angleterre, et tu parles bien le langage.

Alice. Un peu, madame.

Kath. Je te prie, m'enseignes; il faut que j'apprenne à parler. Comment appelez vous, <sup>3</sup> la main, en Anglais?

Alice. La main? elle est appelée, de hand.

Kath. De hand. Et les doigts?

Alice. Les doigts? ma foi, j'oublie les doigts; mais je m'en souviendrai. Les doigts? je pense, qu'ils sont appelés de fingres; oui, de fingres.

Kath. La main, de hand; les doigts, de fingres. Je pense que je suis le bon écolier. J'ai gagné deux mots d'Anglais viteinent. Comment appelez vous les ongles?

Alice. Les ongles? nous les appelons, de nails.

Kath. De nails. Ecoutez; dites moi, si je parle bien: de hand, de fingres, de nails.

Alice. C'est bien dit, madame; il est fort bon Anglais.

Kath. Dites moi l'Anglais pour le bras.

Alice. De arm, madame.

<sup>1</sup> Headly. So the first folio. Capell conjectured deadly. Headly has the force of headstrong, rash, passionate, and applies to "spoil" as well as "murther." It is the "blind soldier" who commits these "headly" acts. The three later folios read headly.

<sup>3</sup> The French of the quartos is most amusingly corrupt. That of the folio is printed with tolerable correctness, and in our Pictorial and subsequent editions we scarcely thought it necessary to modernize the spelling.

Kath. Et le coude.

Alice. De elbow.

Kath. De elbow. Je m'en fais la répétition de tous les mots que vous m'avez appris dès à présent.

Alice. Il est trop difficile, madame, comme je pense.

Kath. Excusez moi, Alice; écoutez De hand, de fingre, de nails, de arm, de bilbow.

Alice. De elbow, madame.

Kath. O Seigneur Dieu! je m'en oublie; De elbow. Comment appelez vous le col?

Alice. De nick, madame.

Kath. De nick: Et le menton?

Alice. De chin.

Kath. De sin. Le col, de nick: le menton, de sin.

Alice. Oui. Sauf votre honneur en vérité vous prononcez les mots aussi droit que les natifs d'Angleterre.

Kath. Je ne doute point d'apprendre par la grâce de Dieu, et en peu de temps.

Alice. N'avez-vous pas déjà oublié ce que je vous ai enseigné?

Kath. Non, je reciterai à vous promptement. De hand, de fingre, de mails,—

Alice. De nails, madame.

Kath. De nails, de arme, de ilbow.

Alice. Sauf votre honneur, de elbow.

Kath. Ainsi dis je; de elbow, de nick, et de sin: Comment appelez vous le pied et la robe?

Alice. De foot, madame; et de coun.

Kath. De foot, et de coun? O Seigneur Dieu! ce sont mots de son mauvais, corruptible, grossier, et impudique, et non pour les dames d'honneur d'user: Je ne voudrais prononcer ces mots devant les Seigneurs de France, pour tout le monde. Il faut de foot, et de coun, néanmoins. Je reciterai une autre fois ma leçon ensemble: De hand, de fingre, de nails, de arm, de elbow, de nick, de sin, de foot, de coun.

Alice. Excellent, madame!

Kath. C'est assez pour une fois; allons nous à dîner.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—The same. Another Room in the same.

Enter the French KING, the DAUPHIN, DUKE OF BOURBON, the CONSTABLE of France, and others.

Fr. King. 'Tis certain he hath pass'd the river Somme.

Con. And if he be not fought withal, my lord,
 Let us not live in France; let us quit all,
 And give our vineyards to a barbarous people.

Dau. O Dieu vivant! shall a few sprays of us,—
 The emptying of our fathers' luxury,
 Our scions, put in wild and savage stock,
 Spurt up so suddenly into the clouds,
 And overlook their grafters?

Bour. Normans, but bastard Normans, Norman bastards!
Mort de ma vie! if they march along
 Unfought withal, but I will sell my dukedom,
 To buy a slobbery and a dirty farm
 In that nook-shotten<sup>4</sup> isle of Albion.

Con. Dieu de batailles! where have they this mettle?
 Is not their climate foggy, raw, and dull?
 On whom, as in despite, the sun looks pale,
 Killing their fruit with frowns? Can sodden water,
 A drench for sur-rein'd<sup>5</sup> jades, their barley broth,

<sup>4</sup> Nook-shotten. Warburton says, "Nook-shotten isle is an isle that shoots out into capes, promontories, and necks of land, the very figure of Great Britain." What, we would ask, has the form of the isle to do with the contemptuous expressions of Bourbon? Steevens supports Warburton's explanation by informing us, from Randle Holme, that a "querke is a nook-shotten pane of glass." This, we take it, is not a pane of glass shooting out into angles—"capes, promontories, and necks"—but an irregular piece of glass, adapted to the nooks of the old Gothic casements. The "nook-shotten isle of Albion" is the isle thrust into a corner apart from the rest of the world—the "penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos" of Virgil.

Decoct their cold blood to such valiant heat?
And shall our quick blood, spirited with wine,
Seem frosty? O, for honour of our land,
Let us not hang like roping icicles
Upon our houses' thatch, whiles a more frosty people
Sweat drops of gallant youth in our rich fields;
Poor, we may call them in their native lords.

Dau. By faith and honour,
Our madams mock at us; and plainly say
Our mettle is bred out; and they will give Their bodies to the lust of English youth,
To new-store France with bastard warriors.

Bour. They bid us—to the English dancing-schools,
And teach lavoltas<sup>b</sup> high, and swift corantos;
Saying, our grace is only in our heels,
And that we are most lofty runaways.

Fr. King. Where is Montjoy, the herald? speed him
hence;

Let him greet England with our sharp defiance.
Up, princes; and, with spirit of honour edg'd,
More sharper than your swords, hie to the field:
Charles De-la-bret, high constable of France;
You dukes of Orleans, Bourbon, and of Berry,
Alençon, Brabant, Bar, and Burgundy;
Jaques Chatillon, Rambures, Vaudemont,
Beaumont, Grandpré, Roussi, and Fauconberg,
Foix, Lestrade, Bouciqualt, and Charolois;
High dukes, great princes, barons, lords, and knights,
For your great seats, now quit you of great shames,
Bar Harry England, that sweeps through our land
With pennons painted in the blood of Harfleur:
Rush on his host, as doth the melted snow
Upon the valleys; whose low vassal seat
The Alps doth spit and void his rheum upon:
Go down upon him,—you have power enough,—
And in a captive chariot into Rouen
Bring him our prisoner.

Con. This becomes the great.
Sorry am I his numbers are so few,
His soldiers sick and famish'd in their march;
For, I am sure, when he shall see our army,
He'll drop his heart into the sink of fear,
And, for achievement,<sup>1</sup> offer us his ransom.

Fr. King. Therefore, lord constable, haste on Montjoy;
And let him say to England, that we send
To know what willing ransom he will give.
Prince Dauphin, you shall stay with us in Rouen.

Dau. Not so, I do beseech your majesty.

Fr. King. Be patient, for you shall remain with us.
Now, forth, lord constable, and princes all;
And quickly bring us word of England's fall. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—The English Camp in Picardy.

Enter GOWER and FLUELLEN.

Gow. How now, captain Fluellen? come you from the bridge?

Flu. I assure you, there is very excellent services committed at the pridge.

Gow. Is the duke of Exeter safe?

Flu. The duke of Exeter is as magnanimous as Agamemnon; and a man that I love and honour with my soul, and my heart, and my duty, and my life, and my living, and my uttermost power: he is not (God be praised and plessed!) any hurt in the 'orld; but keeps the pridge most valiantly, with excellent disciplines. There is an ancient there at the pridge,—I think, in my very conscience, he is as valiant a man as Mark Antony; and he is a man of no estimation in the 'orld: but I did see him do as gallant service.

<sup>1</sup> For achievement. The king, in Act IV. Sc. III., says, "Bid them achieve me." Here the Constable says that at sight of the French army Henry will offer ransom instead of achievement. This word achievement had probably some more precise meaning in the old chivalry than we now attach to it.

Gow. What do you call him?

Flu. He is called ancient Pistol.

Gow. I know him not.

Enter PISTOL.

Flu. Here is the man.

Pist. Captain, I thee beseech to do me favours:
The duke of Exeter doth love thee well.

Flu. Ay, I praise Got; and I have merited some love at his hands.

Pist. Bardolph, a soldier firm and sound of heart,
Of buxom<sup>2</sup> valour, hath,—by cruel fate,
And giddy fortune's furious fickle wheel,
That goddess blind,
That stands upon the rolling restless stone,—

Flu. By your patience, ancient Pistol. Fortune is painted plind, with a muffler before her eyes, to signify to you that fortune is plind: And she is painted also with a wheel; to signify to you, which is the moral of it, that she is turning, and inconstant, and mutability, and variation: and her foot, look you, is fixed upon a spherical stone, which rolls, and rolls, and rolls;—In good truth, the poet makes a most excellent description of it: fortune is an excellent moral.<sup>3</sup>

Pist. Fortune is Bardolph's foe, and frowns on him;
For he hath stol'n a pax, and hanged must 'a be.
A damned death!

Let gallows gape for dog, let man go free,
And let not hemp his wind-pipe suffocate:
But Exeter hath given the doom of death,
For pax<sup>c</sup> of little price.

Therefore, go speak, the duke will hear thy voice;
And let not Bardolph's vital thread be cut
With edge of penny cord, and vile reproach:
Speak, captain, for his life, and I will thee requite.

Flu. Ancient Pistol, I do partly understand your meaning.

Pist. Why, then rejoice therefore.

Flu. Certainly, ancient, it is not a thing to rejoice at: for if, look you, he were my brother, I would desire the duke to use his goot pleasure, and put him to executions; for disciplines ought to be used.

Pist. Die and be damn'd; and figo for thy friendship.

Flu. It is well.

Pist. The fig of Spain!

[Exit PISTOL.]

Flu. Very good.

Gow. Why, this is an arrant counterfeit rascal; I remember him now; a bawd; a cutpurse.

Flu. I'll assure you, 'a utter'd as prave 'ords at the pridge, as you shall see in a summer's day: But it is very well; what he has spoke to me, that is well, I warrant you, when time is serve.

Gow. Why, 'tis a gull, a fool, a rogue; that now and then goes to the wars, to grace himself, at his return into London, under the form of a soldier. And such fellows are perfect in great commanders' names: and they will learn you by rote where services were done;—at such and such a sconce,<sup>4</sup> at such a breach, at such a convoy; who came off bravely, who was shot, who disgraced, what terms the enemy stood on; and this they con perfectly in the phrase of war, which they trick up with new-tuned oaths: And what a beard of the general's cut,<sup>d</sup> and a horrid suit of the camp, will do among foaming bottles and ale-washed wits, is wonderful to be thought on! But you must learn to know such slanders of the age, or else you may be marvelously mistook.

<sup>3</sup> The ordinary reading here, and in other parts of this scene, was, as Malone says without apology, "made out of two copies, the quarto and the first folio."

Flu. I tell you what, captain Gower,—I do perceive he is not the man that he would gladly make show to the 'orld he is; if I find a hole in his coat, I will tell him my mind. [Drum heard.] Hark you, the king is coming; and I must speak with him from the pridge.

Enter KING HENRY, GLOSTER, and Soldiers.

Flu. Got pless your majesty!

K. Hen. How now, Fluellen? camest thou from the bridge?

Flu. Ay, so please your majesty. The duke of Exeter has very gallantly maintained the pridge: the French is gone off, look you; and there is gallant and most prave passages: Marry, th'athversary was have possession of the pridge; but he is enforced to retire, and the duke of Exeter is master of the pridge: I can tell your majesty, the duke is a prave man.

K. Hen. What men have you lost, Fluellen?

Flu. The perdition of th'athversary hath been very great, reasonable great: marry, for my part, I think the duke hath lost never a man, but one that is like to be executed for robbing a church, one Bardolph, if your majesty know the man: his face is all bubukles, and whelks, and knobs, and flames of fire; and his lips plows at his nose, and it is like a coal of fire, sometimes plue, and sometimes red; but his nose is executed, and his fire's out.

K. Hen. We would have all such offenders so cut off:—and we give express charge, that, in our marches through the country, there be nothing compelled from the villages, nothing taken but paid for, none of the French upbraided or abused in disdainful language; For when lenity and cruelty play for a kingdom, the gentler gamester is the soonest winner.

Tucket sounds. Enter MONTJOY.

Mont. You know me by my habit.

K. Hen. Well then, I know thee; What shall I know of thee?

Mont. My master's mind.

K. Hen. Unfold it.

Mont. Thus says my king:—Say thou to Harry of England, Though we seemed dead, we did but sleep: Advantage is a better soldier than rashness. Tell him, we could have rebuked him at Harfleur: but that we thought not good to bruise an injury till it were full ripe:—now we speak upon our cue, and our voice is imperial: England shall repent his folly, see his weakness, and admire our sufferance. Bid him, therefore, consider of his ransom: which must proportion the losses we have borne, the subjects we have lost, the disgrace we have digested; which, in weight to re-answer, his pettiness would bow under. For our losses, his exchequer is too poor; for the effusion of our blood, the muster of his kingdom too faint a number; and for our disgrace, his own person, kneeling at our feet, but a weak and worthless satisfaction. To this add—defiance: and tell him, for conclusion, he hath betrayed his followers, whose condemnation is pronounced. So far my king and master, so much my office.

K. Hen. What is thy name? I know thy quality.

Mont. Montjoy.

K. Hen. Thou dost thy office fairly. Turn thee back, And tell thy king,—I do not seek him now; But could be willing to march on to Calais Without impeachment: for, to say the sooth, (Though 'tis no wisdom to confess so much Unto an enemy of craft and vantage,) My people are with sickness much enfeebled; My numbers lessen'd; and those few I have Almost no better than so many French, Who when they were in health, I tell thee, herald, I thought upon one pair of English legs Did march three Frenchmen.—Yet, forgive me, God, That I do brag thus!—this your air of France Hath blown that vice in me; I must repent. Go, therefore, tell thy master, here I am; My ransom is this frail and worthless trunk; My army but a weak and sickly guard; Yet, God before,<sup>1</sup> tell him we will come on, Though France himself, and such another neighbour, Stand in our way. There's for thy labour, Montjoy.<sup>e</sup> Go bid thy master well advise himself: If we may pass, we will; if we be hinder'd, We shall ycur tawny ground with your red blood Discolour: and so, Montjoy, fare you well. The sum of all our answer is but this: We would not seek a battle as we are: Nor as we are, we say we will not shun it; So tell your master.

Mont. I shall deliver so. Thanks to your highness.

[Exit MONTJOY.]

Glo. I hope they will not come upon us now.

K. Hen. We are in God's hand, brother, not in theirs. March to the bridge; it now draws toward night,— Beyond the river we'll encamp ourselves; And on to-morrow bid them march away. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.—The French Camp, near Agincourt.

Enter the CONSTABLE of France, the LORD RAMBURES, the DUKE OF ORLEANS, DAUPHIN, and others.

Con. Tut! I have the best armour of the world.—'Would it were day!

Orl. You have an excellent armour; but let my horse have his due.

Con. It is the best horse of Europe.

Orl. Will it never be morning?

Dau. My lord of Orleans, and my lord high constable, you talk of horse and armour.

Orl. You are as well provided of both as any prince in the world.

Dau. What a long night is this!—I will not change my horse with any that treads but on four pasterns. Ça, ha! He bounds from the earth as if his entrails were hairs; le cheval volant, the Pegasus, qui a les narines de feu! When I bestride him I soar, I am a hawk: he trots the air; the earth sings when he touches it; the basest horn of his hoof is more musical than the pipe of Hermes.

Orl. He's of the colour of the nutmeg.

Dau. And of the heat of the ginger. It is a beast for Perseus: he is pure air and fire; and the dull elements of earth and water never appear in him, but only in patient stillness, while his rider mounts him: he is, indeed, a horse; and all other jades you may call beasts.<sup>2</sup>

Con. Indeed, my lord, it is a most absolute and excellent horse.

<sup>1</sup> God before—God being my guide. The same expression, when used to a parting friend, implied, God be thy guide. The "prevent us, O Lord" of the Liturgy is go before us.

<sup>2</sup> The precise meaning of the word jade has led to much discussion upon this passage. Warburton boldly says, "It is plain that jades and beasts should change places, it being the first word, and not the last, which is the term of

Dau. It is the prince of palfreys; his neigh is like the bidding of a monarch, and his countenance enforces homage.

Orl. No more, cousin.

Dau. Nay, the man hath no wit that cannot, from the rising of the lark to the lodging of the lamb, vary deserved praise on my palfrey: it is a theme as fluent as the sea; turn the sands into eloquent tongues, and my horse is argument for them all: 'tis a subject for a sovereign to reason on, and for a sovereign's sovereign to ride on: and for the world (familiar to us, and unknown,) to lay apart their particular functions, and wonder at him. I once writ a sonnet in his praise, and began thus:—"Wonder of nature,"—

Orl. I have heard a sonnet begin so to one's mistress.

Dau. Then did they imitate that which I composed to my courser; for my horse is my mistress.

Orl. Your mistress bears well.

Dau. Me well; which is the prescript praise and perfection of a good and particular mistress.

Con. Nay, for methought, yesterday, your mistress shrewdly shook your back.

Dau. So, perhaps, did yours.

Con. Mine was not bridled.

Dau. O! then, belike, she was old and gentle; and you rode, like a kerne of Ireland, your French hose off, and in your straight trossers.<sup>f</sup>

Con. You have good judgment in horsemanship.

Dau. Be warned by me then: they that ride so, and ride not warily, fall into foul bogs; I had rather have my horse to my mistress.

Con. I had as lief have my mistress a jade.

Dau. I tell thee, constable, my mistress wears her own hair.

Con. I could make as true a boast as that, if I had a sow to my mistress.

Dau. Le chien est retourné à son propre vomissement, et la truie lavée au boubier: thou makest use of anything.

Con. Yet do I not use my horse for my mistress; or any such proverb, so little kin to the purpose.

Ram. My lord constable, the armour that I saw in your tent to-night, are those stars, or suns, upon it?

Con. Stars, my lord.

Dau. Some of them will fall to-morrow, I hope.

Con. And yet my sky shall not want.

Dau. That may be, for you bear a many superfluously; and 'twere more honour some were away.

Con. Even as your horse bears your praises; who would trot as well were some of your brags dismounted.

Dau. 'Would I were able to load him with his desert! Will it never be day? I will trot to-morrow a mile, and my way shall be paved with English faces.

Con. I will not say so, for fear I should be faced out of my way: But I would it were morning, for I would fain be about the ears of the English.

Ram. Who will go to hazard with me for twenty prisoners?

Con. You must first go yourself to hazard, ere you have them.

Dau. 'Tis midnight, I'll go arm myself. [Exit.]

Orl. The Dauphin longs for morning.

Ram. He longs to eat the English.

Con. I think he will eat all he kills.

reproach." But jade was not always a term of reproach; whereas beast, as applied to a horse or a dog, still is so. It is probable that jade originally meant a tired horse; a horse that has yade (gone). There is a passage in Ford that shows that after Shakspeare's time jade was not used to express a sorry horse:—

"Like high-fed jades upon a tilting day
In antique trappings."

In Henry IV., Part II., the following passage appears decisive as to Shakspeare's interpretation of the word:—

"He gave his able horse the head,
And, bending forward, struck his armed heels
Against the panting sides of the poor jade."

We are well content with the passage as it stands.

Orl. By the white hand of my lady, he's a gallant prince.

Con. Swear by her foot, that she may tread out the oath.

Orl. He is, simply, the most active gentleman of France.

Con. Doing is activity; and he will still be doing.

Orl. He never did harm, that I heard of.

Con. Nor will do none to-morrow: he will keep that good name still.

Orl. I know him to be valiant.

Con. I was told that, by one that knows him better than you.

Orl. What's he?

Con. Marry, he told me so himself; and he said, he cared not who knew it.

Orl. He needs not, it is no hidden virtue in him.

Con. By my faith, sir, but it is; never anybody saw it, but his lackey: 'tis a hooded valour; and, when it appears, it will bate.<sup>1</sup>

Orl. Ill will never said well.

Con. I will cap that proverb with—There is flattery in friendship.

Orl. And I will take up that with—Give the devil his due.

Con. Well placed; there stands your friend for the devil: have at the very eye of that proverb, with—A pox of the devil.

Orl. You are the better at proverbs, by how much—A fool's bolt is soon shot.

Con. You have shot over.

Orl. 'Tis not the first time you were overshot.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My lord high constable, the English lie within fifteen hundred paces of your tents.

Con. Who hath measured the ground?

Mess. The lord Grandpré.

Con. A valiant and most expert gentleman.—Would it were day!—Alas, poor Harry of England! he longs not for the dawning, as we do.

Orl. What a wretched and peevish fellow is this king of England, to mope with his fat-brained followers so far out of his knowledge!

Con. If the English had any apprehension they would run away.

Orl. That they lack; for if their heads had any intellectual armour they could never wear such heavy head-pieces.

Ram. That island of England breeds very valiant creatures; their mastiffs are of unmatchable courage.

Orl. Foolish curs! that run winking into the mouth of a Russian bear, and have their heads crushed like rotten apples: You may as well say,—that's a valiant flea, that dare eat his breakfast on the lip of a lion.

Con. Just, just; and the men do sympathize with the mastiffs, in robustious and rough coming-on, leaving their wits with their wives: and then give them great meals of beef, and iron and steel, they will eat like wolves, and fight like devils.

Orl. Ay, but these English are shrewdly out of beef.

Con. Then shall we find to-morrow, they have only stomachs to eat and none to fight. Now is it time to arm: Come, shall we about it?

Orl. It is now two o'clock: but, let me see,—by ten, We shall have each a hundred Englishmen.<sup>2</sup> [Exeunt.]

<sup>2</sup> This scene is greatly extended in the folio, as compared with the quartos. With all respect to Pope's opinion that it is "shorter and better" in the quartos, we think that it is greatly improved by the extension. For example, from the speech of Orleans, "What a wretched and peevish fellow is this king of England," &c., to the conclusion of the act, is wanting in the quartos. Never were national prejudices more cleverly and good-naturedly exposed than in this short dialogue. "If the English had any apprehension they would run away," is a reproach that we have had to endure on many subsequent occasions, when the "mastiffs" did not know when they were beaten.

ACT IV.

CHORUS.

Now entertain conjecture of a time,
 When creeping murmur, and the poring dark,
 Fills the wide vessel of the universe.<sup>a</sup>
 From camp to camp, through the foul womb of night
 The hum of either army stilly sounds,
 That the fix'd sentinels almost receive
 The secret whispers of each other's watch:
 Fire answers fire: and through their paly flames
 Each battle sees the other's umber'd<sup>b</sup> face:
 Steed threatens steed, in high and boastful neighs
 Piercing the night's dull ear; and from the tents,
 The armourers, accomplishing the knights,
 With busy hammers closing rivets up,<sup>c</sup>
 Give dreadful note of preparation.
 The country cocks do crow, the clocks do toll,
 And the third hour of drowsy morning name.<sup>1</sup>
 Proud of their numbers, and secure in soul,
 The confident and over-lusty French
 Do the low-rated English play at dice;
 And chide the cripple tardy-gaited night,
 Who, like a foul and ugly witch, doth limp
 So tediously away. The poor condemned English,
 Like sacrifices, by their watchful fires
 Sit patiently, and inly ruminate
 The morning's danger; and their gesture sad
 Investing lank-lean cheeks, and war-worn coats,
 Presenteth them unto the gazing moon
 So many horrid ghosts. O, now, who will behold
 The royal captain of this ruin'd band,
 Walking from watch to watch, from tent to tent,
 Let him cry—Praise and glory on his head!
 For forth he goes, and visits all his host;
 Bids them good-morrow, with a modest smile:
 And calls them—brothers, friends, and countrymen.
 Upon his royal face there is no note
 How dread an army hath enrounded him;
 Nor doth he dedicate one jot of colour
 Unto the weary and all-watched night:
 But freshly looks, and overbears attaint
 With cheerful semblance and sweet majesty;
 That every wretch, pining and pale before,
 Beholding him, plucks comfort from his looks:
 A largess universal, like the sun,
 His liberal eye doth give to every one,
 Thawing cold fear, that mean and gentle all
 Behold (as may unworthiness define)
 A little touch of Harry in the night:
 And so our scene must to the battle fly;
 Where, (O for pity!) we shall much disgrace—
 With four or five most vile and ragged foils,
 Right ill dispos'd in brawl ridiculous,—
 The name of Agincourt: Yet, sit and see;
 Minding true things by what their mockeries be.

SCENE I.—The English Camp at Agincourt.

Enter KING HENRY, BEDFORD, and GLOSTER.

K. Hen. Gloster, 'tis true, that we are in great danger;
 The greater therefore should our courage be.
 Good morrow, brother Bedford.—God Almighty!
 There is some soul of goodness in things evil,
 Would men observingly distil it out;

“Then mean, and gentle all,
 Behold,” &c.

Our text is from the folio. “Mean and gentle all” we think applies to the army.

For our bad neighbour makes us early stirrers,
 Which is both healthful and good husbandry:
 Besides, they are our outward consciences,
 And preachers to us all; admonishing
 That we should dress us<sup>3</sup> fairly for our end.
 Thus may we gather honey from the weed,
 And make a moral of the devil himself.

Enter ERPINGHAM.

Good morrow, old sir Thomas Erpingham:
 A good soft pillow for that good white head
 Were better than a churlish turf of France.

Erp. Not so, my liege; this lodging likes me better,
 Since I may say, now lie I like a king.

K. Hen. 'Tis good for men to love their present pains,
 Upon example; so the spirit is eased:
 And, when the mind is quicken'd, out of doubt,
 The organs, though defunct and dead before,
 Break up their drowsy grave, and newly move
 With casted slough and fresh legerity.
 Lend me thy cloak, sir Thomas.—Brothers both,
 Commend me to the princes in our camp;
 Do my good morrow to them; and, anon,
 Desire them all to my pavilion.

Glo. We shall, my liege.

[Exeunt GLOSTER and BEDFORD.]

Erp. Shall I attend your grace?

K. Hen. No, my good knight;
 Go with my brothers to my lords of England:
 I and my bosom must debate awhile,
 And then I would no other company.

Erp. The Lord in heaven bless thee, noble Harry!

[Exit ERPINGHAM.]

K. Hen. God-a-mercy, old heart! thou speakest cheerfully.<sup>4</sup>

Enter PISTOL.

Pist. Qui va là?

K. Hen. A friend.

Pist. Discuss unto me; Art thou officer?
 Or art thou base, common, and popular?

K. Hen. I am a gentleman of a company.

Pist. Trail'st thou the puissant pike?

K. Hen. Even so: What are you?

Pist. As good a gentleman as the emperor.

K. Hen. Then you are better than the king.

Pist. The king's a bawcock, and a heart of gold,
 A lad of life, an imp of fame;

Of parents good, of fist most valiant:

I kiss his dirty shoe, and from my heart-string

I love the lovely bully. What's thy name?

K. Hen. Harry le Roy.

Pist. Le Roy! a Cornish name; art thou of Cornish crew?

K. Hen. No, I am a Welshman.

Pist. Knowest thou Fluellen?

K. Hen. Yes.

Pist. Tell him, I'll knock his leek about his pate, Upon Saint Davy's day.

K. Hen. Do not you wear your dagger in your cap that day, lest he knock that about yours.

Pist. Art thou his friend?

K. Hen. And his kinsman too.

Pist. The figo for thee, then!

K. Hen. I thank you: God be with you!

Pist. My name is Pistol called.

K. Hen. It sorts well with your fierceness.

[Exit.]

<sup>3</sup> Dress us. Malone prints this 'dress us—an abbreviation of address. To dress is to set in order, to prepare, in its primary meaning—the sense of the passage before us.

<sup>4</sup> All this fine scene, as well as the chorus, is wanting in the quarto, which begins with Pistol's qui va là?

Enter FLUELLEN and GOWER, severally.

Gow. Captain Fluëilen!

Flu. So! in the name of Cheshu Christ, speak fewer.<sup>1</sup> It is the greatest admiration in the universal 'orld, when the true and auncient prerogatifes and laws of the wars is not kept: if you would take the pains but to examine the wars of Pompey the Great, you shall find, I warrant you, that there is no tiddle taddle, nor pibble pabble, in Pompey's camp; I warrant you, you shall find the ceremonies of the wars, and the cares of it, and the forms of it, and the sobriety of it, and the modesty of it, to be otherwise.

Gow. Why, the enemy is loud; you hear him all night.

Flu. If the enemy is an ass, and a fool, and a prating coxcomb, is it meet, think you, that we should also, look you, be an ass, and a fool, and a prating coxcomb; in your own conscience now?

Gow. I will speak lower.

Flu. I pray you, and beseech you, that you will.

[Exeunt GOWER and FLUELLEN.]

K. Hen. Though it appear a little out of fashion, There is much care and valour in this Welshman.

Enter three Soldiers, JOHN BATES, ALEXANDER COURT, and MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

Court. Brother John Bates, is not that the morning which breaks yonder?

Bates. I think it be: but we have no great cause to desire the approach of day.

Will. We see yonder the beginning of the day, but, I think, we shall never see the end of it.—Who goes there?

K. Hen. A friend.

Will. Under what captain serve you?

K. Hen. Under sir Thomas Erpingham.

Will. A good old commander and a most kind gentleman: I pray you, what thinks he of our estate?

K. Hen. Even as men wracked upon a sand, that look to be washed off the next tide.

Bates. He hath not told his thought to the king?

K. Hen. No; nor it is not meet he should. For, though I speak it to you, I think the king is but a man, as I am; the violet smells to him as it doth to me; the element shows to him as it doth to me; all his senses have but human conditions: his ceremonies laid by, in his nakedness he appears but a man; and though his affections are higher mounted than ours, yet, when they stoop, they stoop with the like wing;<sup>2</sup> therefore, when he sees reason of fears, as we do, his fears, out of doubt, be of the same relish as ours are: Yet, in reason, no man should possess him with any appearance of fear, lest he, by showing it, should dishearten his army.

Bates. He may show what outward courage he will: but, I believe, as cold a night as 'tis, he could wish himself in Thames up to the neck; and so I would he were, and I by him, at all adventures, so we were quit here.

K. Hen. By my troth, I will speak my conscience of the king; I think he would not wish himself anywhere but where he is.

Bates. Then I would he were here alone; so should he be sure to be ransomed, and a many poor men's lives saved.

K. Hen. I dare say you love him not so ill to wish him here alone, howsoever you speak this to feel other men's minds: Methinks, I could not die anywhere so contented as in the king's company; his cause being just and his quarrel honourable.

Will. That's more than we know.

Bates. Ay, or more than we should seek after; for we know enough if we know we are the king's subjects; if his cause be wrong, our obedience to the king wipes the crime of it out of us.

Will. But if the cause be not good, the king himself hath a heavy reckoning to make; when all those legs, and arms, and heads, chopped off in a battle, shall join together at the latter day, and cry all—We died at such a place; some, swearing; some, crying for a surgeon; some, upon their wives left poor behind them; some, upon the debts they owe; some, upon their children rawly left. I am afraid there are few die well that die in a battle; for how can they charitably dispose of anything when blood is their argument? Now, if these men do not die well, it will be a black matter for the king that led them to it; whom to disobey were against all proportion of subjection.

K. Hen. So, if a son, that is by his father sent about merchandise, do sinfully miscarry upon the sea, the imputation of his wickedness, by your rule, should be imposed upon his father that sent him: or if a servant, under his master's command, transporting a sum of money, be assailed by robbers, and die in many irreconciled iniquities, you may call the business of the master the author of the servant's damnation:—But this is not so: the king is not bound to answer the particular endings of his soldiers, the father of his son, nor the master of his servant; for they purpose not their death when they purpose their services. Besides, there is no king, be his cause never so spotless, if it come to the arbitrement of swords, can try it out with all unspotted soldiers. Some, peradventure, have on them the guilt of premeditated and contrived murder; some, of beguiling virgins with the broken seals of perjury; some, making the wars their bulwark, that have before gored the gentle bosom of peace with pillage and robbery. Now, if these men have defeated the law, and outrun native punishment, though they can outstrip men they have no wings to fly from God: war is his beadle, war is his vengeance; so that here men are punished, for before-breach of the king's laws, in now the king's quarrel: where they feared the death they have borne life away and where they would be safe they perish: Then if they die unprovided, no more is the king guilty of their damnation, than he was before guilty of those impieties for the which they are now visited. Every subject's duty is the king's; but every subject's soul is his own. Therefore should every soldier in the wars do as every sick man in his bed, wash every mote out of his conscience: and dying so, death is to him advantage; or not dying, the time was blessedly lost, wherein such preparation was gained: and in him that escapes it were not sin to think that making God so free an offer, he let him outlive that day to see his greatness, and to teach others how they should prepare.

Will. 'Tis certain, every man that dies ill the ill is upon his own head, the king is not to answer it.

Bates. I do not desire he should answer for me; and yet I determine to fight lustily for him.

K. Hen. I myself heard the king say he would not be ransomed.

Will. Ay, he said so, to make us fight cheerfully: but, when our throats are cut, he may be ransomed, and we ne'er the wiser.

K. Hen. If I live to see it, I will never trust his word after.

<sup>1</sup> Fewer. So the folio. The first quarto has lower, which afterwards became lower. But to "speak few" is a provincial phrase, meaning to speak low; and therefore proper in the mouth of Fluellen. Gower with equal propriety answers, "I will speak lower."

<sup>2</sup> Mounted and stoop are terms of falconry. Thus in an old song quoted by Percy—

"She fieth at one
Her mark jump upon,
And mounteth the welkin clear:
Then right she stoops
When the falconer he whoops,
Triumphing in her chanticleer."

Will. You pay him then! That's a perilous shot out of an elder gun, that a poor and private displeasure can do against a monarch! you may as well go about to turn the sun to ice, with fanning in his face with a peacock's feather. You'll never trust his word after! come, 'tis a foolish saying.

K. Hen. Your reproof is something too round; I should be angry with you, if the time were convenient.

Will. Let it be a quarrel between us, if you live.

K. Hen. I embrace it.

Will. How shall I know thee again?

K. Hen. Give me any gage of thine, and I will wear it in my bonnet: then, if ever thou darest acknowledge it, I will make it my quarrel.

Will. Here's my glove; give me another of thine.

K. Hen. There.

Will. This will I also wear in my cap; if ever thou come to me and say, after to-morrow, "This is my glove," by this hand, I will take thee a box on the ear.

K. Hen. If ever I live to see it I will challenge it.

Will. Thou darest as well be hanged.

K. Hen. Well, I will do it, though I take thee in the king's company.

Will. Keep thy word: fare thee well.

Bates. Be friends, you English fools, be friends; we have French quarrels enough, if you could tell how to reckon.

K. Hen. Indeed, the French may lay twenty French crowns to one they will beat us; for they bear them on their shoulders: But it is no English treason to cut French crowns; and, to-morrow, the king himself will be a clipper.

[Exeunt Soldiers.]

Upon the king! let us our lives, our souls,

Our debts, our careful wives,

Our children, and our sins, lay on the king:

We must bear all.

O hard condition! twin-born with greatness,

Subject to the breath of every fool, whose sense

No more can feel but his own wringing!<sup>1</sup>

What infinite heart's ease must kings neglect,

That private men enjoy!

And what have kings that privates have not too,

Save ceremony, save general ceremony?

And what art thou, thou idol ceremony?

What kind of god art thou, that suffer'st more

Of mortal griefs than do thy worshippers?

What are thy rents? what are thy comings-in?

O ceremony, show me but thy worth!

What is thy soul of adoration?<sup>2</sup>

Art thou aught else but place, degree, and form,

Creating awe and fear in other men?

Wherein thou art less happy being fear'd

Than they in fearing.

We print these six lines as in the folio. The speech is altogether wanting in the quarto. In the variorum editions it is altered as follows:—

"Upon the king! let us our lives, our souls,
Our debts, our careful wives, our children, and
Our sins, lay on the king: we must bear all.
O hard condition! twin-born with greatness,
Subjected to the breath of every fool,
Whose sense no more can feel but his own wringing."

Stevens says, "For the sake of the metre I have not scrupled to read subjected."

<sup>2</sup> We print this as in the original: "What is thy soul," &c. This, according to the commentators, is "incorrect"—"a mistake." Johnson would read—"What is thy soul, O adoration?" Malone reads, "What is the soul of adoration?" These appear to us weak "amendments." Ceremony is apostrophized throughout this magnificent address. To read "O adoration," or "the soul of adoration," is to introduce a new impersonation, breaking the continuity which runs through fifty lines. Thy soul of adoration, O ceremony, is—thy inmost spirit of adoration. Is thy worth, thy very soul of homage, anything but "place, degree, and form?"

"It shall advantage more than do us wrong."

What drink'st thou oft, instead of homage sweet,
But poison'd flattery? O, be sick, great greatness,
And bid thy ceremony give thee cure!
Think'st thou, the fiery fever will go out
With titles blown from adulation?
Will it give place to flexure and low bending?
Canst thou, when thou command'st the beggar's knee,
Command the health of it? No, thou proud dream
That play'st so subtly with a king's repose;
I am a king that find thee; and I know,
'Tis not the balm, the sceptre, and the ball,
The sword, the mace, the crown imperial,
The inter-tissued robe of gold and pearl,
The farced title running 'fore the king,<sup>3</sup>
The throne he sits on, nor the tide of pomp
That beats upon the high shore of this world,
No, not all these, thrice-gorgeous ceremony,
Not all these, laid in bed majestical,
Can sleep so soundly as the wretched slave;
Who, with a body fill'd, and vacant mind,
Gets him to rest, cramm'd with distressful bread:
Never sees horrid night, the child of hell;
But, like a lackey, from the rise to set,
Sweats in the eye of Phœbus, and all night
Sleeps in Elysium; next day, after dawn,
Doth rise, and help Hyperion to his horse;
And follows so the ever-running year
With profitable labour, to his grave:
And, but for ceremony, such a wretch,
Winding up days with toil and nights with sleep,
Had the fore-hand and vantage of a king.
The slave, a member of the country's peace,
Enjoys it; but in gross brain little wots
What watch the king keeps to maintain the peace
Whose hours the peasant best advantages.

Enter ERPINGHAM.

Erp. My lord, your nobles, jealous of your absence,
Seek through your camp to find you.

K. Hen. Good old knight,
Collect them all together at my tent:
I'll be before thee.

Erp. I shall do 't, my lord. [Exit.]

K. Hen. O God of battles! steel my soldiers' hearts!
Possess them not with fear! Take from them now
The sense of reckoning of the opposed numbers!
Pluck their hearts from them not to-day, O Lord,
O not to-day! Think not upon the fault
My father made in compassing the crown!<sup>5</sup>

"O God of battles! steel my soldiers' hearts!
Possess them not with fear; take from them now
The sense of reckoning, if the opposed numbers
Pluck their hearts from them.—Not to-day, O Lord,
O not to-day, think not upon the fault
My father made in compassing the crown."

Tyrwhitt changed the of in the folio to if, and removed a colon after numbers. Theobald had previously changed of into lest. The reading of the quarto is the following:—

"O God of battles! steel my soldiers' hearts.
Take from them now the sense of reckoning,
That the opposed multitudes which stand before them
May not appal their courage.
O not to-day, not to-day, O God,
Think on the fault my father made
In compassing the crown."

In reading

"Pluck their hearts from them not to-day, O Lord, O not to-day. Think not," &c., we have deviated from the punctuation of the folio, as well as from the connection in the quarto between "to-day" and "the fault." The Cambridge editors have a very ingenious suggestion. "Perhaps a line has been lost, which, by help of the quartos, we may supply thus:—

'Take from them now
The sense of reckoning of the opposed numbers,
Lest that the multitudes that stand before them
Pluck their hearts from them.'

I Richard's body have interred new ;
 And on it have bestow'd more contrite tears
 Than from it issued forced drops of blood.
 Five hundred poor I have in yearly pay,
 Who twice a day their wither'd hands hold up
 Toward heaven, to pardon blood ; and I have built
 Two chantries, where the sad and solemn priests
 Sing still for Richard's soul. More will I do ;
 Though all that I can do is nothing worth ;
 Since that my penitence comes after all,
 Imploring pardon.<sup>1</sup>

Enter GLOSTER.

Glo. My liege !

K. Hen. My brother Gloster's voice :—Ay ;
 I know thy errand, I will go with thee :—
 The day, my friends, and all things stay for me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The French Camp.<sup>2</sup>

Enter DAUPHIN, ORLEANS, RAMBURES, and others.

Orl. The sun doth gild our armour ; up, my lords.

Dau. Montez à cheval :—My horse ! valet ! laquais ! ha !

Orl. O brave spirit !

Dau. Via !—les eaux et la terre—

Orl. Rien puis ? l'air et le feu—

Dau. Ciel ! cousin Orleans.—

Enter CONSTABLE.

Now, my lord constable !

Con. Hark, how our steeds for present service neigh.

Dau. Mount them, and make incision in their hides ;
 That their hot blood may spin in English eyes,
 And doubt<sup>3</sup> them with superfluous courage : Ha !

Ram. What, will you have them weep our horses' blood ?
 How shall we then behold their natural tears ?

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. The English are embattled, you French peers.

Con. To horse, you gallant princes ! straight to horse !
 Do but behold yon poor and starved band,
 And your fair show shall suck away their souls,
 Leaving them but the shales and husks of men.
 There is not work enough for all our hands ;
 Scarce blood enough in all their sickly veins,
 To give each naked curtle-axe a stain,
 That our French gallants shall to-day draw out,
 And sheath for lack of sport : let us but blow on them,
 The vapour of our valour will o'erturn them.
 'Tis positive 'gainst all exceptions, lords,
 That our superfluous lackeys, and our peasants,—
 Who, in unnecessary action, swarm
 About our squares of battle,—were enow
 To purge this field of such a hilding foe :

Though we upon this mountain's basis by
 Took stand for idle speculation :
 But that our honours must not. What's to say ?
 A very little little let us do,
 And all is done. Then let the trumpets sound
 The tucket-sonaunce and the note to mount :<sup>4</sup>
 For our approach shall so much dare the field
 That England shall couch down in fear, and yield.

Enter GRANDPRÉ.

Grand. Why do you stay so long, my lords of France ?
 Yon island carrions, desperate of their bones,
 Ill-favour'dly become the morning field :
 Their ragged curtains poorly are let loose,
 And our air shakes them passing scornfully.
 Big Mars seems bankrout in their beggar'd host,
 And faintly through a rusty beaver peeps.
 The horsemen sit like fixed candlesticks
 With torch-staves in their hand ; and their poor jades
 Lob down their heads, dropping the hides and hips ;
 The gum down-roping from their pale-dead eyes ;
 And in their pale dull mouths the gimmal bit
 Lies foul with chaw'd grass, still and motionless ;
 And their executors, the knavish crows,
 Fly o'er them all, impatient for their hour.
 Description cannot suit itself in words,
 To demonstrate the life of such a battle,
 In life so lifeless as it shows itself.

Con. They have said their prayers, and they stay for death.

Dau. Shall we go send them dinners, and fresh suits,
 And give their fasting horses provender,
 And after fight with them ?

Con. I stay but for my guidon.<sup>5</sup> To the field
 I will the banner from a trumpet take,
 And use it for my haste. Come, come away !
 The sun is high, and we outwear the day. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The English Camp.

Enter the English Host ; GLOSTER, BEDFORD, EXETER, SALISBURY, and WESTMORELAND.

Glo. Where is the king ?

Bed. The king himself is rode to view their battle.

West. Of fighting men they have full threescore thousand.

Exe. There's five to one ; besides, they all are fresh.

Sal. God's arm strike with us ! 'tis a fearful odds.
 God be wi' you, princes all ; I'll to my charge :
 If we no more meet till we meet in heaven,
 Then, joyfully ;—my noble lord of Bedford,
 My dear lord Gloster, and my good lord Exeter,
 And my kind kinsman, warriors all—adieu !

Bed. Farewell, good Salisbury ; and good luck go with thee !

"I stay but for my guard. On, to the field."

It was communicated to us in 1842, by Dr. Hawtrey, then head master of Eton, that the Provost of King's, Dr. Thackeray, had proposed a new reading. That emendation we adopted, without hesitation, in our Library Edition. One cannot see how the banner taken from a trumpet would be a substitute for the Constable's guard. The guidon was a leader's standard. In Drayton's "Polyolbion" we have—

"The king of England's self, and his renowned son, Under his guidon marched."

In the engraved roll of the funeral procession of Sir Philip Sidney, from the drawings of Thomas Lant, we have a representation of a standard half rolled round the end of a spear, with the words underneath, "guidon trailed." The Cambridge editors say—"The conjectural reading guidon : for guard : on, which we have adopted, and which is attributed by recent editors to Dr. Thackeray, late Provost of King's College, Cambridge, is found in Rann's edition, without any name attached. Dr. Thackeray probably made the conjecture independently. We find it written in pencil on the margin of his copy of Nares's Glossary, under the word 'Guard.'"

Exc. Farewell, kind lord, fight valiantly to-day;
And yet I do thee wrong to mind thee of it,
For thou art framed of the firm truth of valour.<sup>1</sup>

[Exit SALISBURY.]

Bed. He is as full of valour as of kindness;
Princely in both.

West. O that we now had here

Enter KING HENRY.

But one ten thousand of those men in England
That do no work to-day!

K. Hen. What's he that wishes so?
My cousin Westmoreland?—No, my fair cousin:
If we are mark'd to die, we are enow
To do our country loss; and if to live,
The fewer men the greater share of honour.
God's will! I pray thee, wish not one man more.
By Jove, I am not covetous for gold;
Nor care I who doth feed upon my cost;
It yearns me not if men my garments wear;
Such outward things dwell not in my desires:
But if it be a sin to covet honour,
I am the most offending soul alive.
No, 'faith, my coz, wish not a man from England:
God's peace! I would not lose so great an honour,
As one man more, methinks, would share from me,
For the best hope I have. O, do not wish one more:
Rather proclaim it, Westmoreland, through my host,
That he which hath no stomach to this fight
Let him depart; his passport shall be made,
And crowns for convoy put into his purse:
We would not die in that man's company
That fears his fellowship to die with us.
This day is call'd the feast of Crispian:
He that outlives this day, and comes safe home,
Will stand a tip-toe when this day is nam'd,
And rouse him at the name of Crispian.
He that shall see this day, and live old age,<sup>2</sup>
Will yearly on the vigil feast his neighbours,<sup>3</sup>
And say, to-morrow is Saint Crispian:
Then will he strip his sleeve and show his scars:<sup>4</sup>
Old men forget; yet all shall be forgot,
But he'll remember, with advantages,
What feast he did that day: Then shall our names,
Familiar in his mouth<sup>5</sup> as household words,—
Harry the king, Bedford and Exeter,
Warwick and Talbot, Salisbury and Gloster,—
Be in their flowing cups freshly remember'd:
This story shall the good man teach his son;
And Crispin Crispian shall ne'er go by,
From this day to the ending of the world,
But we in it shall be remembered:
We few, we happy few, we band of brothers;
For he to-day that sheds his blood with me
Shall be my brother; be he ne'er so vile,
This day shall gentle his condition:
And gentlemen in England, now a-bed,

In the folio the lines stand thus:—

“Bed. Farewell, good Salisbury, and good luck go with thee:
And yet I do thee wrong to mind thee of it,
For thou art fram'd of the firm truth of valour.
Exc. Farewell, kind lord, fight valiantly to-day.”

It is evident that this last line has been transposed; and here the quarto helps us:—

“Farewell, kind lord, fight valiantly to-day;
And yet in truth I do thee wrong,
For thou art made on the true sparks of honour.”

<sup>2</sup> So the folio. In modern editions we have—

“He that shall live this day and see old age.”

in the quarto we have—

“He that outlives this day, and sees old age.”

What authority does that give for the modern reading of “live this day?”

Shall think themselves accurs'd they were not here;
And hold their manhoods cheap, whiles any speaks
That fought with us upon Saint Crispin's day.

Enter SALISBURY.

Sal. My sovereign lord, bestow yourself with speed:
The French are bravely in their battles set,
And will with all expedience charge on us.

K. Hen. All things are ready, if our minds be so.

West. Perish the man whose mind is backward now!

K. Hen. Thou dost not wish more help from England, coz?

West. God's will, my liege, 'would you and I alone,
Without more help, could fight this royal battle!<sup>6</sup>

K. Hen. Why, now thou hast unwish'd five thousand men;

Which likes me better than to wish us one.—
You know your places: God be with you all!

Tucket. Enter MONTJOY.

Mont. Once more I come to know of thee, king Harry,
If for thy ransom thou wilt now compound,
Before thy most assured overthrow:
For, certainly, thou art so near the gulf
Thou needs must be englutted. Besides, in mercy
The constable desires thee—thou wilt mind
Thy followers of repentance; that their souls
May make a peaceful and a sweet retire
From off these fields, where (wretches) their poor bodies
Must lie and fester.

K. Hen. Who hath sent thee now?

Mont. The constable of France.

K. Hen. I pray thee, bear my former answer back;
Bid them achieve me, and then sell my bones.
Good God! why should they mock poor fellows thus?
The man that once did sell the lion's skin
While the beast lived, was kill'd with hunting him.
A many of our bodies shall, no doubt,
Find native graves; upon the which, I trust,
Shall witness live in brass of this day's work:
And those that leave their valiant bones in France,
Dying like men, though buried in your dunghills,
They shall be fam'd: for there the sun shall greet them,
And draw their honours reeking up to heaven;
Leaving their earthly parts to choke your clime,
The smell whereof shall breed a plague in France.
Mark then abounding valour<sup>7</sup> in our English;
That, being dead, like to the bullet's grazing,
Break out into a second course of mischief,
Killing in relapse of mortality.
Let me speak proudly:—Tell the constable,
We are but warriors for the working day:<sup>8</sup>
Our gayness, and our guilt, are all besmirch'd
With rainy marching in the painful field;
There's not a piece of feather in our host,
(Good argument, I hope, we will not fly),

<sup>4</sup> In the modern editions we have a line immediately following this, which is not in the folio:—

“And say, these wounds I had on Crispin's day.”

This line is found in the quarto entirely in a different place, after “shall gentle his condition.”

<sup>7</sup> Abounding. So the folio; the quarto, abundant. Theobald and Steevens read a bounding. If any change is to be made, we had better say rebounding.

<sup>8</sup> Warriors for the working day—we are soldiers ready for work—not dressed up for a holiday.

And time hath worn us into slovenry :
 But, by the mass, our hearts are in the trim :
 And my poor soldiers tell me, yet ere night
 They'll be in fresher robes ; or they will pluck
 The gay new coats o'er the French soldiers' heads,
 And turn them out of service. If they do this,
 (As, if God please, they shall,) my ransom then
 Will soon be levied. Herald, save thou thy labour ;
 Come thou no more for ransom, gentle herald ;
 They shall have none, I swear, but these my joints :
 Which if they have as I will leave 'em them
 Shall yield them little, tell the constable.
Mont. I shall, king Harry. And so fare thee well :
 Thou never shalt hear herald any more. [Exit.]
K. Hen. I fear thou'lt once more come again for ransom.

Enter the DUKE OF YORK.

York. My lord, most humbly on my knee I beg
 The leading of the vaward.
K. Hen. Take it, brave York.—Now, soldiers, march away :—
 And how thou pleasest, God, dispose the day ! [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—The Field of Battle.

Alarums Excursions. Enter French Soldier, PISTOL, and Boy.

Pist. Yield, cur.
Fr. Sol. Je pense que vous êtes le gentilhomme de bonne qualité.
Pist. Quality ! Calen o Custure me.<sup>1</sup> Art thou a gentleman ? What is thy name ? discuss.
Fr. Sol. O seigneur Dieu !
Pist. O signieur Dew should be a gentleman :—
 Perpend my words, O signieur Dew, and mark ;—
 O signieur Dew, thou diest on point of fox,<sup>2</sup>
 Except, O signieur, thou do give to me
 Egregious ransom.
Fr. Sol. O, prenez miséricorde ! ayez pitié de moi !
Pist. Moy shall not serve, I will have forty moys ;
 For I will fetch thy rim<sup>3</sup> out at thy throat,
 In drops of crimson blood.
Fr. Sol. Est-il impossible d'échapper la force de ton bras ?
Pist. Brass,<sup>4</sup> cur !
 Thou damned and luxurious mountain goat,
 Offer'st me brass ?
Fr. Sol. O pardonnez moi.
Pist. Say'st thou me so ? is that a ton of moys ?<sup>5</sup>
 Come hither, boy : Ask me this slave in French,
 What is his name.
Boy. Ecoutez ; Comment êtes-vous appelé ?
Fr. Sol. Monsieur le Fer.
Boy. He says, his name is master Fer.
Pist. Master Fer ! I'll fer him, and firr him, and ferret him :—discuss the same in French unto him.

<sup>1</sup> Calen o Custure me. In the folio we find "calmie custure me," which has been turned, in some modern editions, into "call you me?—Construe me." Malone found out the enigma. In "A Handfull of pleasant Delites" (1584) we have "Sundry new Sonets, in divers kinds of meeter, newly devised to the newest tunes that are now in use to be sung;" and amongst others, "A Sonet of a Lover in the praise of his Lady; To 'Calen o custure me:' sung at everie line's end." When the French soldier says quali-té, Pistol, by the somewhat similar sound, is reminded of the song of Calen o;—or, as it is given in Playford's "Musical Companion," Callino.

<sup>3</sup> Rim. Warburton would read ransom; Mason, ryno; Steevens proves that rim is part of the intestines. The word in the folio is rymme. We must hazard a conjecture. The Frenchman is using somewhat guttural sounds to Pistol—prenez miséricorde; and the English bully designates the accentuation by a word (rymme) which seems to him to mark the sounds so discordant and unintelligible. In the same way we still speak of the Northumbrian burr. Further, the Anglo-Saxon noun reoma means rheum and rime; and Pistol may think that the rime in the throat, which he will fetch out in drops of crimson blood, is the cause of the offensive sounds.

Boy. I do not know the French for fer, and ferret, and firr.

Pist. Bid him prepare, for I will cut his throat.

Fr. Sol. Que dit-il, monsieur ?

Boy. Il me commande de vous dire que vous faites vous prêt ; car ce soldat ici est disposé tout à cette heure de couper votre gorge.

Pist. Ouy, couper gorge, par ma foy, pesant.

Unless thou give me crowns, brave crowns ;

Or mangled shalt thou be by this my sword.

Fr. Sol. O, je vous supplie pour l'amour de Dieu, me pardonner ! Je suis gentilhomme de bonne maison ; gardez ma vie, et je vous donnerai deux cents écus.

Pist. What are his words ?

Boy. He prays you to save his life : he is a gentleman of a good house ; and for his ransom he will give you two hundred crowns.

Pist. Tell him,—my fury shall abate, and I

The crowns will take.

Fr. Sol. Petit monsieur, que dit-il ?

Boy. Encore qu'il est contre son jurement de pardonner aucun prisonnier ; néanmoins pour les écus que vous l'avez promis, il est content de vous donner la liberté, le franchisement.

Fr. Sol. Sur mes genoux je vous donne mille remerciemens : et je m'estime heureux que je suis tombé entre les mains d'un chevalier, je pense, le plus brave, vaillant, et très distingué seigneur d'Angleterre.

Pist. Expound unto me, boy.

Boy. He gives you, upon his knees, a thousand thanks : and he esteems himself happy that he hath fallen into the hands of one (as he thinks) the most brave, valorous, and thrice-worthy signieur of England.

Pist. As I suck blood, I will some mercy show.—

Follow me. [Exit PISTOL.]

Boy. Suivez vous le grand capitaine.

[Exit French Soldier.]

I did never know so full a voice issue from so empty a heart : but the saying is true,—the empty vessel makes the greatest sound. Bardolph and Nym had ten times more valour than this roaring devil i' the old play,<sup>6</sup> that every one may pare his nails with a wooden dagger ; and they are both hanged ; and so would this be, if he durst steal anything adventurously. I must stay with the lackeys, with the luggage of our camp : the French might have a good prey of us, if he knew of it ; for there is none to guard it but boys. [Exit.]

SCENE V.—Another part of the Field of Battle.

Alarums. Enter DAUPHIN, ORLEANS, BOURBON, CONSTABLE, RAMBURES, and others.

Con. O diable !

Orl. O seigneur !—le jour est perdu, tout est perdu !

Dau. Mort de ma vie ! all is confounded, all !

Reproach and everlasting shame

<sup>4</sup> Brass. The critics have decided that because Pistol mistakes bras for brass, and subsequently thinks moi (then spelt moy) is pronounced moy, Shakspeare "had very little knowledge in the French language." We have two pages of notes in the variorum editions to prove this. But the critics have not proved what was the pronunciation of the French language in Shakspeare's time, especially with regard to the now silent s; and if they had proved that bras was always pronounced bra, (or bravo as Malone has it,) and moy as we now pronounce moi, they have missed the fact that Pistol knew a little French (see Act II. Sc. I.), and though the Frenchman might have said bra and moi, the sound might have suggested to Pistol the words which he had seen written bras and moy; and thus his "offer'st me brass," and his "forty moys."

Ton of moys—par-tonnez moy—perhaps the then received mode of pronunciation—suggests the "ton of moys." But what is a moy ? Johnson says "moi" is a piece of money, whence moi-dore. Douce is hard upon the derivation of moidore, and says that moy meant a measure of corn. Without defending Pistol's or Dr. Johnson's etymology, we believe Douce is mistaken. Pistol clearly takes moy for money of some sort.

Sits mocking in our plumes.—O méchante fortune!—
Do not run away. [A short alarum.]

Con. Why, all our ranks are broke.

Dau. O perdurable shame!—let's stab ourselves.
Be these the wretches that we play'd at dice for?

Orl. Is this the king we sent to for his ransom?

Bour. Shame, and eternal shame, nothing but shame!
Let's die in honour:<sup>1</sup> Once more back again;
And he that will not follow Bourbon now,
Let him go hence, and, with his cap in hand,
Like a base pander, hold the chamber-door,
Whilst by a slave, no gentler than my dog,
His fairest daughter is contaminate.

Con. Disorder, that hath spoil'd us, friend us now!
Let us, on heaps, go offer up our lives.

Orl. We are enow, yet living in the field,
To smother up the English in our throngs,
If any order might be thought upon.

Bour. The devil take order now! I'll to the throng;
Let life be short; else shame will be too long. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—Another part of the Field.

Alarums. Enter KING HENRY and Forces; EXETER, and others, with Prisoners.

K. Hen. Well have we done, thrice-valiant countrymen:
But all's not done, yet keep the French the field.

Exe. The duke of York commends him to your majesty.

K. Hen. Lives he, good uncle? thrice within this hour
I saw him down; thrice up again, and fighting;
From helmet to the spur, all blood he was.

Exe. In which array (brave soldier), doth he lie,
Larding the plain: and by his bloody side,
(Yoke-fellow to his honour-owing wounds),
The noble earl of Suffolk also lies.

Suffolk first died: and York, all haggled over,
Comes to him, where in gore he lay insteep'd,
And takes him by the beard; kisses the gashes,
That bloodily did yawn upon his face;

And cries aloud,—“Tarry, my cousin Suffolk!
My soul shall thine keep company to heaven:
Tarry, sweet soul, for mine, then fly abreast;
As, in this glorious and well-foughten field,
We kept together in our chivalry!”

Upon these words I came, and cheer'd him up:
He smil'd me in the face, raught me his hand,
And with a feeble gripe, says,—“Dear my lord,
Commend my service to my sovereign.”

So did he turn, and over Suffolk's neck
He threw his wounded arm, and kiss'd his lips;
And so, espous'd to death, with blood he seal'd
A testament of noble-ending love.
The pretty and sweet manner of it forc'd
Those waters from me, which I would have stopp'd;
But I had not so much of man in me,

<sup>1</sup> Let's die in honour. The ordinary reading was, “Let us die instant.” Malone would read, “Let us die in fight.” The folio reads, “Let us die in,” which Mason says is the true reading. To justify and explain our reading, we must exhibit the greatly altered scene of the quarto—which is also a curious example of the mode in which the text of the folio was expanded and amended, and that certainly by the poet:—

“Gebon. O diabello!

Con. Mort de ma vie!

Orl. O what a day is this!

Bour. O jour del honte! all is gone; all is lost!

Con. We are enow yet living in the field

To smother up the English,

If any order might be thought upon.

Bour. A plague of order; once more to the field,

And he that will not follow Bourbon now,

Let him go, &c.

Con. Disorder, that hath spoil'd us, right us now!

Come we in heaps, we'll offer up our lives

Unto these English, or else die with fame.

Come, come along,

Let's die with honour; our shame doth last too long.”

And all my mother came into mine eyes,
And gave me up to tears.

K. Hen. I blame you not;

For, hearing this, I must perforce compound
With mistful eyes, or they will issue too.— [Alarum.]

But, hark! what new alarum is this same?—

The French have reforc'd their scatter'd men:—<sup>2</sup>

Then every soldier kill his prisoners;

Give the word through. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.—Another part of the Field.

Alarums. Enter FLUELLEN and GOWER.

Flu. Kill the poys and the luggage! 'tis expressly against the law of arms: 'tis as arrant a piece of knavery, mark you now, as can be offered. In your conscience now, is it not?

Gow. 'Tis certain there's not a boy left alive; and the cowardly rascals that ran from the battle have done this slaughter: besides, they have burned and carried away all that was in the king's tent; wherefore the king, most worthily, hath caused every soldier to cut his prisoner's throat. O, 'tis a gallant king!

Flu. Ay, he was porn at Monmouth, captain Gower:
What call you the town's name where Alexander the pig was porn?

Gow. Alexander the Great.

Flu. Why, I pray you, is not pig, great? The pig, or the great, or the mighty, or the huge, or the magnanimous, are all one reckonings, save the phrase is a little variations.

Gow. I think Alexander the Great was born in Macedon;
his father was called Philip of Macedon, as I take it.

Flu. I think it is in Macedon, where Alexander is porn.
I tell you, captain,—If you look in the maps of the 'orld, I warrant, you shall find, in the comparisons between Macedon and Monmouth, that the situations, look you, is both alike. There is a river in Macedon; and there is also moreover a river at Monmouth: it is called Wye, at Monmouth; but it is out of my prains what is the name of the other river; but 'tis all one, 'tis alike as my fingers is to my fingers, and there is salmons in both. If you mark Alexander's life well, Harry of Monmouth's life is come after it indifferent well; for there is figures in all things.
Alexander (God knows, and you know,) in his rages, and his furies, and his wraths, and his cholers, and his moods, and his displeasures, and his indignations, and also being a little intoxicates in his prains, did, in his ales and his angers, look you, kill his pest friend, Clytus.

Gow. Our king is not like him in that; he never killed any of his friends.

Flu. It is not well done, mark you now, to take the tales out of my mouth, ere it is made and finished. I speak but in the figures and comparisons of it: As Alexander killed his friend Clytus, being in his ales and his cups; so also Harry Monmouth, being in his right wits and his goot judgments,

It is wonderful how the earlier commentators misused this text, without endeavouring by it to illustrate the difficulty in the text of the folio. A word is omitted of some sort: the quarto gives them the very passage—“Let's die with honour.” But that they refuse to see; and although the whole scene has been so amplified and improved, they “restore a line from the quarto” which is not found in the folio—

“Unto these English, or else die with fame.”

Shakspeare had previously given the sentiment in “Let's die in honour;” the word “honour” being unquestionably omitted in the printing of what he wrote.

<sup>2</sup> Capell thought that this line should be spoken by a messenger, in answer to the king's “what new alarum is this same?” The conduct of Henry in giving the fatal order,

“Then every soldier kill his prisoner,” is much more natural and justifiable than if he issued the command upon suspicion only.

turned away the fat knight with the great pelly-doublet : he was full of jests, and gipes, and knaveries, and mocks ; I have forgot his name.<sup>1</sup>

Gow. Sir John Falstaff.

Flu. That is he : I'll tell you, there is goot men porn at Monmouth.

Gow. Here comes his majesty.

Alarum. Enter KING HENRY with a part of the English Forces WARWICK, GLOSTER, EXETER, and others.

K. Hen. I was not angry since I came to France Until this instant.—Take a trumpet, herald ; Ride thou unto the horsemen on yon hill ; If they will fight with us, bid them come down, Or void the field ; they do offend our sight : If they'll do neither, we will come to them ; And make them skirr away, as swift as stones Enforced from the old Assyrian slings : Besides, we'll cut the throats of those we have ; And not a man of them, that we shall take, Shall taste our mercy :—Go, and tell them so.

Enter MONTJOY.

Exe. Here comes the herald of the French, my liege.

Glo. His eyes are humbler than they us'd to be.

K. Hen. How now ! what means this, herald ? knowest thou not

That I have fin'd these bones of mine for ransom ? Com'st thou again for ransom ?

Mont. No, great king, I come to thee for charitable licence, That we may wander o'er this bloody field, To book our dead, and then to bury them ; To sort our nobles from our common men : For many of our princes (woe the while ! ) Lie drown'd and soak'd in mercenary blood ; (So do our vulgar drench their peasant limbs In blood of princes ; ) and their wounded steeds Fret fetlock deep in gore, and, with wild rage, Yerk out their armed heels at their dead masters Killing them twice. O give us leave, great king, To view the field in safety, and dispose Of their dead bodies.

K. Hen. I tell thee truly, herald, I know not if the day be ours, or no ; For yet a many of your horsemen peer, And gallop o'er the field.

Mont. The day is yours.

K. Hen. Praised be God, and not our strength for it ! What is this castle call'd that stands hard by ?

Mont. They call it Agincourt.

K. Hen. Then call we this the field of Agincourt, Fought on the day of Crispin Crispianus.

Flu. Your grandfather of famous memory, an't please your majesty, and your great uncle Edward the plack prince of Wales, as I have read in the chronicles, fought a most prave pattle here in France.

K. Hen. They did, Fluellen.

Flu. Your majesty says very true : if your majesties is remembered of it, the Welshmen did goot service in a garden where leeks did grow, wearing leeks in their Monmouth caps ; which, your majesty knows, to this hour is an honourable padge of the service ; and, I do believe, your majesty takes no scorn to wear the leek upon Saint Tavy's day.

K. Hen. I wear it for a memorable honour : For I am Welsh, you know, good countryman.

Flu. All the water in Wye cannot wash your majesty's Welsh plood out of your pody, I can tell you that : Got pless it and preserve it, as long as it pleases his grace, and his majesty too !

K. Hen. Thanks, good my countryman.

Flu. By Cheshu, I am your majesty's countryman, I care not who know it ; I will confess it to all the 'orld : I need not to be ashamed of your majesty, praised be God, so long as your majesty is an honest man.

K. Hen. God keep me so !—Our heralds go with him ; Bring me just notice of the numbers dead On both our parts. Call yonder fellow hither.

[Points to WILLIAMS. Exeunt MONTJOY and others.]

Exe. Soldier, you must come to the king.

K. Hen. Soldier, why wearest thou that glove in thy cap ?

Will. An't please your majesty, 'tis the gage of one that I should fight withal, if he be alive.

K. Hen. An Englishman ?

Will. An't please your majesty, a rascal that swaggered with me last night : who, if 'a live and ever dare to challenge this glove, I have sworn to take him a box o' the ear : or, if I can see my glove in his cap, (which he swore as he was a soldier, he would wear if alive,) I will strike it out soundly.

K. Hen. What think you, captain Fluellen ? is it fit this soldier keep his oath ?

Flu. He is a craven and a villain else, an't please your majesty, in my conscience.

K. Hen. It may be his enemy is a gentleman of great sort, quite from the answer of his degree.

Flu. Though he be as goot a gentleman as the tevil is, as Lucifer and Belzebub himself, it is necessary, look your grace, that he keep his vow and his oath : if he be perjured, see you now, his reputation is as arrant a villain, and a Jack sauce, as ever his plack shoe trod upon Got's ground and his earth, in my conscience, la.

K. Hen. Then keep thy vow, sirrah, when thou meet'st the fellow.

Will. So I will, my liege, as I live.

K. Hen. Who serv'st thou under ?

Will. Under captain Gower, my liege.

Flu. Gower is a goot captain ; and is goot knowledge and literature in the wars.

K. Hen. Call him hither to me, soldier.

Will. I will, my liege.

[Exit.]

K. Hen. Here, Fluellen ; wear thou this favour for me, and stick it in thy cap : When Alençon and myself were down together, I plucked this glove from his helm : if any man challenge this, he is a friend to Alençon, and an enemy to our person ; if thou encounter any such, apprehend him, an thou dost me love.

Flu. Your grace does me as great honours as can be desired in the hearts of his subjects : I would fain see the man, that has but two legs, that shall find himself aggrieved at this glove, that is all ; but I would fain see it once : an please Got of his grace that I might see it.

K. Hen. Knowest thou Gower ?

Flu. He is my dear friend, an please you.

K. Hen. Pray thee, go seek him, and bring him to my tent.

Flu. I will fetch him.

[Exit.]

K. Hen. My lord of Warwick, and my brother Gloster, Follow Fluellen closely at the heels :

The glove which I have given him for a favour

May, haply, purchase him a box o' the ear ;

It is the soldier's ; I, by bargain, should Wear it myself. Follow, good cousin Warwick :

If that the soldier strike him, (as, I judge

By his blunt bearing he will keep his word,)

Some sudden mischief may arise of it ;

<sup>1</sup> We print this speech as in the folio, with the exception of goot for good. The ordinary text was stuffed full of false English, supposed to represent the Welsh mode of expression. Capell very justly says—"The poet thought it sufficient to mark his (Fluellen's) diction a little, and in some places only ; and the man of taste will be of the same opinion."

For I do know Fluellen valiant,
And, touch'd with choler, hot as gunpowder,
And quickly will return an injury :
Follow, and see there be no harm between them.
Go you with me, uncle of Exeter. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VIII.—Before King Henry's Pavilion.Enter GOWER and WILLIAMS.

Will. I warrant it is to knight you, captain.

Enter FLUELLEN.

Flu. Got's will and his pleasure, captain, I pesech you now, come apace to the king : there is more goot toward you, peradventure, than is in your knowledge to dream of.

Will. Sir, know you this glove ?

Flu. Know the glove ? I know, the glove is a glove.

Will. I know this ; and thus I challenge it. [Strikes him.]

Flu. 'Sblud, an arrant traitor as any's in the universal 'orld, or in France, or in England.

Gow. How now, sir ? you villain !

Will. Do you think I'll be forsworn ?

Flu. Stand away, captain Gower ; I will give treason his payment into plows, I warrant you.

Will. I am no traitor.

Flu. That's a lie in thy throat.—I charge you in his majesty's name, apprehend him ; he's a friend of the duke Alençon's.

Enter WARWICK and GLOSTER.

War. How now, how now ! what's the matter ?

Flu. My lord of Warwick, here is (praised be Got for it !) a most contagious treason come to light, look you, as you shall desire in a summer's day. Here is his majesty.

Enter KING HENRY and EXETER.

K. Hen. How now ! what's the matter ?

Flu. My liege, here is a villain, and a traitor, that, look your grace, has struck the glove which your majesty is take out of the helmet of Alençon.

Will. My liege, this was my glove ; here is the fellow of it : and he that I gave it to in change promised to wear it in his cap ; I promised to strike him, if he did : I met this man with my glove in his cap, and I have been as good as my word.

Flu. Your majesty hear now, (saving your majesty's manhood,) what an arrant, rascally, beggarly, lowsy knave it is : I hope your majesty is pear me testimony, and witness, and will avouchment, that this is the glove of Alençon, that your majesty is give me, in your conscience now.

K. Hen. Give me thy glove, soldier ! Look, here's the fellow of it.

'Twas I, indeed, thou promised'st to strike ;
And thou hast given me most bitter terms.<sup>1</sup>

Flu. An please your majesty, let his neck answer for it, if there is any martial law in the 'orld.

K. Hen. How canst thou make me satisfaction ?

Will. All offences, my lord, come from the heart : never came any from mine that might offend your majesty.

K. Hen. It was ourself thou didst abuse.

Will. Your majesty came not like yourself : you appeared to me but as a common man ; witness the night, your garments, your lowliness ; and what your highness suffered under that shape I beseech you, take it for your own fault and not mine : for had you been as I took you for, I made no offence ; therefore, I beseech your highness, pardon me.

K. Hen. Here, uncle Exeter, fill this glove with crowns,
And give it to this fellow.—Keep it, fellow ;
And wear it for an honour in thy cap,
Till I do challenge it.—Give him the crowns :—
And, captain, you must needs be friends with him.

Flu. By this day and this light, the fellow has mettle enough in his pelly :—Hold, there is twelve pence for you, and I pray you to serve Got, and keep you out of prawls, and prabbles, and quarrels, and dissensions, and, I warrant you, it is the petter for you.

Will. I will none of your money.

Flu. It is with a goot will ; I can tell you it will serve you to mend your shoes : Come, wherefore should you be so pashful ? your shoes is not so goot : 'tis a goot silling, I warrant you, or I will change it.

Enter an English Herald.

K. Hen. Now, herald ; are the dead number'd ?<sup>2</sup>

Her. Here is the number of the slaughter'd French. [Delivers a paper.]

K. Hen. What prisoners of good sort are taken, uncle ?

Exc. Charles duke of Orleans, nephew to the king ;
John duke of Bourbon, and Lord Bouciqualt ;
Of other lords and barons, knights and 'squires,
Full fifteen hundred, besides common men.

K. Hen. This note doth tell me of ten thousand French
That in the field lie slain : of princes, in this number,
And nobles bearing banners, there lie dead
One hundred twenty six : added to these,
Of knights, esquires, and gallant gentlemen,
Eight thousand and four hundred ; of the which,
Five hundred were but yesterday dubb'd knights :
So that, in these ten thousand they have lost,
There are but sixteen hundred mercenaries ;
The rest are princes, barons, lords, knights, 'squires,
And gentlemen of blood and quality.
The names of those their nobles that lie dead,—
Charles De-la-bret, high constable of France ;
Jaques of Chatillon, admiral of France ;
The master of the cross-bows, lord Rambures ;
Great master of France, the brave sir Guischard Dauphin ;
John duke of Alençon ; Antony duke of Brabant,
The brother to the duke of Burgundy ;
And Edward duke of Bar : of lusty earls,
Grandpré and Roussi, Fauconberg and Foix,
Beaumont and Marle, Vaudemont and Lestrale.
Here was a royal fellowship of death !
Where is the number of our English dead ?

[Herald presents another paper.]

Edward the duke of York, the earl of Suffolk,
Sir Richard Ketly, Davy Gam, esquire :
None else of name ; and of all other men,
But five and twenty. O God, thy arm was here,
And not to us, but to thy arm alone,
Ascribe we all.—When, without stratagem,
But in plain shock and even play of battle,
Was ever known so great and little loss,
On one part and on the other ?—Take it, God,
For it is none but thine !<sup>3</sup>

Exc. 'Tis wonderful !

K. Hen. Come, go we in procession to the village :
And be it death proclaimed through our host,
To boast of this, or take that praise from God
Which is his only.

Flu. Is it not lawful, an please your majesty, to tell how many is killed ?

K. Hen. Yes, captain ; but with this acknowledgment,
That God fought for us.

“ Now, herald, are the dead on both sides number'd ? ”

Flu. Yes, my conscience, he did us great goot.

K. Hen. Do we all holy rites ;

Let there be sung Non Nobis, and Te Deum ;

The dead with charity enclos'd in clay :

And then to Calais ; and to England then ;

Where ne'er from France arriv'd more happy men.

[Exeunt.]

RECENT NEW READING.

Sc. VII. p. 633.—“To book our dead.”

“To look our dead.”—Collier.

Mr. Collier, upon the authority of the Manuscript Corrections, says we must read “to look our dead.” He adds, “It was an English herald who made out a statement of the killed, wounded, and prisoners, on both sides, and afterwards presented it to the king.” Not so: the king says—

“Our heralds go with him

Bring me just notice of the numbers dead
On both our parts.”

When the herald returns, he presents two papers—one the French “book”—the other the English.

ACT V.

CHORUS.<sup>1</sup>

Vouchsafe to those that have not read the story,
That I may prompt them : and of such as have,
I humbly pray them to admit the excuse
Of time, of numbers, and due course of things,
Which cannot in their huge and proper life
Be here presented. Now we bear the king
Towards Calais : grant him there ; there seen,
Heave him away upon your winged thoughts,
Athwart the sea : Behold, the English beach
Pales in the flood with men, with wives, and boys,
Whose shouts and claps out-voice the deep-mouth'd sea,
Which, like a mighty whiffler<sup>a</sup> 'fore the king,
Seems to prepare his way : so let him land ;
And, solemnly, see him set on to London.
So swift a pace hath thought, that even now
You may imagine him upon Blackheath :
Where that his lords desire him to have borne
His bruised helmet, and his bended sword,
Before him, through the city : he forbids it,
Being free from vainness and self-glorious pride ;
Giving full trophy, signal, and ostent,
Quite from himself, to God. But now behold,
In the quick forge and working-house of thought,
How London doth pour out her citizens !
The mayor, and all his brethren, in best sort,—
Like to the senators of the antique Rome,
With the plebeians swarming at their heels,—
Go forth, and fetch their conquering Cæsar in :
As, by a lower but by loving likelihood,
Were now the general of our gracious empress
(As in good time he may,) from Ireland coming,
Bringing rebellion broached on his sword,
How many would the peaceful city quit
To welcome him ! much more, (and much more cause,
Did they this Harry. Now in London place him ;
(As yet the lamentation of the French
Invites the king of England's stay at home
The emperor's coming in behalf of France,
To order peace between them ;)<sup>b</sup> and omit
All the occurrences, whatever chanc'd,
Till Harry's back return again to France :
There must we bring him ; and myself have play'd,
The interim, by remembering you, 'tis past.
Then brook abridgement ; and your eyes advance
After your thoughts, straight back again to France.

SCENE I.—France. An English Court of Guard.

Enter FLUELLEN and GOWER.

Gow. Nay, that's right ; but why wear you your leek to-day ? Saint Davy's day is past.<sup>c</sup>

Flu. There is occasions and causes why and wherefore in all things : I will tell you, as my friend, captain Gower : The rascally, scald, beggarly, lousy, praggling knave, Pistol,—which you and yourself, and all the 'orld, know to be no petter than a fellow, look you now, of no merits,—he is come to me, and prings me pread and salt yesterday, look you, and bid me eat my leek : it was in a place where I could not breed no contentions with him ; but I will be so pold as to wear it in my cap till I see him once again, and then I will tell him a little piece of my desires.

Enter PISTOL.

Gow. Why, here he comes, swelling like a turkey-cock.

Flu. 'Tis no matter for his swellings, nor his turkey-cocks.—Got pless you, ancient Pistol ! you scurvy, lousy knave, Got pless you !

Pist. Ha ! art thou Bedlam ? dost thou thirst, base Trojan,

To have me fold up Parca's fatal web ?

Hence ! I am qualmish at the smell of leek.

Flu. I peseech you heartily, scurvy, lousy knave, at my desires, and my requests, and my petitions, to eat, look you, this leek ; because, look you, you do not love it, nor your affections, and your appetites, and your digestions, does not agree with it, I would desire you to eat it.

Pist. Not for Cadwallader and all his goats.

Flu. There is one goat for you. [Strikes him.] Will you be so goot, scald knave, as eat it ?

Pist. Base Trojan, thou shalt die.

Flu. You say very true, scald knave, when Got's will is : I will desire you to live in the mean time, and eat your victuals ; come, there is sauce for it. [Striking him again.] You called me yesterday, mountain-squire, but I will make you to-day a squire of low degree. I pray you, fall to ; if you can mock a leek, you can eat a leek.

Gow. Enough, captain ; you have astonished him.<sup>2</sup>

Flu. I say, I will make him eat some part of my leek, or I will peat his pate four days :—Pite, I pray you ; it is goot for your green wound, and your bloody coxcomb.

Pist. Must I bite ?

Flu. Yes, certainly ; and out of doubt, and out of questions too, and ambiguities.

Pist. By this leek, I will most horribly revenge ; I eat—and eat—I swear.<sup>3</sup>

Flu. Eat, I pray you : Will you have some more sauce to your leek ? there is not enough leek to swear by.

Pist. Quiet thy cudgel ; thou dost see, I eat.

Flu. Much goot do you, scald knave, heartily. Nay, 'pray you, throw none away ; the skin is goot for your proken coxcomb. When you take occasions to see leeks hereafter, I pray you, mock at them ; that is all.

Pist. Good.

Flu. Ay, leeks is goot :—Hold you, there is a groat to heal your pate.

Pist. Me a groat !

Flu. Yes, verily, and in truth you shall take it ; or I have another leek in my pocket, which you shall eat.

Pist. I take thy groat, in earnest of revenge.

Flu. If I owe you anything, I will pay you in cudgels ; you shall be a woodmonger, and buy nothing of me but swear.” In printing “I eat—and eat—I swear”—we do not deviate from the words of the original. Fluellen stands over Pistol with his cudgel, who says, “I eat ;”—Fluellen makes a motion as if again to strike him, when he repeats “I eat.” He then mutters, “I swear”—to which Fluellen adds, “Eat, I pray you—there is not enough leek to swear by.”

cudgels. God be wi' you, and keep you, and heal your pate.

[Exit.

Pist. All hell shall stir for this.

Gow. Go, go; you are a counterfeit cowardly knave. Will you mock at an ancient tradition,—begun upon an honourable respect, and worn as a memorable trophy of predeceased valour,—and dare not avouch in your deeds any of your words? I have seen you gleeing and galling at this gentleman twice or thrice. You thought, because he could not speak English in the native garb, he could not therefore handle an English cudgel: you find it otherwise; and henceforth, let a Welsh correction teach you a good English condition. Fare ye well.

Pist. Doth fortune play the huswife with me now? News have I that my Nell is dead i' the spital Of malady of France;

And there my rendezvous is quite cut off.
Old I do wax; and from my weary limbs
Honour is cudgell'd. Well, bawd will I turn,
And something lean to cutpurse of quick hand.
To England will I steal, and there I'll steal:
And patches will I get unto these cudgell'd<sup>1</sup> scars,
And swear I got them in the Gallia wars.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—Troyes in Champagne. An Apartment in the French King's Palace.

Enter at one door, KING HENRY, BEDFORD, GLOSTER, EXETER, WARWICK, WESTMORELAND, and other Lords; at another the French KING, QUEEN ISABEL, the PRINCESS KATHARINE, Lords, Ladies, &c., the DUKE OF BURGUNDY, and his Train.

K. Hen. Peace to this meeting, wherefore we are met!
Unto our brother France, and to our sister,
Health and fair time of day:—joy and good wishes
To our most fair and princely cousin Katharine;
And (as a branch and member of this royalty,
By whom this great assembly is contriv'd,)
We do salute you, duke of Burgundy;—
And, princes French, and peers, health to you all!

Fr. King. Right joyous are we to behold your face,
Most worthy brother England; fairly met:—
So are you, princes English, every one.<sup>2</sup>

Q. Isa. So happy be the issue, brother England,
Of this good day, and of this gracious meeting,
As we are now glad to behold your eyes;
Your eyes, which hitherto have borne in them
Against the French, that met them in their bent,
The fatal balls of murdering basilisks:
The venom of such looks, we fairly hope,
Have lost their quality; and that this day
Shall change all griefs and quarrels into love.

K. Hen. To cry amen to that, thus we appear.

Q. Isa. You English princes all, I do salute you.

Bur. My duty to you both, on equal love,
Great kings of France and England! That I have labour'd
With all my wits, my pains, and strong endeavours,
To bring your most imperial majesties
Unto this bar and royal interview,
Your mightiness on both parts best can witness.
Since then my office hath so far prevail'd
That face to face, and royal eye to eye,
You have congreeted; let it not disgrace me,
If I demand, before this royal view,

What rub, or what impediment, there is,
Why that the naked, poor, and mangled peace,
Dear nurse of arts, plenties, and joyful births,
Should not, in this best garden of the world,
Our fertile France, put up her lovely visage?
Alas! she hath from France too long been chas'd;
And all her husbandry doth lie on heaps,
Corrupting in its own fertility.
Her vine, the merry cheerer of the heart,
Unpruned dies: her hedges even-pleach'd,
Like prisoners wildly over-grown with hair,
Put forth disorder'd twigs: her fallow leas
The darnel, hemlock, and rank fumitory,
Doth root upon; while that the coulter rusts
That should deracinate such savagery:
The even mead, that erst brought sweetly forth
The freckled cowslip, burnet, and green clover,
Wanting the scythe, all uncorrected, rank,
Conceives by idleness; and nothing teems
But hateful docks, rough thistles, kecksies, burs,
Losing both beauty and utility:
And as our vineyards, fallows, meads, and hedges,
Defective in their natures, grow to wildness;
Even so our houses, and ourselves, and children,
Have lost, or do not learn, for want of time,
The sciences that should become our country;
But grow, like savages,—as soldiers will,
That nothing do but meditate on blood,—
To swearing, and stern looks, diffus'd attire,
And everything that seems unnatural.
Which to reduce into our former favour<sup>3</sup>
You are assembled; and my speech entreats
That I may know the let, why gentle peace
Should not expel these inconveniences,
And bless us with her former qualities.

K. Hen. If, duke of Burgundy, you would the peace,
Whose want gives growth to the imperfections
Which you have cited, you must buy that peace
With full accord to all our just demands;
Whose tenours and particular effects
You have, enschedul'd briefly, in your hands.

Bur. The king hath heard them; to the which, as yet,
There is no answer made.

K. Hen. Well then, the peace,
Which you before so urg'd, lies in his answer.

Fr. King. I have but with a cursory eye
O'er-glanc'd the articles: pleaseth your grace
To appoint some of your council presently
To sit with us once more, with better heed
To re-survey them, we will, suddenly,
Pass our accept and peremptory answer.<sup>4</sup>

K. Hen. Brother, we shall.—Go, uncle Exeter,—
And brother Clarence,—and you, brother Gloster,— Warwick,—and Huntington,—go with the king:
And take with you free power, to ratify,
Augment, or alter, as your wisdoms best
Shall see advantageous for our dignity,
Anything in, or out of, our demands;
And we'll consign thereto.—Will you, fair sister,
Go with the princes, or stay here with us?

Q. Isa. Our gracious brother, I will go with them;
Haply a woman's voice may do some good,
When articles too nicely urg'd be stood on.

K. Hen. Yet leave our cousin Katharine here with us;
She is our capital demand, compris'd
Within the fore rank of our articles.

<sup>1</sup> Cudgell'd in the folio. The word is not in the quarto; but the whole scene has been re-modelled.

<sup>2</sup> Fifty-six lines following this are not found at all in the quarto. The reader will see that the speech of Burgundy is one of the finest in the play, and is philosophically meant to show the price at which glory is purchased.

<sup>4</sup> This passage has been considered obscure; and some would read pass or except. The difficulty has arisen from a misconception of the meaning of accept and answer. Our accept is our consent to certain of the articles: our peremptory answer is our undelaying statement of objections to other articles. In the quarto we have nothing of accept; but—

Q. Isa. She hath good leave.

[Exeunt all but HENRY, KATHARINE, and her Gentlewoman.]

K. Hen. Fair Katharine, and most fair,
Will you vouchsafe to teach a soldier terms,
Such as will enter at a lady's ear,
And plead his love-suit to her gentle heart?

Kath. Your majesty shall mock at me; I cannot speak your England.

K. Hen. O fair Katharine, if you will love me soundly with your French heart, I will be glad to hear you confess it brokenly with your English tongue. Do you like me, Kate?

Kath. Pardonnez moi, I cannot tell vat is—like me.

K. Hen. An angel is like you, Kate; and you are like an angel.

Kath. Que dit-il? que je suis semblable à les anges?

Alice. Oui, vraiment, (sauf votre grâce) ainsi dit-il.

K. Hen. I said so, dear Katharine; and I must not blush to affirm it.

Kath. O bon Dieu! les langues des hommes sont pleines des tromperies.

K. Hen. What says she, fair one? that the tongues of men are full of deceits?

Alice. Oui; dat de tongues of de mans is be full of deceits; dat is de princess.

K. Hen. The princess is the better English-woman. I' faith, Kate, my wooing is fit for thy understanding: I am glad thou canst speak no better English; for, if thou couldst, thou wouldst find me such a plain king, that thou wouldst think I had sold my farm to buy my crown. I know no ways to mince it in love, but directly to say—I love you: then, if you urge me further than to say—Do you in faith? I wear out my suit. Give me your answer; i' faith, do; and so clap hands and a bargain: How say you, lady?

Kath. Sauf votre honneur, me understand well.

K. Hen. Marry, if you would put me to verses, or to dance for your sake, Kate, why you undid me: for the one, I have neither words nor measure; and for the other, I have no strength in measure, yet a reasonable measure in strength. If I could win a lady at leap-frog, or by vaulting into my saddle with my armour on my back, under the correction of bragging be it spoken, I should quickly leap into a wife. Or, if I might buffet for my love, or bound my horse for her favours, I could lay on like a butcher, and sit like a jack-an-apes, never off: but, before God, Kate, I cannot look greenly, nor gasp out my eloquence, nor I have no cunning in protestation; only downright oaths, which I never use till urged, nor never break for urging. If thou canst love a fellow of this temper, Kate, whose face is not worth sun-burning, that never looks in his glass for love of anything he sees there, let thine eye be thy cook. I speak to thee plain soldier: If thou canst love me for this, take me: if not, to say to thee—that I shall die, is true; but—for thy love, by the Lord, no; yet I love thee too. And while thou livest, dear Kate, take a fellow of plain and uncoined constancy: for he perforce must do thee right, because he hath not the gift to woo in other places: for these fellows of infinite tongue, that can rhyme themselves into ladies' favours, they do always reason themselves out again. What! a speaker is but a prater; a rhyme is but a ballad. A good leg will fall; a straight back will stoop; a black beard will turn white; a curled pate will grow bald; a fair face will wither; a full eye will wax hollow; but a good heart, Kate, is the sun and the moon; or, rather, the sun, and not the moon; for it shines bright, and never changes, but keeps his course truly. If thou would have such a one, take me: And take me, take a soldier; take a soldier, take a king: And what sayest thou then to my love? speak, my fair, and fairly, I pray thee.

Kath. Is it possible dat I sould love de enemy of France?

K. Hen. No; it is not possible you should love the enemy of France, Kate: but, in loving me, you should love the friend of France; for I love France so well that I will not part with a village of it; I will have it all mine: and, Kate, when France is mine, and I am yours, then yours is France, and you are mine.

Kath. I cannot tell vat is dat.

K. Hen. No, Kate? I will tell thee in French; which, I am sure, will hang upon my tongue like a new-married wife about her husband's neck, hardly to be shook off. Quand j'ai la possession de France, et quand vous avez la possession de moi, (let me see, what then? Saint Denis be my speed!)—donc votre est France, et vous êtes mienne. It is as easy for me, Kate, to conquer the kingdom as to speak so much more French: I shall never move thee in French, unless it be to laugh at me.

Kath. Sauf votre honneur, le Français que vous parlez est meilleur que l'Anglais lequel je parle.

K. Hen. No, 'faith, is't not, Kate: but thy speaking of my tongue, and I thine, most truly falsely, must needs be granted to be much at one. But, Kate, dost thou understand thus much English? Canst thou love me?

Kath. I cannot tell.

K. Hen. Can any of your neighbours tell, Kate? I'll ask them. Come, I know, thou lovest me: and at night when you come into your closet, you'll question this gentlewoman about me; and I know, Kate, you will, to her, dispraise those parts in me that you love with your heart: but, good Kate, mock me mercifully; the rather, gentle princess, because I love thee cruelly. If ever thou beest mine, Kate, (as I have a saving faith within me tells me thou shalt,) I get thee with scrambling, and thou must therefore needs prove a good soldier-breeder: Shall not thou and I, between Saint Denis and Saint George, compound a boy, half French, half English, that shall go to Constantinople, and take the Turk by the beard? shall we not? what sayest thou, my fair flower-de-luce?

Kath. I do not know dat.

K. Hen. No; 'tis hereafter to know, but now to promise: do but now promise, Kate, you will endeavour for your French part of such a boy; and, for my English moiety, take the word of a king and a bachelor. How answer you, la plus belle Katharine du monde, mon très chère et divine déesse?

Kath. Your majesté've fausse French enough to deceive de most sage demoiselle dat is en France.

K. Hen. Now, fie upon my false French! By mine honour, in true English, I love thee, Kate: by which honour I dare not swear thou lovest me; yet my blood begins to flatter me that thou dost, notwithstanding the poor and untempering effect of my visage. Now beshrew my father's ambition! he was thinking of civil wars when he got me; therefore was I created with a stubborn outside, with an aspect of iron, that when I come to woo ladies I fright them. But, in faith, Kate, the elder I wax the better I shall appear: my comfort is that old age, that ill layer-up of beauty, can do no more spoil upon my face: thou hast me, if thou hast me, at the worst; and thou shalt wear me, if thou wear me, better and better; and therefore tell me, most fair Katharine, will you have me? Put off your maiden blushes; avouch the thoughts of your heart with the looks of an empress; take me by the hand, and say—Harry of England, I am thine: which word thou shalt no sooner bless mine ear withal, but I will tell thee aloud England is thine, Ireland is thine, France is thine, and Henry Plantagenet is thine; who, though I speak it before his face, if he be not fellow with the best king, thou shalt find the best king of good fellows. Come, your answer in broken music; for thy voice is music, and thy English broken: therefore, queen of all, Katharine, break thy mind to me in broken English, Wilt thou have me?

Kath. Dat is, as it shall please de roi mon père.

K. Hen. Nay, it will please him well, Kate; it shall please him, Kate.

Kath. Den it shall also content me.

K. Hen. Upon that I kiss your hand, and I call you my queen.

Kath. Laissez, mon seigneur, laissez, laissez: ma foi, je ne veux point que vous abaissez votre grandeur, en baisant la main de votre indigne serviteure; excusez moi, je vous supplie, mon très puissant seigneur.

K. Hen. Then I will kiss your lips, Kate.

Kath. Les dames et demoiselles pour être baisées devant leur noces, il n'est pas la coutume de France.

K. Hen. Madam, my interpreter, what says she?

Alice. Dat it is not be de fashion pour les ladies of France, —I cannot tell what is, baiser, en English.

K. Hen. To kiss.

Alice. Your majesty entendre better que moi.

K. Hen. It is not a fashion for the maids in France to kiss before they are married, would she say?

Alice. Oui, vraiment.

K. Hen. O Kate, nice customs curt'sy to great kings. Dear Kate, you and I cannot be confined within the weak list of a country's fashion; we are the makers of manners, Kate; and the liberty that follows our places stops the mouths of all find-faults; as I will do yours, for upholding the nice fashion of your country in denying me a kiss: therefore, patiently, and yielding. [Kissing her.] You have witchcraft in your lips, Kate: there is more eloquence in a sugar touch of them, than in the tongues of the French council: and they should sooner persuade Harry of England than a general petition of monarchs. Here comes your father.

Enter the French KING and QUEEN, BURGUNDY, BEDFORD, GLOSTER, EXETER, WESTMORELAND, and other French and English Lords.

Bur. God save your majesty! my royal cousin, teach you our princess English?

K. Hen. I would have her learn, my fair cousin, how perfectly I love her; and that is good English.

Bur. Is she not apt?

K. Hen. Our tongue is rough, coz; and my condition<sup>1</sup> is not smooth: so that, having neither the voice nor the heart of flattery about me, I cannot so conjure up the spirit of love in her, that he will appear in his true likeness.

Bur. Pardon the frankness of my mirth, if I answer you for that. If you would conjure in her you must make a circle: if conjure up love in her in his true likeness, he must appear naked and blind: Can you blame her then, being a maid yet rosed over with the virgin crimson of modesty, if she deny the appearance of a naked blind boy in her naked seeing self? It were, my lord, a hard condition for a maid to consign to.

K. Hen. Yet they do wink, and yield; as love is blind, and enforces.

Bur. They are then excused, my lord, when they see not what they do.

K. Hen. Then, good my lord, teach your cousin to content winking.

Bur. I will wink on her to consent, my lord, if you will teach her to know my meaning: for maids, well summered and warm kept, are like flies at Bartholomew-tide, blind, though they have their eyes; and then they will endure handling, which before would not abide looking on.

K. Hen. This moral ties me over to time, and a hot summer; and so I shall catch the fly, your cousin, in the latter end, and she must be blind too.

Bur. As love is, my lord, before it loves.

K. Hen. It is so; and you may, some of you, thank love for my blindness; who cannot see many a fair French city, for one fair French maid that stands in my way.

Fr. King. Yes, my lord, you see them perspectively, the cities turned into a maid; for they are all girdled with maiden walls, that war hath never entered.

K. Hen. Shall Kate be my wife?

Fr. King. So please you.

K. Hen. I am content; so the maiden cities you talk of may wait on her; so the maid that stood in the way of my wish shall show me the way to my will.

Fr. King. We have consented to all terms of reason.

K. Hen. Is't so, my lords of England?

West. The king hath granted every article: His daughter, first; and then in sequel, all, According to their firm proposed natures.

Exe. Only, he hath not yet subscribed this:—Where your majesty demands,—That the king of France, having any occasion to write for matter of grant, shall name your highness in this form, and with this addition, in French,—Notre très cher fils Henry roi d'Angleterre, héritier de France;<sup>a</sup> and thus in Latin,—Præclarissimus filius noster Henricus, rex Angliæ, et hæres Franciæ.

Fr. King. Nor this I have not, brother, so denied, But your request shall make me let it pass.

K. Hen. I pray you, then, in love and dear alliance, Let that one article rank with the rest: And, thereupon, give me your daughter.

Fr. King. Take her, fair son; and from her blood raise up

Issue to me: that the contending kingdoms
Of France and England, whose very shores look pale
With envy of each other's happiness,
May cease their hatred; and this dear conjunction Plant neighbourhood and Christian-like accord
In their sweet bosoms, that never war advance
His bleeding sword 'twixt England and fair France.

All. Amen!

K. Hen. Now welcome, Kate:—and bear me witness all, That here I kiss her as my sovereign queen. [Flourish.]

Q. Isa. God, the best maker of all marriages,
Combine your hearts in one, your realms in one!
As man and wife, being two, are one in love,
So be there 'twixt your kingdoms such a spousal,
That never may ill office, or fell jealousy,
Which troubles oft the bed of blessed marriage,
Thrust in between the paction of these kingdoms,
To make divorce of their incorporate league;
That English may as French, French Englishmen,
Receive each other!—God speak this Amen!

All. Amen.

K. Hen. Prepare we for our marriage;—on which day,
My lord of Burgundy, we'll take your oath,
And all the peers', for surety of our leagues.
Then shall I swear to Kate, and you to me;
And may our oaths well kept and prosperous be!
[Exeunt.]

CHORUS.

Thus far, with rough and all unable pen,
Our bending author hath pursued the story
In little room confining mighty men,
Mangling by starts the full course of their glory.
Small time, but in that small, most greatly liv'd
This star of England: fortune made his sword;
By which the world's best garden he achiev'd,
And of it left his son imperial lord.
Henry the Sixth, in infant bands crown'd king
Of France and England, did this king succeed;
Whose state so many had the managing,
That they lost France, and made his England bleed:
Which oft our stage hath shown; and, for their sake,
In your fair minds let this acceptance take.

ILLUSTRATIONS TO KING HENRY V.

ACT I.

CHORUS.—“Leash'd in like hounds, should famine, sword, and fire,” &c.

FAMINE, sword, and fire are “the dogs of war” in Julius Cæsar. In Shakspeare's favourite chronicler, Holinshed, they are “landmaidens.” Henry V., addressing himself to the people of Rouen, “declared that the goddess of battle, called Bellona, had three handmaidens ever of necessity attending upon her, as blood, fire, and famine.”

In Sir Philip Sidney's “Defence of Foesie” the attempts to introduce battles upon the stage are thus ridiculed: “Two armies flying, represented with four swords and bucklers, and then what hard heart will not receive it for a pitched field?” Shakspeare, in this chorus, does not defend this absurdity, although the remarks of the accomplished author of the “Arcadia” might have led him here to apologize for it. It is well remarked, however, by Schlegel, that our poet has not entertained such a scruple “in the occasion of many other great battles, and among others of that of Philippi.” The reason, we think, is obvious. In this play Shakspeare put forth all the strength of his nationality. The battle of Agincourt was the greatest event of all his chronicle-histories. Henry V. was, unquestionably, his favourite hero. But the events depicted in this play were, to a certain extent, undramatic: they belonged to the epic region of poetry. Hence the introduction of the chorus, which imparts a lyric character to the whole performance; and hence the apology for the “unworthy scaffold,”—the “cockpit,”—the “wooden O,”—by which terms the poet designated his comparatively small and rude theatre. He meets the difficulty in the only way in which it could be met. He demands from the audience a higher exercise of the imagination than they were wont to exercise:—

“Piece out our imperfections with your thoughts.”

Again, in the chorus to the third act:—

“Still be kind,
And eke out our performance with your mind.”

Those in our own day who have been accustomed to see such a play as Henry V. got up with battalions of combatants, may laugh at the necessity for apologizing for “four or five most vile and ragged foils,

Right ill dispos'd in brawl ridiculous.”

But, after all, the battles and processions of the modern theatre are still “mockeries,” and the spectator must be called upon to “make imaginary puissance.” Those who attempt to dispense with the imagination of the audience, instead of merely assisting it, forget the higher objects of the poet.

<sup>c</sup> SCENE I.—“Hear him but reason in divinity.”

The commentators give us some long notes upon Warburton's theory, that this passage was a compliment to the theological acquirements of James I. It does not appear to us that such conjectures offer any proper illustration of Shakspeare. This scene, we apprehend, was written at the same time with the choruses—that is, four years before the accession of James. Johnson very justly observes, that “the poet, if he had James in his thoughts, was no skilful encomiast; for the mention of Harry's skill in war forced upon the remembrance of his audience the great deficiency of their present king.” The praises of Henry, which Shakspeare puts in the mouth of the Archbishop of Canterbury, had no latent reference. They are strictly in accordance with the historical opinion of that prince; and they are even subdued when compared with the extravagant eulogies of the chroniclers. Hall, for example, says, “This prince was almost the Arabical Phoenix, and amongst his predecessors a very Paragon. . . . This Henry was a king whose life was immaculate, and his living without spot. This king was a prince whom all men loved, and of none disdained. This prince was a captain against whom fortune never frowned, nor mischance once spurned. This captain was a shepherd whom his flock loved, and lovingly obeyed. This shepherd was such a justiciary that no offence was unpunished, nor friendship unrewarded. This justiciary was so feared, that all rebellion was banished, and sedition suppressed.” The education of Henry was, literally, in the “practick part of life.” At eleven years of age he was a student at Oxford, under the care of his uncle Beaufort. In a small room over the ancient gateway of Queen's College was Henry lodged; and here, under the rude portraits in stained glass of his uncle and himself, was the following inscription, which Wood gives in his “Athenæ Oxonienses:”—

IN PERPETUAM REI MEMORIAM.
IMPERATOR BRITANNIÆ,
TRIUMPHATOR GALLIÆ,
HOSTIUM VICTOR ET SUI.
HENRICUS V.
PARVI HUIUS CUBICULI.
OLIM MAGNUS INCOLA.

The “hostium victor et sui” is one of the many evidences of the universality, if not of the truth, of the tradition that “his addiction was to courses vain.

His early removal from the discipline of the schools to the license of the camp could not have been advantageous to the morals of the high-spirited boy. That he was a favourite of Richard II. we know by the fact of his knighting him during his Irish expedition.

His subsequent command of the Welsh army, when little more than fourteen, was a circumstance still less favourable to his self-control. That the “insolency and wildness” of the boy should be the result of such uncurbed and irresponsible power, is quite as credible as that the man should have put on such “gravity and soberness,”—“the flower of kings past, and a glass to them that should succeed.”

<sup>d</sup> SCENE II.—“*My great grandfather,
Never went with his forces into France,*” &c.

In Andrew of Wyntoun's “Cronykil of Scotland” we have a curious picture of the supposed defenceless state of England when the king was absent upon foreign conquests:—

“Thai sayd, that thai mycht rycht welle fare
Til Lwndyn, for in England than
Of gret mycht wes left na man,
For, thai sayd, all war in Frawns,
Bot sowteris,* skynneris, or marchauns.”

SCENE II.—“For government,” &c.

In a foot-note upon this passage we have given a quotation of Cicero, for the purpose of suggesting a correction of the text. But this passage, which, taken altogether, is a very remarkable one, opens up the questio vexata of the learning of Shakspeare, to an extent which it would be very difficult completely to follow. The considerations involved in this passage are briefly these: the words of Cicero, to which the lines of Shakspeare have so close a resemblance, form part of a fragment of that portion of his lost treatise, “De Republicâ,” which is presented to us only in the writings of St. Augustin. The first question, therefore, is, had Shakspeare read the fragment in St. Augustin? But Cicero's “De Republicâ” was, as far as we know, an adaptation of Plato's “Republic;” the sentence we have quoted is almost literally to be found in Plato; and, what is still more curious, the lines of Shakspeare are more deeply imbued with the Platonic philosophy than the passage of Cicero. These lines,—

“For government, through high, and low, and lower.
Put into parts, doth keep in one concent,
Congreeing in a full and natural close,
Like music:”—

ACT III.

<sup>a</sup> SCENE IV.—“Alice, tu as été,” &c.

When in the Epilogue to Henry IV., Part II., the author promised the audience “to make you merry with fair Katharine of France,” he certainly was a fitting judge of the sources from which his audience would derive their merriment. Warburton, however, calls this a ridiculous scene. Hammer rejects it as an interpolation of the players. Not only this scene, but the scraps of French which are put in the mouths of other characters, have a dramatic purpose. The great object of this play is to excite and elevate the nationality of the English; and this could not be done without a marked and obvious distinction between the people of the two nations. The occasional French accomplishes this much more readily than any other device. It is to be remembered that Shakspeare’s plays were written to be acted. Of distinguishing dresses the wardrobe of Shakspeare’s stage had few to boast. The introduction of Katharine in this particular scene, learning the very rudiments of English, is a fit introduction for that of the fifth act, where she attempts to converse with her future husband in his native tongue.

And teach lavoltas high.*”

The lavolta, a dance of Italian origin, as its name imports, passed through Provence into the rest of France, and thence into England. It appears, from the descriptions of it, to have been a very exaggerated waltz; and its introduction into France was gravely ascribed to the power of witches. Sir John Davies, in his poem called “Orchestra,” has given us a very spirited description of the lavolta, which shows that its grace might have recommended it without the aid of sorcery. He has described the musical time of this dance very poetically:—

“And still their feet an anapest do sound:
An anapest is all their musick’s song,
Whose first two feet is short, and third is long.”

The ordinary reading of pax was pix; yet all the old editions read pax. The alteration was made by Theobald. Johnson says pix and pax signify the same thing. Nares, in his “Glossary,” has put this matter right. A pix—the casket which contains a sacred wafer—is not such an article as Bardolph could readily have stolen. The “pax of little price” is a small plate of wood or metal, with some sacred representation engraved upon it, tendered to the people to kiss at the conclusion of the mass. It was a substitute for the kiss of peace of the primitive church. The custom of kissing the pax is now disused; but such a relic of the Romish Church was exhibited at the Society of Antiquaries in 1821.

SCENE VI.—“A beard of the general’s cut.”

Beards of a particular cut had their appropriate names, and were sometimes characteristic of professions. The steeletto beard and the spade beard appear to have belonged to the military profession, though the cut of particular generals—setters of the fashion—might vary. Southampton is always represented with the steeletto beard—Essex with the spade beard.

SCENE VI.—“There’s for thy labour, Montjoy.”

It was necessary in the days of chivalry not only to preserve the inviolable character of heralds, who often did the duties of ambassadors, but to reward them liberally, however unpleasant might be their messages. In his notes to “Marmion,” Scott says, “So sacred was the herald’s office, that, in 1515, Lord Drummond was by parliament declared guilty of treason, and his lands forfeited, because he had struck with his fist the Lion King-at-Arms when he reproved him for his follies. Nor was he restored, but at the Lion’s earnest solicitations.”

The character and the costume of the Kerne (an abbreviation, probably, of the Gaelic Ketheryn, Cateran) are described in Derrick’s “Image of Ireland,” printed in Lord Somers’s Tracts. Scott’s description in “Rokeby” of the faithful adherent of an Irish chieftain is founded upon the ruder verses of Derrick:—

“His plaited hair in elf-locks spread
Around his bare and matted head;
On leg and thigh, close stretch’d and trim,
His vesture show’d the sinewy limb;
In saffron dyed, a linen vest
Was frequent folded round his breast;
A mantle long and loose he wore,
Shaggy with ice, and stain’d with gore.”

ACT IV.

<sup>a</sup> CHORUS.—“Fills the wide vessel of the universe.”

We are gravely informed by Warburton that “we are not to think Shakspeare so ignorant as to imagine it was night over the whole globe at once.” Ben Jonson has these lines:—

“O for a clap of thunder now, as loud
As to be heard throughout the universe!”

We are not to think Jonson so ignorant as not to know that a clap of thunder could not possibly be heard throughout the mundane system.

CHORUS.—“Each battle sees the other’s umber’d face.”

“The author’s profession,” says Malone, “probably furnished him with this epithet.” But players *redde*n their cheeks as well as brown them, and we therefore must in the same way suppose that when the Friar says to Juliet,

“The roses in thy lips and cheeks shall fade,”

Shakspeare was thinking of rouge.

CHORUS.—“With busy hammers closing rivets up.”

The plate armour was not only riveted in parts before it was put on, but the armourers were employed in closing up parts which fitted on to each other by rivets, when the knight was being equipped for the battle or tournament.

ACT V.

<sup>a</sup> CHORUS.—“Like a mighty whiffler fore the king.”

A whiffler may be taken generally to mean an officer who leads the way in processions. A whiffler was originally a fifer or piper, who anciently went first on occasions of pageant and ceremony. Minsheu defines him to be a club or staff bearer. Grose, in his “Provincial Glossary,” mentions whifflers as “men who make way for the corporation of Norwich, by flourishing their swords.” The sword-flourishers of Norwich are standard-bearers in London, under the same name.

It is extremely difficult to explain this passage as it stands. Why should the lamentation of the French invite the King of England to stay at home? If we were half as venturesome as our editorial predecessors, we would transpose a line as printed (such a typographical change of a manuscript being too common in printing) and read thus:—

“Now in London place him;
As yet the lamentation of the French.
The emperor’s coming in behalf of France
Invites the king of England’s stay at home,
To order peace between them: and omit
All the occurrences,” &c.

<sup>c</sup> SCENE I.—“Why wear you your leek to-day? Saint Davy’s day is past.”

We have been favoured with some memoranda on the use of the leek, as the national emblem of Wales, by that accomplished antiquary Sir Samuel Meyrick, the substance of which we have great pleasure in presenting to our readers. Not one of the Welsh bards, though there exists a tolerable series of their compositions from the fifth century till the time of Elizabeth, has in any manner alluded to the leek as a national emblem. Even at the present day the custom of wearing leeks on the 1st of March is confined to the members of modern clubs. There is, however, a tradition in Wales as to the origin of the custom, namely, that the Saxons being about to attack the Britons on St. David's Day, put leeks in their caps, in order, if dispersed, to be known to each other; and that the Britons having gained the victory, transferred the leeks to their own caps-as signals of triumph. This, like many other traditions, seems to have been invented for the nonce. But the Harleian MS., No. 1977, written by a Welshman of the time of James I., contains the following passage:—

“ I like the leek above all herbs and flowers ;
When first we wore the same, the field was ours.
The leek is white and green, whereby is meant,
That Britons are both stout and eminent ;
Next to the lion and the unicorn,
The leek's the fairest emblem that is worn.”

Now, the inference to be drawn from these lines is, that the leek was assumed upon, or immediately after, the battle of Bosworth Field, which was won by Henry VII., who had many Welshmen (his countrymen) in his army, and whose yeomen guard was composed of Welshmen; and this inference is derived from the fact that the Tudor colours were white and green, and, as may be seen in several heraldic MSS., formed the field on which the English, French, and Irish arms were placed. “The field was ours” alludes to the victory, of course, as well as to the heraldic field.

This view of the case would account for the leek being only worn by Welshmen in England, and its having been a custom of comparatively modern origin in the time of Shakspeare.

SCENE II.—“Notre très cher fils,” &c.

Dr. Farmer, in his “Essay on the Learning of Shakspeare,” winds up his many proofs of the ignorance of our poet by the following argument, the crown of all:—“But to come to a conclusion, I will give you an irrefragable argument, that Shakspeare did not understand two very common words in the French and Latin languages. According to the articles of agreement between the conqueror, Henry, and the king of France, the latter was to style the former (in the corrected French of the former editions), Nostre tres cher filz Henry roy d'Angleterre; and in Latin, Præclarissimus filius, &c. ‘What,’ says Dr. Warburton, ‘is tres cher in French, præclarissimus in Latin! we should read præcarissimus.’ This appears to be exceedingly true; but how came the blunder? It is a typographical one in Holinshed, which Shakspeare copied; but must indisputably have corrected, had he been acquainted with the languages.” Now really this is a very weak argument, upon Farmer's own showing; for Shakspeare, finding the passage in Holinshed, was bound to copy it, without setting himself up as a verbal critic; nor was it necessary that the Latin words of the treaty should have exactly corresponded with the French. He might have understood the agreement to mean, that the very dear son in the one language should be the most noble son in the other. But Malone says that the mistake is in all the old historians, as well as in Holinshed. He is not quite right in this statement, for the word is precharissimus in Hall. At any rate, the truth could not be ascertained till the publication of such a work as Rymer's “Fœdera,” where, in the treaty of Troyes, the word stands præcarissimus. By a super-refinement of veneration for Shakspeare, as justifiable as Farmer's coarse depreciation of him, the præclarissimus might be taken to prove his learning; for Capell maintains that præcarissimus is no Latin word. We give this note to show what stuff criticism may be made of, when it departs from the safe resting-place of common sense.

HISTORICAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

ACT I.

THE opening scene of this play furnishes an apt example of the dramatic power of Shakspeare. Dr. Johnson made speeches for Chatham and Grenville, upon knowing the subject of a parliamentary discussion; but his speakers do not talk with anything like the reality of Canterbury and Ely in the dialogue before us. The bill for the appropriation of “the temporal lands devoutly given, and disordinately spent by religious and other spiritual persons” (as Hall has it), introduced in the second year of Henry V., was no doubt a cause of great alarm to the clergy. Hall, who was as bitter a hater of priests as Hume, says, “This before-remembered bill was much noted and fear'd amongst the religious sorts whom in effect it much touched, insomuch that the fat abbots sweat, the proud friars frown'd, the poor friars curs'd, the sely nuns wept.” Shakspeare has none of this somewhat gross hatred of the Church; but he has followed the chroniclers in attributing the war with France to the instigation of the bishops. Hall gives the speech of Henry Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury, “thereto newly preferred, which before time had been a monk of the Carthusians,” at great length, and in the first person. Holinshed paraphrases it. We have no doubt, from the coincidence of particular expressions, that Shakspeare had both chroniclers before him, although he follows Holinshed in a blunder which we have noticed. It would be tedious to give these passages from the chroniclers; and the only use would be to show how Shakspeare's art made the duller things spirited, and the most prosaic poetical.

The incident of the tennis balls is found in Holinshed. There has been a good deal of reasonable doubt thrown upon this statement, and, indeed, it seems altogether opposed to the general temper of the French, who in their negotiations with Henry appear to have been moderate and conciliatory. The best evidence for its truth is the following passage from an inedited MS. in the British Museum, apparently written at the period, and first published by Sir Harris Nicolas in his admirable “History of the Battle of Agincourt:”—

“The Dolphine of Fraunce answered to our ambassatoure, and said in this manner, that the Kyng was over yong, and to tender of age, to make any warre ayens hym, and was not lyke yet to be noo good werrioure to doo and make suche a conquest there upon hym; and somewhat in cornet and dispite he sente to hym a tonne full of tenys ballis, because he wolde have somewhat for to play withall for hym and for hys lordis, and that became hym better than to mayntain any were: and than anon our lordes that was embassadours token hir leve and comen into England ayenne, and told the Kyng and his counceill of the ungoodly aunswer that they had of the Dolphyn, and of the present the which he had sent unto the Kyng: and whan the Kyng had hard her wordis, and the aunswere of the Dolpynne he was wondre sore agreved, and right evell apayd towarde the Frensshmen, and toward the King and the Dolphynne, and thought to avenge hym upon hem as sone as God wold send hym grace and myght, and anon lette make tenys ballis for the Dolphynne, in all the hast that they myght be made; and they were great gonne stones for the Dolpynne to play wyth all.”

There is some doubt whether the balls were “tennis balls.” This extract uses that word, although it might not apply to the game of Shakspeare's time. Holinshed calls them “Paris balls.”

ACT II.

The conspiracy of Cambridge, Scroop, and Grey against Henry V. is minutely detailed in Holinshed. Shakspeare has followed the statement of the chronicler, that the prisoners confessed that they had received a great sum of money of the French king, to deliver Henry into the hands of his enemies, or to murder him. It appears, however, by the verdict of the jury (for the conspirators were not summarily executed, as described in the play and the Chronicle), that it was their intention to proclaim Edward Earl of March rightful heir to the crown in case Richard II. was actually dead. The following passage in Holinshed is the foundation of Henry's address to the prisoners in the second scene:—“If you have conspired the death and destruction of me, which am the head of the realm and governor of the people, without doubt I must of necessity think, that you likewise have compassed the confusion of all that here be with me, and also the final destruction of your native country.

Wherefore, seeing that you have enterprised so great a mischief, to the intent that your fautours, being in the army, may abhor so detestable an offence by the punishment of you, haste you to receive the pain that for your demerits you have deserved, and that punishment that by the law for your offences is provided."

In the fourth scene of this act, the Constable only, amongst the French nobles, takes part in the dialogue; but the Duke of Burgundy is mentioned as being present. Shakspeare did not find this in the Chronicles; and it is probable that the Duke of Burgundy was absent from France, as the States of Flanders proclaimed that the duke would render no assistance in the defence of France, unless the Dauphin redressed the injuries which he had heaped upon his wife, the daughter of the duke.

ACT III.

"Suppose that you have seen
The well-appointed king at Hampton pier
Embark his royalty; and his brave fleet
With silken streamers the young Phœbus fanning."

It was not in Holinshed that Shakspeare found a hint of the splendour of Henry's fleet. That chronicler simply says, "When the wind came about prosperous to his purpose, he caused the mariners to weigh up anchors, and hoise up sails." Speed, whose History of Great Britain was not published till 1611, speaking of Henry's second expedition into France in 1417, describes the king as embarking in a ship whose sails were of purple silk most richly embroidered with gold. Neither Holinshed nor Hall, in his account of the second expedition, mentions this circumstance. But our poet might have found the narrative of a somewhat similar pageantry in Froissart, where the French ships destined for the invasion of England in 1387 are described as painted with the arms of the commanders and gilt, with banners, pennons, and standards of silk. The invading fleet of Henry V. consisted of between twelve and fourteen hundred vessels, of various sizes, from twenty to three hundred tons. On the 10th of August, 1415, the king embarked on board his ship, the Trinity, between Portsmouth and Southampton, and the whole fleet was under way on the 11th. By a curious error in the folio of 1623, the king "at Dover pier" embarks his royalty. Of course this was an error of the printer or transcriber, for the passage is inconsistent with the chorus of the second act. Warton tells us that amongst the records of the town of Southampton there is a minute and authentic account of the encampment before the embarkation, and that the low plain where the army lay ready to go on board is now entirely covered with sea, and called West Point.

The first scene of this act brings us at once before Harfleur. The negotiations alluded to in the chorus had occurred at Winchester in the July preceding the invasion. No opposition was made to the landing of Henry's army on the 14th, when the disembarkation took place at Clef de Caux (about three miles from Harfleur), before which place the fleet had arrived on the 13th. Sir H. Nicolas, in his "History of the Battle of Agincourt," has translated a very curious Latin manuscript in the Cotton collection, being the narrative of a priest who accompanied the expedition. In this narrative the landing is thus described:—"The king, with the greater part of his army, landed in small vessels, boats, and skiffs, and immediately took up a position on the hill nearest Harfleur, having on the one side, on the declivity of the valley, a coppice wood towards the river Seine, and on the other enclosed farms and orchards."

The siege of Harfleur is somewhat briefly described by Holinshed. The conduct of that enterprise was agreeable to the rules of war laid down by "Master Giles," the principal military authority of that period. The loss sustained by the besieging army was very great; and in a few days the English forces were visited by a frightful dysentery. Many of the most eminent leaders fell before its ravages. This was probably to be attributed to the position of the invading army; for, according to Holinshed, those who "valiantly defended the siege, damming up the river that hath its course through the town, the water rose so high betwixt the king's camp, and the Duke of Clarence's camp, divided by the same river, that the Englishmen were constrained to withdraw their artillery from one side." The mines and the countermines of Fluellen are to be found in Holins-hed:—"Daily was the town assaulted: for the Duke of Gloucester, to whom the order of the siege was committed, made three mines under the ground, and approaching to the walls with his engines and ordinance, would not suffer them within to take any rest. For although they with their counter-mining somewhat disappointed the Englishmen, and came to fight with them hand to hand within the mines, so that they went no further forward with that work; yet they were so enclosed on each side, as well by water as land, that succour they saw could none come to them." Harfleur surrendered on the 22nd of September, after a siege of thirty-six days. The previous negotiations between Henry and the governor of the town were conducted by commissioners. Shakspeare, of course, dramatically brought his principal personage upon the scene, in the convention by which the town was surrendered. Holinshed, who in general has an eye for the picturesque, has no description of the gorgeous ceremony which accompanied the surrender; but such a description is found in the older narratives, which represent the king upon "his royal throne, placed under a pavilion at the top of the hill before the town, where his nobles and other principal persons, an illustrious body of men, were assembled in numbers, in their best equipments; his crowned triumphal helmet being held on his right hand upon a halbert-staff by Sir Gilbert Umfreville."—(Cotton MS.) The account of the loss which the English army sustained during the thirty-six days subsequent to its landing would be almost incredible, if its accuracy were not supported by every conflicting testimony. It appears that if Henry landed with thirty thousand men, more than two-thirds must, during the short period of the siege, have been slain, have died of disease, or have been sent back to England as incapable of proceeding. The English army, when it quitted Harfleur, did not amount to much more than eight thousand fighting men. The priest who accompanied the expedition says, "There remained fit for drawing the sword or for battle not above nine hundred lancers, and five thousand archers." Monstrelet and other French writers rate the English forces at a much greater number.

"King Henry," says Holinshed, "after the winning of Harfleur, determined to have proceeded further in the winning of other towns and fortresses: but because the dead time of the winter approached, it was determined by advice of his council that he should in all convenient speed set forward, and march through the country towards Calais by land, lest his return as then homewards should of slanderous tongues be named a running away." From the contemporary writers it appears that this resolution was taken by Henry against the advice of his council. There was a chivalrous hardihood in the resolve, which almost entirely covers its rashness. His trust, said the king, was in God; he was resolved to see the territories which were his own; he would not subject himself to the reproach of cowardice. "Our mind," said he, "is prepared to endure every peril, rather than they shall be able to breathe the slightest reproach against your king. We will go, if it pleases God, without harm or danger, and, if they disturb our journey, we will frustrate their intentions with honour, victory, and triumph." The army commenced its perilous march about the 8th of October. The king, upon landing in France, had issued a proclamation forbidding, under pain of death, all plunder and other excesses. This proclamation was now renewed. The army was five days before it reached Abbeville. The bridges of the Somme were everywhere broken down; and the dispirited forces were, in consequence, compelled to march up the south bank of the river till they reached Nesle. There, over a temporary bridge, Henry at length crossed the Somme. The opposition to his march had now become most formidable. The daring character of his movement from Harfleur had roused the French from their supineness. The fifth scene of this act is a most spirited representation of the mingled contempt and anger with which the French nobility regarded Henry's progress through the heart of the country. Holinshed describes the resolution to send the herald Montjoy to Henry. Three heralds, according to the contemporary accounts, appeared before the English king on the 20th. His answer is thus given in Holinshed:—"Mine intent is to do as it pleaseth God: I will not seek your master at this time; but if he or his seek me, I will meet with them, God willing. If any of your nation attempt once to stop me in my journey now towards Calais, at their jeopardy be it; and wish I not any of you so unadvised as to be the occasion that I dye your tawny ground with your red blood." Henry continued to press on his troops with great regularity, though they suffered the most serious privations. They were "shrewdly out of beef," as Orleans says; they were "with sickness much enfeebled," as Henry declares. Holinshed describes their situation with great quaintness:—"The enemies had destroyed all the corn before they came. Rest could they none take, for their enemies with alarms did ever so infest them; daily it rained, and nightly it freezed: of fuel there was great scarcity, of fluxes plenty: money enough, but wares for their relief to bestow it on had they none." And yet under these circumstances, the proclamation against plunder was enforced with undeviating justice. The fact of a man being hanged for stealing a sacred vessel is found in Holinshed.

The oriflamme had been hoisted the last time that the sacred banner was displayed in France. Sixty thousand princes, and knights, and esquires, and men at arms, were gathered round the national standard. When Henry crossed the river Ternoise, on the 24th of October, this mighty army stood before him, "filling," says the priest who accompanied the march, "a very large field as with an innumerable host of locusts."

ACT IV.

The magnificent chorus of this act presents such a vivid picture of the circumstances that marked the eve of the battle of Agincourt, that even if they were not, for the most part, supported by authentic history, it would be impossible to dispossess ourselves of the belief that they were true. "The French," according to Holinshed, "were very merry, pleasant, and full of game"—"the English made peace with God in confessing their sins." Holinshed also mentions the French playing at dice for the English prisoners. But the narratives of Monstrelet and of St. Remy are much more minute than Holinshed, and in one or two small particulars they differ from that of the poet. The account of Monstrelet is exceedingly interesting:—

"The French, with all the royal officers, that is to say, the Constable, the Marshal Boucicault, the Lord of Dampierre and Sir Clignet de Brabant, each styling himself admiral of France; the Lord of Rambures, master of the cross-bows; with many other princes, barons, and knights—planted their banners with loud acclamations of joy around the royal banner of the Constable, on the spot they had fixed upon, situated in the county of St. Pol, or territory of Azincourt, by which the next morning the English must pass on their march to Calais. Great fires were this night lighted near to the banner under which each person was to fight; but, although the French were full one hundred and fifty thousand 'chevaucheurs,' with a great number of waggons and carts, cannon, ribaudequins, and all other military stores, they had but little music to cheer their spirits; and it was remarked with surprise that scarcely any of their horses neighed during the night, which was considered by many as a bad omen. The English during the whole night played on their trumpets and various other instruments, insomuch that the whole neighbourhood resounded with their music; and notwithstanding they were much fatigued and oppressed by cold, hunger, and other annoyances, they made their peace with God, by confessing their sins with tears, and numbers of them taking the sacrament; for, as it was related by some prisoners, they looked for certain death on the morrow."

The foundation of the great scene when Westmoreland wishes—

"But one ten thousand of those men in England
That do no work to-day!"

is in Holinshed. "It is said, that as he heard one of the host utter his wish to another thus: 'I would to God there were with us now so many good soldiers as are at this hour within England!' the king answered: 'I would not wish a man more here than I have; we are indeed in comparison to the enemies but a few; but if God of his clemency do favour us and our just cause (as I trust He will), we shall speed well enough.'" This circumstance, however, really occurred, not as Holinshed has described it on the day of the battle, but when the French host was first seen by the English; and he who uttered the wish for some more men was Sir Walter Hungerford.

The French forces, on the morning of the 25th of October, were drawn up in three lines on the plain of Agincourt, through which the route to Calais lay.

"When we reached the top of the hill," says the priest who accompanied the English army, "we saw three columns of the French emerge from the upper part of the valley, about a mile from us; who at length being formed into battalions, companies, and troops, in multitudes compared with us, halted a little more than half a mile opposite to us, filling a very wide field, as if with an innumerable host of locusts,—a moderate-sized valley being betwixt us and them."

"Nothing can be more accurate than this description of the locality. We have stood upon this ascent, having left the little river and the bridge of Blangy about a mile distant. Looking back, there is a range of gentle hills to the east, in the direction of St. Pol, from which the French army marched. Emerging 'from the upper part of the valley,' the French army would fill 'a very wide field'—the plain of Agincourt. The village of Agincourt now consists of a number of straggling mud-built cottages, and a farm or two, with a church of the beginning of the last century. It is covered by a wood towards the plain. Opposite Agincourt is another village, called Tramecourt, also covered by a wood. The plain of Agincourt is a considerable table-land, now fully cultivated, and expanding into an open country after we have passed between the two woods. The village of Maisoncelles is about a mile from the field."

It is unnecessary for us to follow the chroniclers, or the more minute contemporary historians, through their details of the fearful carnage and victory of Agincourt. We may, however, put the facts shortly before our readers, as they may be collected from Sir H. Nicolas's elaborate and careful history of the battle:—

The fighting-men of France wore "long coats of steel, reaching to their knees, which were very heavy; below these was armour for their legs; and above, white harness, and bascinets, with camails." They were drawn up between two woods, in a space wholly inadequate for the movements of such an immense body; and the ground was soft from heavy rains. It was with the utmost difficulty they could stand or lift their weapons. The horses at every step sunk into the mud. Henry formed his little band in one line, the archers being posted between the wings, in the form of a wedge, with sharp stakes fixed before them. The king, habited in his "cote d'armes," mounted a small grey horse; but he subsequently fought on foot. He addressed his troops with his usual spirit. Each army remained inactive for some hours. A truce was at length proposed by the French. The reply of Henry, before an army ten times as great as his own, differed little from the terms he had offered in his own capital. Towards the middle of the day the order was given to the English to advance, by Henry crying aloud, "Advance banners." Sir Thomas de Erpyngham, the commander of the archers, threw his truncheon into the air, exclaiming, "Now strike!" The English immediately prostrated themselves to the ground, beseeching the protection of Heaven, and proceeded in three lines on the French army. The archers of Henry soon put the French cavalry in disorder: and the whole army rushing on, with the national huzza, the archers threw aside their bows, and slew all before them with their bill-hooks and hatchets. The immense numbers of the French proved their ruin. The battle soon became a slaughter; and the harnessed knights, almost incapable of moving, were hacked to pieces by the English archers, "who were habited in jackets, and had their hosen loose, with hatchets or swords hanging from their girdles, whilst many were barefooted and without hats." The battle lasted about three hours. The English "stood on the heaps of corpses, which exceeded a man's height;" the French, indeed, fell almost passive in their lines. Henry, at one period of the battle, issued an order for the slaughter of his prisoners. Even the French writers justify this horrible circumstance as an act of self-preservation. The total loss of the French was about ten thousand slain on the field; that of the English appears to have been about twelve hundred. Most of the dead were afterwards buried in enormous trenches.

The English king conducted himself with his accustomed dignity to his many illustrious prisoners. The victorious army marched to Calais in fine order, and embarked for England, without any attempt to follow up their almost miraculous triumph. Henry reached Calais on the 29th of October, and on the 17th of November landed at Dover. He entered London amidst the most expensive pageantry of the citizens, contrasting with the studied simplicity of his own retinue and demeanour, on Saturday, the 24th of November.

The triumphal procession and the pageant, with which Henry was welcomed to London, described in the chorus, are given in Holins-ned; so also the king's freedom "from vainness and self-glorious pride." The chronicler thus depicts this modesty:—"The king, like a great and sober personage, and as one remembering from whom all victories are sent, seemed little to regard such vain pomp and shows as were in triumphant sort devised for his welcoming home from so prosperous a journey, insomuch that he would not suffer his helmet to be carried with him, whereby might have appeared to the people the blows and dents that were to be seen in the same; neither would he suffer any ditties to be made and sung by minstrels of his glorious victory, for that he would wholly have the praise and thanks altogether given to God." Percy, however, thinks that an old song, "For the victory of Agincourt," was drawn up by some poet laureate of those days. This song, or hymn, was printed from a manuscript copy in the Pepys collection. Our readers will perhaps be satisfied with the last stanza:—

"Now gracious God he save owre kyng,
His peple, and all his wel wyllynge,
Gef him gode lyfe, and gode endynge,
That we with merth mowe savely synge,
Deo gratias:
Deo gratias Anglia redde pro victoria."

The poet, in the chorus to this act, desires his audience to "omit

All the occurrences, whatever chanc'd,
Till Harry's back-return again to France."

But Henry's return to France was marked by many fearful struggles for power, before the treaty of Troyes was concluded, which gave him the hand of Katharine, and made the King of France his viceroy. Towns had been won; armies had perished. The Dauphin, whom we have seen at Agincourt, was no more; and he was succeeded in his rank by a prince of greater profligacy. Unhappy France was assailed by a resolute enemy, and had nothing to oppose to him but the weakness of factions, more intent upon destroying each other than disposed to unite for a common cause. The Duke of Burgundy, brought in by the poet as the advocate of peace, was certainly present at the negotiations near Meulan, on the 30th of May, 1419, when Henry first saw Katharine, and was struck with her grace and beauty. But this Duke of Burgundy, Jean Sans Peur, was murdered by the Dauphin, on the bridge of Montereau, on the following 10th of September. This event led to a close connection between Henry and the young Duke of Burgundy, who was anxious to revenge the death of his father; and perhaps this circumstance mainly contributed to Henry's success in negotiating the treaty of Troyes.

The meeting of Henry with the French king, who in his unhappy state of mind was "governed and ordered" by his ambitious and crafty queen, is thus described by Holinshed:—"The Duke Burgoyne, accompanied with many noble men, received him two leagues without the town, and conveyed him to his lodging. All his army was lodged in small villages thereabout. And after that he had reposed himself a little, he went to visit the French king, the queen, and the Lady Katharine, whom he found in St. Peter's Church, where was a joyous meeting betwixt them. And this was on the xx. day of May, and there the King of England and the Lady Katharine were affianced."

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTICE.

"SHAKSPERE," says Frederick Schlegel, "regarded the drama as entirely a thing for the people: and, at first, treated it throughout as such. He took the popular comedy as he found it, and whatever enlargements and improvements he introduced into the stage, were all calculated and conceived according to the peculiar spirit of his predecessors, and of the audience in London."* This is especially true with regard to Shakspeare's Histories. In the case of Henry V. it appears to us that our great dramatic poet would never have touched the subject, had not the stage previously possessed it in the old play of "The Famous Victories." Henry IV. would have been perfect as a dramatic whole, without the addition of Henry V. The somewhat doubtful mode in which he speaks of continuing the story seems to us a pretty certain indication that he rather shrank from a subject which appeared to him essentially undramatic. It is, however, highly probable that having brought the history of Henry of Monmouth up to the period of his father's death, the demands of an audience who had been accustomed to hail "the madcap prince of Wales" as the conqueror of Agincourt compelled him "to continue the story." That he originally contemplated lending to it the interest of his creation of Falstaff is also sufficiently clear. It would be vain to speculate why he abandoned this intention; but it is evident that without the interest which Falstaff would have imparted to the story, the dramatic materials presented by the old play, or by the circumstances that the poet could discover in the real course of events, were extremely meagre and unsatisfying. It is our belief, therefore, that having hastily met the demands of his audience by the first sketch of Henry V., as it appears in the quarto editions, he subsequently saw the capacity which the subject presented for being treated in a grand lyrical spirit. Instead of interpolating an underplot of petty passions and intrigues,—such, for the most part, as we find in the dramatic treatment of an heroic subject by the French poets,—he preserved the great object of his drama entire by the intervention of the chorus. Skilfully as he has managed this, and magnificent as the whole drama is, as a great national song of triumph, there can be no doubt that Shakspeare felt that in this play he was dealing with a theme too narrow for his peculiar powers. His drama, generally, was cast in an entirely different mould from that of the Greek tragedy. The Greek stage was, in reality, more lyrical than dramatic:—

"Thence what the lofty grave tragedians taught
In Chorus or Iambic, teachers best
Of moral prudence, with delight receiv'd
In brief sententious precepts, while they treat
Of fate, and chance, and change in human life;
High actions, and high passions best describing."

The didactic lessons of moral prudence,—the brief sententious precepts,—the descriptions of high actions and high passions,—are alien from the whole spirit of Shakspeare's drama. The Henry V. constitutes an exception to the general rules upon which he worked. "High actions" are here described as well as exhibited; and high passions, in the Shaksperian sense of the term, scarcely make their appearance upon the scene. Here are no struggles between will and fate,—no frailties of humanity dragging down its virtues into an abyss of guilt and sorrow,—no crimes,—no obduracy,—no penitence. We have the lofty and unconquerable spirit of national and individual heroism riding triumphantly over every danger; but the spirit is so lofty that we feel no uncertainty for the issue. We should know, even if we had no foreknowledge of the event, that it must conquer. We can scarcely weep over those who fall in that "glorious and well-foughten field," for "they kept together in their chivalry," and their last words sound as a glorious hymn of exultation. The subject is altogether one of lyric grandeur; but it is not one, we think, which Shakspeare would have chosen for a drama.

And yet how exquisitely has Shakspeare thrown his dramatic power

* Lectures on the History of Literature, vol. ii.

into this undramatic subject! The character of the king is altogether one of the most finished portraits that has proceeded from this master hand. It could, perhaps, only have been thoroughly conceived by the poet who had delineated the Henry of the Boar's Head, and of the Field of Shrewsbury. The surpassing union in this character of spirit and calmness,—of dignity and playfulness,—of an ever-present energy and an almost melancholy abstraction,—the conventional authority of the king, and the deep sympathy with the meanest about him of the man,—was the result of the most philosophical and consistent appreciation by the poet of the moral and intellectual progress of his own Prince of Wales. And let it not be said that the picture which he has painted of his favourite hero is an exaggerated and flattering representation. The extraordinary merits of Henry V. were those of the individual; his demerits were those of his times. Standing now upon the vantage-ground of four centuries of experience, in which civilisation has marched onward at a pace which could only be the result of great intellectual impulses, we may, indeed, say that if Henry V. was justly fitted to be a leader of chivalry,—fearless, enterprising, persevering, generous, pious,—he was, at the same time, rash, obstinate, proud, superstitious, seeking after vain renown and empty conquests, instead of making his people happy by wise laws and the cultivation of sound knowledge. But Henry's character, like that of all other men, must be estimated by the circumstances amidst which he moved. After four centuries of illumination, if we find the world still suffering under the dominion of unjust governors and ambitious conquerors, we may pardon one who acted according to his lights, believing that his cause justified his attempt to seize upon another crown, instead of wearing his own wisely and peaceably. At any rate, it was not for the poet to regard the most popular king of the feudal times with the cold and severe scrutiny of the philosophical historian. It was for him to embody in the person of Henry V. the principle of national heroism; it was for him to call forth "the spirit of patriotic reminiscence." There are periods in the history of every people when their nationality, lifting them up almost to a frenzy of enthusiasm, is one of the sublimest exhibitions of the practical poetry of social life. In the times of Shakspeare such an aspect of the English mind was not unfrequently presented. Neither in our own times have such manifestations of the mighty heart been wanting. But there have been, and there may again be, periods of real danger when the national spirit shows itself drooping and languishing. It is under such circumstances that the heart-stirring power of such a play as Henry V. is to be tested. Frederick Schlegel says, "The feeling by which Shakspeare seems to have been most connected with ordinary men is that of nationality." But how different is his nationality from that of ordinary men! It is reflective, tolerant, generous. It lives not in an atmosphere of falsehood and prejudice. Its theatre is war and conquest; but it does not hold up war and conquest as fitting objects for nationality to dedicate itself to, except under the pressure of the most urgent necessity. Neither does it attempt to conceal the fearful responsibilities of those who carry the principle of nationality to the last arbitrament of arms, nor the enormous amount of evil which always attends the rupture of that peace in the cultivation of which nationality is best displayed. Shakspeare, indeed, speaks proudly as a member of that English family—

"Whose blood is fet from fathers of war-proof;"

but he never forgets that he belongs to the larger family of the human race. When Henry tells the people of Harfleur—

"The gates of mercy shall be all shut up," and draws that most fearful picture of the horrors of a sacked city, the poet tells us, though not in sententious precepts, that nationality, when it takes the road of violence, may be driven to put off all the gentle attributes of social life, and assuming the "action of the tiger," have the tiger's indiscriminating blood-thirstiness. When Henry, on the eve of the battle, walks secretly amidst his soldiers, the poet makes him hear truths which kings seldom hear; and which, however the hero, in this instance, may contend with them, cannot be disguised or controverted. Again, when Henry has won France, what a France does the poet present to the winner!

"All her husbandry doth lie on heaps,
Corrupting in its own fertility.
Her vine, the merry cheerer of the heart,
Unpruned dies: her hedges even-pleach'd,
Like prisoners wildly overgrown with hair,
Put forth disorder'd twigs; her fallow leas
The darnel, hemlock, and rank fumitory,
Doth root upon; while that the coulter rusts
That should deracinate such savagery:
The even mead, that erst brought sweetly forth
The freckled cowslip, burnet, and green clover,
Wanting the scythe, all uncorrected, rank,
Conceives by idleness; and nothing teems
But hateful docks, rough thistles, kecksies, burs,
Losing both beauty and utility:
And as our vineyards, fallows, meads, and hedges
Defective in their natures, grow to wildness;
Even so our houses, and ourselves, and children,
Have lost, or do not learn, for want of time,
The sciences that should become our country;
But grow, like savages,—as soldiers will,
That nothing do but meditate on blood,—
To swearing, and stern looks, diffus'd attire,
And everything that seems unnatural."

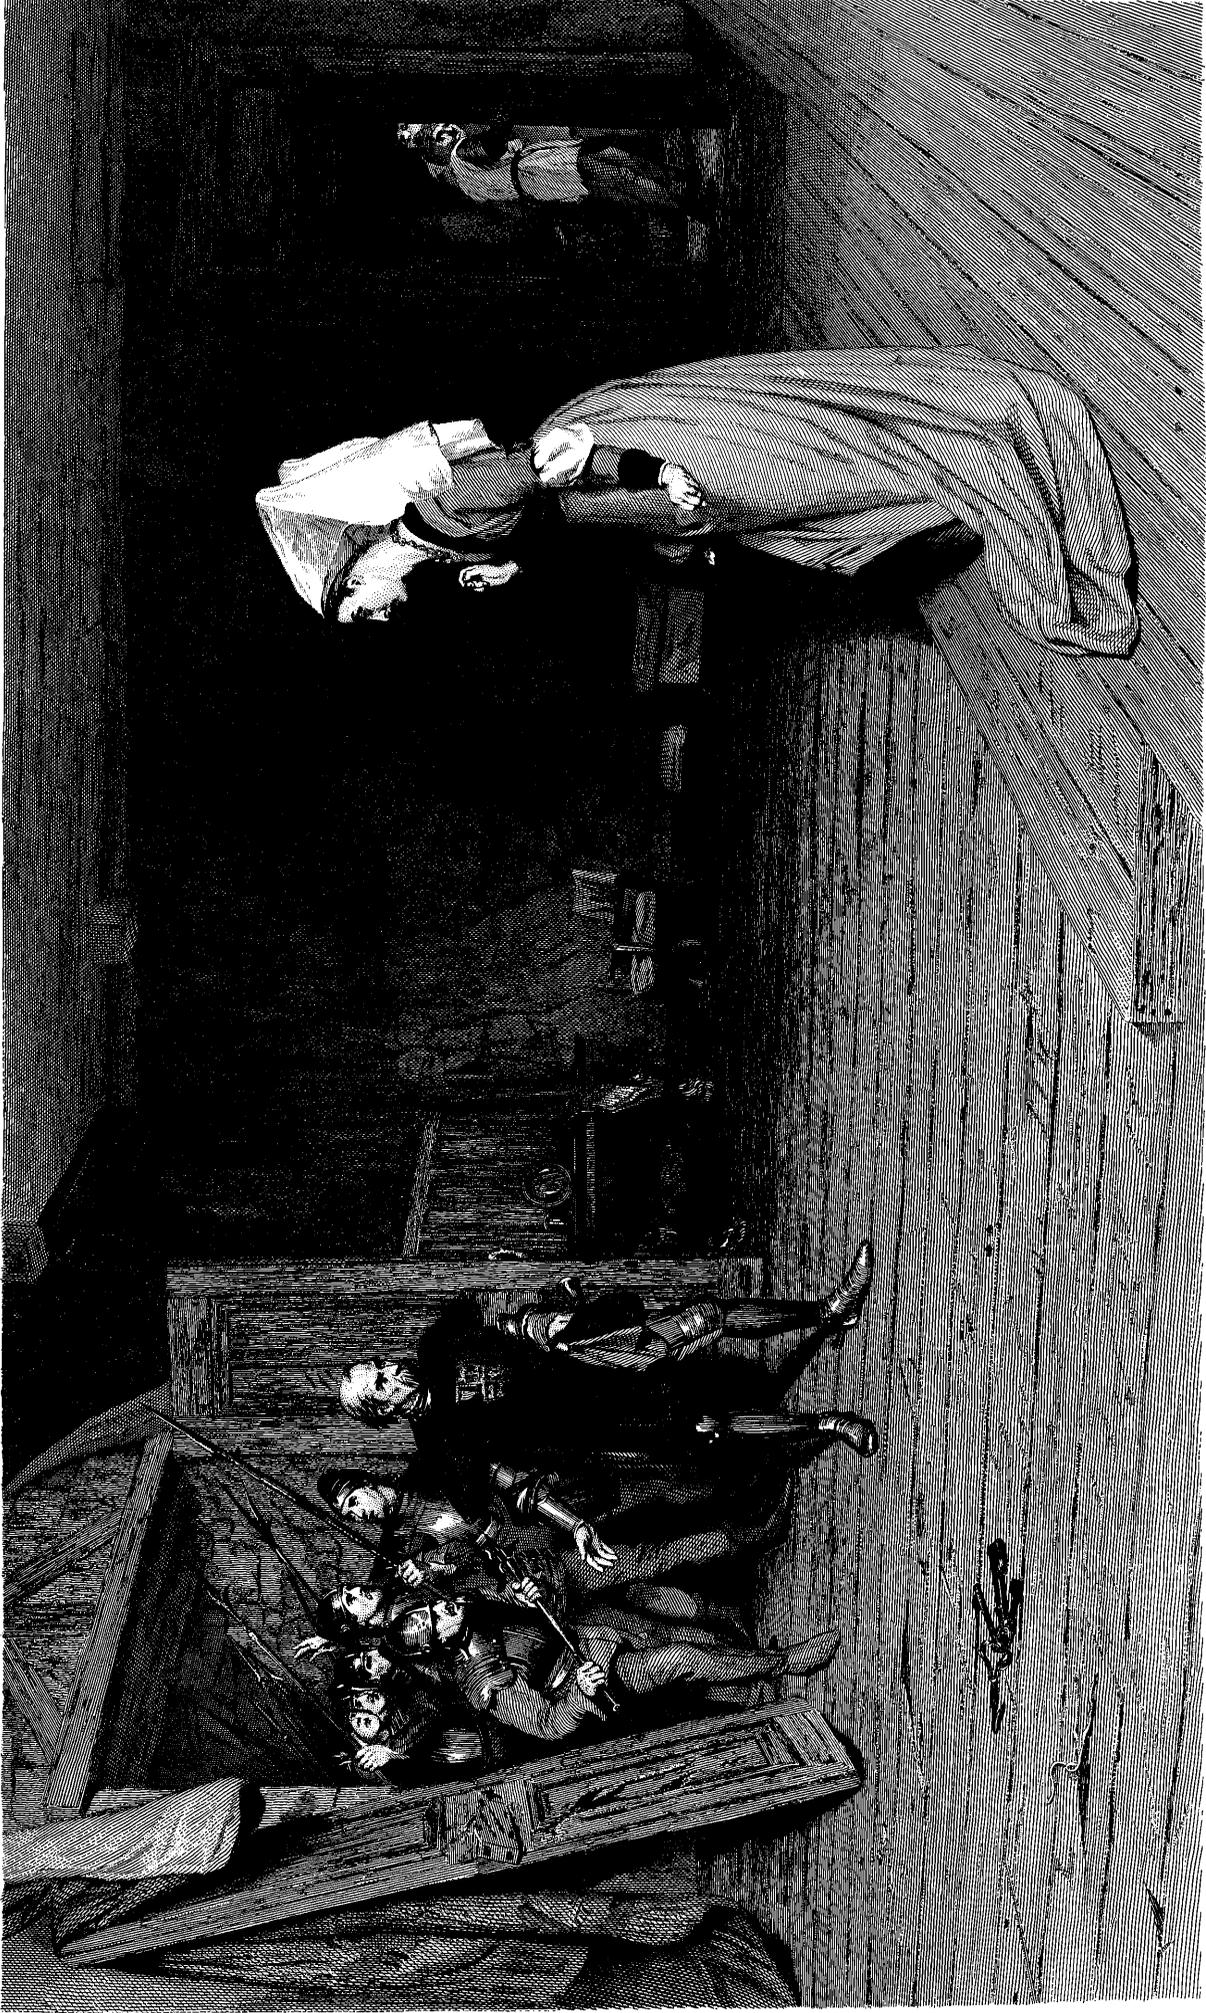

Thoughts such as these, coming from the great poet of humanity and wisdom, are the correctives of a false nationality.

It is scarcely necessary for us to trace, as we have done in other instances, the conduct of the dramatic action of Henry V. in connection with its characters. In the inferior persons of the play—the comic characters—the poet has displayed that power which he, above all men, possesses, of combining the highest poetical conceptions with the most truthful delineations of real life. In the amusing pedantry of Fluellen and the vapourings of Pistol there is nothing in the slightest degree incongruous with the main action of the scene. The homely bluntness of the common soldiers of the army brings us still closer to a knowledge of the great mass of which a camp is composed. Perhaps one of the most delicate but yet most appreciable instances of Shakspeare's nationality, in all its power and justice, is the mode in which he has exhibited the characters of these common soldiers. They are rough, somewhat quarrelsome, brave as lions, but without the slightest particle of anything low or grovelling in their composition. They are fit representatives of the "good yeomen, whose limbs were made in England." We almost as anxiously desire that these men should triumphantly show the "mettle of their pastures" as that the heroic Harry and his "band of brothers" should

"Be copy now to men of grosser blood,
And teach them how to war."

On the other hand, the discriminating truth of the poet is equally shown in exhibiting to us three arrant cowards in Pistol, Nym, and Bardolph. His impartiality could afford to paint the bullies and blackguards that even our nationality must be content to reckon as component parts of every army.

This drama is full of singularly beautiful detached passages: for example, the reflections of the king upon Ceremony,—the description of the deaths of York and Suffolk,—the glorious speech of the king before the battle,—the chorus of the fourth act,—are remarkable illustrations of Shakspeare's power as a descriptive poet. Nothing can be finer, also, than the commonwealth of bees in the first act. It is full of the most exquisite imagery and music. The art employed in transforming the whole scene of the hive into a resemblance of humanity is a perfect study—every successive object, as it is brought forward, being invested with its characteristic attribute.

KING HENRY VI.

PART I.

INTRODUCTORY NOTICE.

“THE First Part of Henry the Sixth” was originally printed, under that title, in the folio collection of 1623. Upon the authority, then, of the editors of that edition of “Mr. William Shakespeare’s Comedies, Histories, and Tragedies, published according to the true original Copies,” this drama properly finds a place in every modern edition of our poet’s works. After the time of Malone the English critics agreed that this play was spurious; and Drake, without hesitation, refers to what Shakspeare’s friends and editors denominated the Second and Third Parts of Henry VI. as the First and Second Parts, and recommends all future editors, if they print this first play at all, to give it only in an Appendix. “The spuriousness of this Part, indeed,” says Dr. Drake, “has been so satisfactorily proved by Mr. Malone, that no doubt can be supposed any longer to rest upon the subject.” If we were in the habit, then, of taking upon trust what the earlier editors of Shakspeare had authoritatively held, we should either reject this play altogether, or, if we printed it, we should inform our readers that “the hand of Shakspeare is nowhere visible throughout.” We cannot consent to follow either of these courses.

Malone’s “Dissertation on the Three Parts of King Henry VI., tending to show that those plays were not written originally by Shakspeare,” is the most careful and elaborate of his productions, and that upon which his reputation as a critic was mainly built. His theory is thus stated by himself:—

“Several passages in The Second and Third Parts of King Henry VI. appearing evidently to be of the hand of Shakspeare, I was long of opinion that the three historical dramas which are the subject of the present disquisition were properly ascribed to him; not then doubting that the whole of these plays was the production of the same person. But a more minute investigation of the subject, into which I have been led by the revision of all our author’s works, has convinced me that, though the premises were true, my conclusion was too hastily drawn; for, though the hand of Shakspeare is unquestionably found in the two latter of these plays, it does not therefore necessarily follow that they were originally and entirely composed by him. My hypothesis then is, that The First Part of King Henry VI., as it now appears (of which no quarto copy is extant), was the entire or nearly the entire production of some ancient dramatist; that ‘The Whole Contention of the two Houses of York and Lancaster,’ &c., written probably before the year 1590, and printed in quarto in 1600, was also the composition of some writer who preceded Shakspeare; and that from this piece, which is in two Parts, (the former of which is entitled ‘The First Part of the Contention of the two famous Houses of Yorke and Lancaster, with the Death of the good Duke Humphrey,’ &c., and the latter, ‘The true Tragedie of Richard Duke of Yorke, and the death of good King Henrie the Sixt,’) our poet formed the two plays entitled ‘The Second and Third Parts of King Henry VI.,’ as they appear in the first folio edition of his works.”

We propose to investigate this question, as a whole, upon broader grounds than Malone has taken. It appears to us that he has left many important points untouched, and has dwelt somewhat too much upon minute distinctions. The question is not one merely of verbal criticism. It is connected with some of the most interesting inquiries as to the history of the English drama and the early life of Shakspeare. It is a subject, therefore, that we cannot take up and dismiss in a hasty or fragmentary manner, or in a spirit of tame acquiescence in prevailing opinions on the one hand, or of inconsiderate controversy on the other. We purpose, then, to treat it as fully as may be necessary in the form of a Supplementary Essay. At present we need only observe that, as it involves an examination of the dramatic character of the three Parts of Henry VI. and of Richard III., it will render any separate Introductory or Supplementary Notices to these plays unnecessary.

COSTUME OF HENRY VI., PART I.

The number of historical personages introduced in the plays of Henry VI., Richard III., and Henry VIII., of whom the “lively effigies” handed down to us are familiar to every one, will render unnecessary a long verbal description of the costumes of their respective periods. Henry VI. himself, in this play, is almost the only personage for whose dress we have no contemporary authority. He appears for the first time in the third act of this Part as a young man, in his Parliament robes, and in the full exercise of his kingly office, in Westminster Hall; but, in point of fact, he was at that time a child of eight years of age at the utmost. In the fourth act he is crowned at Paris (he was then only in his tenth year), and in the fifth act he is in his ordinary apparel in his palace in London. The only representations we remember of Henry in his childhood are those drawn by John Rouse, the Warwickshire antiquary, in the reign of Richard III., and which are consequently no authorities for this period. In a MS. life of St. Edmund, by Lydgate (Harleian Col., No. 2278), there is a representation of the king presiding in Parliament, which is very nearly of this period; and another MS. in the same collection (No. 1766), also a work of Lydgate’s, was written and illuminated, by command of Humphrey Duke of Gloster, about the beginning of the reign of Henry VI., and will furnish the general costume of the people.

Of Duke Humphrey we know no contemporary portrait or effigy; but of his brother, the Duke of Bedford, there is a most authentic representation in the well-known and splendid MS. called the Bedford Missal. He is attired in a richly embroidered robe, with the extravagantly long sleeves of the period; his hair is cut short all round his head, in accordance with the fashion of the preceding reign. The tapestry behind him is covered with his badge, the root of a tree, and his “word,” or motto, “À vous entier.” Of Henry Beaufort, Cardinal-Bishop of Winchester, there remains a fine effigy on his tomb in Winchester Cathedral. He is in his cardinal’s robes. The sleeves of the under tunic are black, edged with white; at each side of his face, which is placid and beardless, appears a little lock of black hair. On his hands are gloves fringed with gold, and having an oval-shaped jewel (an ancient mark of dignity) on the back. On the middle and third fingers of each hand are rings, worn over the gloves. Of John Beaufort, Duke and Earl of Somerset, there is a splendid effigy in Wimborne Minster, Dorsetshire, representing him in a richly ornamented suit of armour of this period. He is without a jupon or surcoat, in complete plate, the borders elaborately engraved and gilt. The bascinet is surrounded by a coronet. To the tassets, or plates below the cuirass, are appended by straps and buckles those additional defences for the thighs called tuilles, which first appear in this reign; and just above them, over the hips, he wears the military belt, or girdle, to which are affixed on one side his sword, and on the other his dagger.

Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, is represented in his civil attire in a window of St. Mary's Hall, at Coventry, engraved in Dugdale's "Warwickshire." He wears a richly ornamented hood; a loose robe of some figured stuff, with large sleeves, lined with ermine, over a tight under-dress of cloth or velvet. His effigy in the Warwick Chapel exhibits another fine specimen of the armour of this reign.

Of John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, there is also a fine effigy in armour, and wearing the mantle of the Garter, beautifully engraved in Mr. Stothard's valuable work of "Sepulchral Monuments." Thomas Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, is depicted in armour in a MS. copy of Lydgate's poem, "The Pilgrim" (Harleian Col., No. 4826). The tassets have no tuilles attached to them, and the cloak with scalloped edges, worn with the armour, is a fashion of the time of Henry V. Of William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, there is an effigy in the north wall of the chancel at Wingfield Church, Suffolk. He is in armour, with a conical bascinet and gorget of mail. Sir John Fastolfe is depicted in armour, and wearing the mantle and ensigns of the order of the Garter, in the south window of the church at Pulham, Norfolk. (Vide Gough and Blomefield.)

There are numerous portraits of Charles VII. of France, engraved from various sources, in Montfaucon's "Monarchie Française." We have only to premise that the illumination wherein Charles is represented receiving a book from a monk is of a later date than this play, and exhibits the costume of the reign of Edward IV.

Of the celebrated Joan of Arc the only authentic because the only contemporary representation known to us is that engraved in Millin's work, from the monument erected to her memory at Orleans by Charles VII. Charles and Joan are thereon sculptured kneeling in complete armour. The painting in the Town Hall of Orleans is, as the costume proves, of the time of our Henry VII., and is believed by some not to have been originally intended to represent La Pucelle at all. It is no authority either for dress or features. Of Margaret of Anjou there are several portraits as queen, but we know of none painted previous to her marriage.

From the authorities here given, our readers will be able, as we have before observed, to perceive at once the particular alterations in costume which characterize the unquiet reign of Henry VI. A great variety of caps, hats, and hoods were now introduced; feathers were rarely used, and seem to have gone out of fashion again with the reign of Henry V. In armour we find the salet or salade, a steel cap something resembling the bascinet, but taking more the form of the head, and descending lower in the neck, where it was sometimes furnished with jointed plates. The spurs at this time were very long-necked, had exceedingly large rowels, and were screwed into the heels of the steel sollerets, instead of being fastened by straps and buckles. The hair was still worn very short; and beards and moustaches appear but rarely.

In the female attire the principal change is observable in the head-dress—that which is generally called the heart-shaped or reticulated form prevailing. Turbans of a very Oriental character are also seen occasionally in the illuminated MSS. of this period.

As the Mayor of London appears in this play, we may as well remark that Stow relates that when Henry VI. returned from France, in 1432, the Lord Mayor of London rode to meet him at Eltham, being arrayed in crimson velvet, a great velvet hat, furred, a girdle of gold about his middle, and a baldric of gold about his neck, trailing down behind him; his three henchmen in a uniform of red, spangled with silver; the aldermen in gowns of scarlet with purple hoods; and all the commonalty of the city in white gowns and scarlet hoods, with divers cognisances embroidered on their sleeves.

The livery colours of the house of Lancaster were white and blue; those of the house of York, murrey and blue.

SCENE,—partly in ENGLAND, and partly in FRANCE.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Westminster Abbey.

Dead march. Corpse of KING HENRY V. discovered, lying in state; attended on by the DUKES OF BEDFORD, GLOSTER, and EXETER; the EARL OF WARWICK, the BISHOP OF WINCHESTER, Heralds, &c.

Bed. Hung be the heavens with black,<sup>a</sup> yield day to night!

Comets, importing change of times and states,
Brandish your crystal<sup>1</sup> tresses in the sky;
And with them scourge the bad revolting stars,
That have consented<sup>2</sup> unto Henry's death!
King Henry the Fifth, too famous to live long!
England ne'er lost a king of so much worth.

Glo. England ne'er had a king until his time.
Virtue he had, deserving to command:
His brandish'd sword did blind men with his beams;
His arms spread wider than a dragon's wings:
His sparkling eyes, replete with wrathful fire,
More dazzled and drove back his enemies,
Than mid-day sun, fierce bent against their faces.
What should I say? his deeds exceed all speech:
He ne'er lift up his hand but conquered.

Exe. We mourn in black: Why mourn we not in blood?
Henry is dead, and never shall revive:
Upon a wooden coffin we attend;
And death's dishonourable victory
We with our stately presence glorify,

<sup>1</sup> Crystal. This epithet is applied to comets in a sonnet by Lord Sterline (1604):—

“When as those crystal comets whiles appear.”

<sup>2</sup> Consented. Malone is of opinion that consented is here used only in the ordinary sense of that word, and that it is used also in the ordinary sense in the fifth scene of this act:—

“You all consented unto Salisbury's death.”

Steevens, on the other hand, believes that the word should be spelt concented.—Steevens appears to us to be right. To concent is to be in harmony—to act together. See the passage in Henry V., Act I. Sc. II., and the notes on that passage:—

“For government, though high, and low, and lower,
Put into parts, doth keep in one concent,”

Like captives bound to a triumphant car.
What! shall we curse the planets of mishap,
That plotted thus our glory's overthrow?
Or shall we think the subtle-witted French
Conjurers and sorcerers, that, afraid of him,
By magic verses have contriv'd his end?<sup>3</sup>

Win. He was a king bless'd of the King of kings.
Unto the French the dreadful judgment day
So dreadful will not be, as was his sight.
The battles of the Lord of hosts he fought:
The church's prayers made him so prosperous.

Glo. The church! where is it? Had not churchmen pray'd,

His thread of life had not so soon decay'd;
None do you like but an effeminate prince,
Whom, like a school-boy, you may overawe.

Win. Gloster, whate'er we like, thou art protector:
And lookest to command the prince and realm.
Thy wife is proud; she holdeth thee in awe,
More than God or religious churchmen may.

Glo. Name not religion, for thou lov'st the flesh;
And ne'er throughout the year to church thou go'st,
Except it be to pray against thy foes.

Bed. Cease, cease these jars, and rest your minds in peace!

Let's to the altar:—Heralds, wait on us:—
Instead of gold, we'll offer up our arms;
Since arms avail not, now that Henry's dead.
Posterity, await for wretched years,
When at their mothers' moisten'd<sup>4</sup> eyes babes shall suck;

Congreering in a full and natural close,
Like music.”

<sup>3</sup> A passage in Scot's “Discoverie of Witchcraft” (1584) explains this:—“The Irishmen . . . will not stick to affirm that they can rime either man or beast to death.” This is an old northern superstition. In Gray's spirited “Descent of Odin” we find—

“Thrice he trac'd the Runic rhyme;
Thrice pronounc'd, in accents dread,
The thrilling verse that wakes the dead.”

<sup>4</sup> Moisten'd. So the folio of 1623. The second folio, in which some verbal alterations of the original text are found, and which, for the most part, are made with judgment, reads moist. We adhere to the original in all those cases where the alterations of the second folio are somewhat doubtful.

Our isle be made a nourish<sup>1</sup> of salt tears,
And none but women left to wail the dead.
Henry the Fifth! thy ghost I invoke;
Prosper this realm, keep it from civil broils!
Combat with adverse planets in the heavens!
A far more glorious star thy soul will make,
Than Julius Cæsar, or bright——<sup>2</sup>

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My honourable lords, health to you all!
Sad tidings bring I to you out of France,
Of loss, of slaughter, and discomfiture:
Guienne, Champagne, Rheims, Orleans,
Paris, Guysors, Poitiers, are all quite lost.

Bed. What say'st thou, man, before dead Henry's corse?
Speak softly; or the loss of those great towns
Will make him burst his lead, and rise from death.

Glo. Is Paris lost? is Rouen yielded up?
If Henry were recall'd to life again,
These news would cause him once more yield the ghost.

Exe. How were they lost? what treachery was us'd?

Mess. No treachery; but want of men and money.
Amongst the soldiers this is muttered,—
That here you maintain several factions;
And, whilst a field should be despatch'd and fought,
You are disputing of your generals.
One would have ling'ring wars, with little cost;
Another would fly swift, but wanteth wings;
A third man thinks, without expense at all,
By guileful fair words peace may be obtain'd.
Awake, awake, English nobility!
Let not sloth dim your honours, new-begot;
Cropp'd are the flower-de-luces in your arms;
Of England's coat one half is cut away.

Exe. Were our tears wanting to this funeral,
These tidings would call forth her flowing tides.

Bed. Me they concern; regent I am of France:
Give me my steeled coat, I'll fight for France.
Away with these disgraceful wailing robes!
Wounds will I lend the French, instead of eyes,
To weep their intermissive miseries.

Enter another Messenger.

2 Mess. Lords, view these letters, full of bad mischance
France is revolted from the English quite;
Except some petty towns of no import:
The Dauphin Charles is crowned king in Rheims;
The bastard of Orleans with him is join'd;
Reignier, duke of Anjou, doth take his part;
The duke of Alençon flieth to his side.

Exe. The Dauphin crowned king! all fly to him!
O, whither shall we fly from this reproach?

Glo. We will not fly, but to our enemies' throats:—
Bedford, if thou be slack, I'll fight it out.

Bed. Gloster, why doubt'st thou of my forwardness?
An army have I muster'd in my thoughts,
Wherewith already France is overrun.

Enter a third Messenger.

3 Mess. My gracious lords,—to add to your laments,

<sup>1</sup> Nourish. Nourice, nourish, nursh, are the same words. We have an example in Lydgate:—

“Athenes when it was in his floures
Was called nourish of philosophers wise.”

Pope substituted marish.

<sup>2</sup> Malone says, “This blank undoubtedly arose from the transcriber's or compositor's not being able to make out the name.” We greatly doubt this. In the original the line is terminated with four hyphens, thus (- - - -), a point which is several times used in the same play to mark an interruption. For example, in the fourth scene of this act—

Wherewith you now bedew king Henry's hearse,—
I must inform you of a dismal fight,
Betwixt the stout lord Talbot and the French.

Win. What? wherein Talbot overcame? is't so?

3 Mess. O, no; wherein lord Talbot was o'erthrown:
The circumstance I'll tell you more at large.
The tenth of August last, this dreadful lord,
Retiring from the siege of Orleans,
Having full scarce six thousand in his troop,
By three and twenty thousand of the French
Was round encompassed and set upon:
No leisure had he to enrank his men;
He wanted pikes to set before his archers,
Instead whereof, sharp stakes, pluck'd out of hedges,
They pitched in the ground confusedly,
To keep the horsemen off from breaking in.
More than three hours the fight continued;
Where valiant Talbot, above human thought,
Enacted wonders with his sword and lance.
Hundreds he sent to hell, and none durst stand him;
Here, there, and everywhere, enrag'd he flew:
The French exclaim'd, The devil was in arms;
All the whole army stood agaz'd on him:
His soldiers, spying his undaunted spirit,
A Talbot! a Talbot! cried out amain,
And rush'd into the bowels of the battle.
Here had the conquest fully been seal'd up,
If sir John Fastolfe had not play'd the coward;
He being in the vaward,<sup>3</sup> (plac'd behind,
With purpose to relieve and follow them,)
Cowardly fled, not having struck one stroke.
Hence grew the general wrack and massacre;
Enclosed were they with their enemies:
A base Walloon, to win the Dauphin's grace,
Thrust Talbot with a spear into the back;
Whom all France, with their chief assembled strength,
Durst not presume to look once in the face.

Bed. Is Talbot slain? then I will slay myself,
For living idly here, in pomp and ease,
Whilst such a worthy leader, wanting aid,
Unto his dastard foemen is betray'd.

3 Mess. O no, he lives; but is took prisoner,
And lord Scales with him, and lord Hungerford:
Most of the rest slaughter'd, or took, likewise.

Bed. His ransom there is none but I shall pay:
I'll hale the Dauphin headlong from his throne,—
His crown shall be the ransom of my friend;
Four of their lords I'll change for one of ours.
Farewell, my masters; to my task will I;
Bonfires in France forthwith I am to make,
To keep our great Saint George's feast withal:
Ten thousand soldiers with me I will take,
Whose bloody deeds shall make all Europe quake.

3 Mess. So you had need; for Orleans is besieg'd;
The English army is grown weak and faint:
The earl of Salisbury craveth supply,
And hardly keeps his men from mutiny,
Since they, so few, watch such a multitude.

Exe. Remember, lords, your oaths to Henry sworn,
Either to quell the Dauphin utterly,
Or bring him in obedience to your yoke.

Bed. I do remember it; and here take my leave,
To go about my preparation. [Exit.]

Glo. I'll to the Tower, with all the haste I can,

“Thou shalt not die whiles - - -”

Pope suggested (the notion looks like a joke) to fill up the line thus:—

“Than Julius Cæsar, or bright Francis Drake,” and Monck Mason gravely upholds the reading. Johnson would read—

“Than Julius Cæsar, or bright Berenice.”

<sup>3</sup> Vaward—the van. This is considered by some editors as a misprint for rearward. Steevens and M. Mason explain the passage to be correct, and the explanation, such as it is, we give:—“When an army is attacked in the rear the van becomes the rear in its turn, and of course the reserve.”

To view the artillery and munition ;
And then I will proclaim young Henry king. [Exit.]

Exe. To Eltham will I, where the young king is,
Being ordain'd his special governor ;
And for his safety there I'll best devise. [Exit.]

Win. Each hath his place and function to attend :
I am left out ; for me nothing remains.
But long I will not be Jack-out-of-office ;
The king from Eltham I intend to steal,<sup>1</sup>
And sit at chiefest stern of public weal. [Exit. Scene closes.]

SCENE II.—France. Before Orleans.

Enter CHARLES, with his Forces ; ALENÇON, REIGNIER, and others.

Char. Mars his true moving, even as in the heavens,
So in the earth, to this day is not known :
Late did he shine upon the English side ;
Now we are victors, upon us he smiles.
What towns of any moment but we have ?
At pleasure here we lie near Orleans ;
Otherwhiles, the famish'd English, like pale ghosts,
Faintly besiege us one hour in a month.

Alen. They want their porridge and their fat bull-
beeves :

Either they must be dieted like mules,
And have their provender tied to their mouths,
Or piteous they will look, like drowned mice.

Reig. Let's raise the siege : Why live we idly here ?
Talbot is taken, whom we wont to fear :
Remaineth none but mad-brain'd Salisbury ;
And he may well in fretting spend his gall,
Nor men nor money hath he to make war.

Char. Sound, sound alarum ; we will rush on them.
Now for the honour of the forlorn French :—
Him I forgive my death that killeth me,
When he sees me go back one foot, or fly. [Exeunt.]

Alarums. They are beaten back by the English, with great loss. Re-enter CHARLES, ALENÇON, REIGNIER, and others.

Char. Who ever saw the like ? what men have I ?—
Dogs ! cowards ! dastards !—I would ne'er have fled,
But that they left me 'midst my enemies.

Reig. Salisbury is a desperate homicide ;
He fighteth as one weary of his life.
The other lords, like lions wanting food,
Do rush upon us as their hungry prey.

Alen. Froissart, a countryman of ours, records,
England all Olivers and Rowlands bred
During the time Edward the Third did reign.
More truly now may this be verified ;
For none but Samsons, and Goliasses,
It sendeth forth to skirmish. One to ten !
Lean raw-bon'd rascals ! who would e'er suppose
They had such courage and audacity ?

Char. Let's leave this town ; for they are hare-brain'd slaves,

And hunger will enforce them to be more eager :
Of old I know them ; rather with their teeth
The walls they'll tear down than forsake the siege.

Reig. I think, by some odd gimmers<sup>2</sup> or device,
Their arms are set like clocks, still to strike on ;

Else ne'er could they hold out so as they do.
By my consent, we'll even let them alone.
Alen. Be it so.

Enter the Bastard of Orleans.

Bast. Where's the prince Dauphin ? I have news for him.

Char. Bastard of Orleans, thrice welcome to us.

Bast. Methinks your looks are sad, your cheer<sup>3</sup>
appall'd ;

Hath the late overthrow wrought this offence ?

Be not dismay'd, for succour is at hand :

A holy maid hither with me I bring,
Which, by a vision sent to her from heaven,
Ordained is to raise this tedious siege,
And drive the English forth the bounds of France.

The spirit of deep prophecy she hath,
Exceeding the nine sibyls of old Rome ;
What's past, and what's to come, she can descry.
Speak, shall I call her in ? Believe my words,
For they are certain and unfaillible.

Char. Go, call her in : [Exit Bastard.] But, first, to try her skill,

Reignier, stand thou as Dauphin in my place :
Question her proudly, let thy looks be stern :—
By this means shall we sound what skill she hath. [Retires.]

Enter LA PUCELLE, Bastard of Orleans, and others.

Reig. Fair maid, is't thou wilt do these wondrous feats ?

Puc. Reignier, is't thou that thinkest to beguile me ?
Where is the Dauphin ?—come, come from behind ;
I know thee well, though never seen before.
Be not amaz'd, there's nothing hid from me :
In private will I talk with thee apart ;—
Stand back, you lords, and give us leave awhile.

Reig. She takes upon her bravely at first dash.

Puc. Dauphin, I am by birth a shepherd's daughter,
My wit untrain'd in any kind of art.
Heaven, and our Lady gracious, hath it pleas'd
To shine on my contemptible estate :

Lo, whilst I waited on my tender lambs,
And to sun's parching heat display'd my cheeks,
God's mother deigned to appear to me ;
And, in a vision full of majesty,

Will'd me to leave my base vocation,
And free my country from calamity ;
Her aid she promis'd and assur'd success :
In complete glory she reveal'd herself ;

And, whereas I was black and swart before,
With those clear rays which she infused on me,
That beauty am I bless'd with which you may see.
Ask me what question thou canst possible,
And I will answer unpremeditated :

My courage try by combat, if thou dar'st,
And thou shalt find that I exceed my sex.
Resolve<sup>4</sup> on this : Thou shalt be fortunate
If thou receive me for thy warlike mate.

Char. Thou hast astonish'd me with thy high terms :
Only this proof I'll of thy valour make,—
In single combat thou shalt buckle with me :
And if thou vanquishest thy words are true ;
Otherwise I renounce all confidence.

Puc. I am prepar'd : here is my keen-edg'd sword,

as here lay a wheel, there the balance, here one gimmer, there another ; straight my ignorance was ready to think, when and how will all these ever piece together again in their former order ?"

Deck'd with five flower-de-luces on each side ;
The which, at Touraine, in Saint Katharine's churchyard,
Out of a great deal of old iron I chose forth.

Char. Then come o' God's name, I fear no woman.

Puc. And, while I live, I'll ne'er fly from a man.

[They fight, and LA PUCELLE overcomes.]

Char. Stay, stay thy hands ; thou art an Amazon,
And fightest with the sword of Deborah.

Puc. Christ's mother helps me, else I were too weak.

Char. Whoe'er helps thee, 'tis thou that must help me :
Impatiently I burn with thy desire :

My heart and hands thou hast at once subdued.

Excellent Pucelle, if thy name be so,
Let me thy servant, and not sovereign, be ;
'Tis the French Dauphin sueth to thee thus.

Puc. I must not yield to any rites of love,
For my profession's sacred from above :
When I have chased all thy foes from hence,
Then will I think upon a recompense.

Char. Meantime, look gracious on thy prostrate thrall.

Reig. My lord, methinks, is very long in talk.

Alen. Doubtless, he shrives this woman to her smock ;
Else ne'er could he so long protract his speech.

Reig. Shall we disturb him, since he keeps no mean ?

Alen. He may mean more than we poor men do know :
These women are shrewd tempters with their tongues.

Reig. My lord, where are you ? what devise you on Shall we give over Orleans, or no ?

Puc. Why, no, I say, distrustful recreants !
Fight to the last gasp ; I will be your guard.

Char. What she says I'll confirm ; we'll fight it out.

Puc. Assign'd am I to be the English scourge.
This night the siege assuredly I'll raise :
Expect Saint Martin's summer,<sup>1</sup> halcyon days,
Since I have entered into these wars.
Glory is like a circle in the water,
Which never ceaseth to enlarge itself,
Till, by broad spreading, it disperse to naught.
With Henry's death the English circle ends ;
Dispersed are the glories it included.
Now am I like that proud insulting ship,
Which Cæsar and his fortune bare at once.<sup>b</sup>

Char. Was Mahomet inspired with a dove ?<sup>c</sup>
Thou with an eagle art inspired then.

Helen, the mother of great Constantine,
Nor yet Saint Philip's daughters, were like thee.
Bright star of Venus, fall'n down on the earth,
How may I reverently worship thee enough ?

Alen. Leave off delays, and let us raise the siege.

Reig. Woman, do what thou canst to save our honours ;
Drive them from Orleans, and be immortaliz'd.

Char. Presently we'll try :—Come, let's away about it :
No prophet will I trust, if she prove false. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—London. Hill before the Tower.

Enter, at the gates, the DUKE OF GLOSTER, with his Serving-men, in blue coats.

Glo. I am come to survey the Tower this day :
Since Henry's death, I fear there is conveyance.<sup>2</sup>
Where be these warders, that they wait not here ?

Open the gates ; 'tis Gloster that calls. [Servants knock.]

1 Ward. [Within.] Who's there that knocks so imperiously ?

1 Serv. It is the noble duke of Gloster.

Ward. [Within.] Whoe'er he be, you may not be let in.

1 Serv. Villains, answer you so the lord protector ?

1 Ward. [Within.] The Lord protect him ! so we answer him :

We do no otherwise than we are will'd.

Glo. Who willed you ? or whose will stands but mine ?

There's none protector of the realm but I.

Break up<sup>3</sup> the gates, I'll be your warrantize :

Shall I be flouted thus by dunghill grooms ?

Servants rush at the Tower gates. Enter to the gates, WOODVILLE, the Lieutenant.

Wood. [Within.] What noise is this ? what traitors have we here ?

Glo. Lieutenant, is it you whose voice I hear ?

Open the gates ; here's Gloster that would enter.

Wood. [Within.] Have patience, noble duke ; I may not open ;

The cardinal of Winchester forbids :

From him I have express commandment,
That thou, nor none of thine, shall be let in.

Glo. Faint-hearted Woodville, prizest him 'fore me ?

Arrogant Winchester, that haughty prelate,

Whom Henry, our late sovereign, ne'er could brook ?

Thou art no friend to God, or to the king :

Open the gates, or I'll shut thee out shortly.

1 Serv. Open the gates unto the lord protector ;

Or we'll burst them open, if that you come not quickly.

Enter WINCHESTER, attended by a train of Servants in tawny coats.

Win. How now, ambitious Humphrey ? what means this ?

Glo. Peel'd<sup>4</sup> priest, dost thou command me to be shut out ?

Win. I do, thou most usurping proditor,
And not protector of the king or realm.

Glo. Stand back, thou manifest conspirator ;
Thou that contriv'dst to murder our dead lord ;
Thou that giv'st whores indulgences to sin
I'll canvass thee in thy broad cardinal's hat,
If thou proceed in this thy insolence.

Win. Nay, stand thou back, I will not budge a foot ;
This be Damascus, be thou cursed Cain,
To slay thy brother Abel, if thou wilt.<sup>5</sup>

Glo. I will not slay thee, but I'll drive thee back :
Thy scarlet robes, as a child's bearing cloth
I'll use, to carry thee out of this place.

Win. Do what thou dar'st ; I beard thee to thy face.

Glo. What ! am I dar'd, and bearded to my face ?—
Draw, men, for all this privileged place ;
Blue-coats to tawny-coats.<sup>d</sup> Priest, beware your beard ;
[GLOSTER and his men attack the Bishop.]

I mean to tug it, and to cuff you soundly ;
Under my feet I stamp thy cardinal's hat ;
In spite of pope, or dignities of church,
Here by the cheeks I'll drag thee up and down.

Win. Gloster, thou'lt answer this before the pope.

Glo. Winchester goose ! I cry—a rope ! a rope !
Now beat them hence : Why do you let them stay ?—
Thee I'll chase hence, thou wolf in sheep's array.—
Out, tawny-coats !—out, scarlet hypocrite !

<sup>5</sup> The old travellers believed that Damascus was the scene of the first murder. Maundeve says, "And in that place where Damascus was founded Kaym slew Abel his brother."

Here a great tumult. In the midst of it, enter the Mayor of London, and Officers.

May. Fie, lords! that you, being supreme magistrates, Thus contumeliously should break the peace!

Glo. Peace, mayor; thou know'st little of my wrongs. Here's Beaufort, that regards nor God nor king, Hath here distrain'd the Tower to his use.

Win. Here's Gloster, too,<sup>1</sup> a foe to citizens; One that still motions war, and never peace, O'ercharging your free purses with large fines; That seeks to overthrow religion, Because he is protector of the realm; And would have armour here out of the Tower, To crown himself king, and suppress the prince.

Glo. I will not answer thee with words, but blows.

[Here they skirmish again.]

May. Naught rests for me, in this tumultuous strife, But to make open proclamation:— Come, officer, as loud as e'er thou canst, cry.

Off. All manner of men, assembled here in arms this day, against God's peace and the king's, we charge and command you, in his highness' name, to repair to your several dwelling-places; and not to wear, handle, or use, any sword, weapon, or dagger, henceforward, upon pain of death.

Glo. Cardinal, I'll be no breaker of the law: But we shall meet, and break our minds at large.

Win. Gloster, we'll meet; to thy dear cost,<sup>2</sup> be sure: Thy heart-blood I will have for this day's work.

May. I'll call for clubs, if you will not away;— This cardinal is more haughty than the devil.

Glo. Mayor, farewell: thou dost but what thou may'st.

Win. Abominable Gloster! guard thy head; For I intend to have it, ere long. [Exeunt.]

May. See the coast clear'd, and then we will depart.—

Good God! that nobles should such stomachs bear! I myself fight not once in forty year. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—France. Before Orleans.

Enter, on the walls, the Master-Gunner and his Son.

M. Gun. Sirrah, thou know'st how Orleans is besieg'd, And how the English have the suburbs won.

Son. Father, I know; and oft have shot at them, Howe'er, unfortunate, I miss'd my aim.

M. Gun. But now thou shalt not. Be thou rul'd by me:

Chief master-gunner am I of this town; Something I must do to procure me grace. The prince's espials<sup>3</sup> have informed me, How the English, in the suburbs close intrench'd, Wont,<sup>4</sup> through a secret grate of iron bars In yonder tower, to overpeer the city; And thence discover, how, with most advantage, They may vex us, with shot, or with assault. To intercept this inconvenience, A piece of ordnance 'gainst it I have plac'd; And fully even these three days have I watch'd If I could see them. Now, boy, do thou watch,<sup>5</sup> For I can stay no longer.

If thou spy'st any, run and bring me word; And thou shalt find me at the governor's. [Exit.]

Son. Father, I warrant you; take you no care; I'll never trouble you if I may spy them.

Enter, in an upper chamber of a tower, the LORDS SALISBURY and TALBOT, SIR WILLIAM GLANSDALE, SIR THOMAS GARGRAVE, and others.

Sal. Talbot, my life, my joy, again return'd! How wert thou handled, being prisoner? Or by what means gott'st thou to be releas'd? Discourse, I prithee, on this turret's top.

Tal. The duke of Bedford had a prisoner, Called the brave lord Ponton de Santrailles; For him was I exchange'd and ransomed. But with a baser man of arms by far, Once, in contempt, they would have barter'd me; Which I, disdainingly, scorn'd; and craved death, Rather than I would be so vile-esteem'd.<sup>6</sup> In fine, redeem'd I was as I desir'd.

But, O! the treacherous Fastolfe wounds my heart! Whom with my bare fists I would execute, If I now had him brought into my power.

Sal. Yet tell'st thou not how thou wert entertain'd.

Tal. With scoffs, and scorns, and contumelious taunts.

In open market-place produc'd they me, To be a public spectacle to all: Here, said they, is the terror of the French, The scarecrow that affrights our children so. Then broke I from the officers that led me; And with my nails digg'd stones out of the ground, To hurl at the beholders of my shame. My grisly countenance made others fly; None durst come near, for fear of sudden death.

In iron walls they deem'd me not secure; So great fear of my name 'mongst them was spread, That they suppos'd I could rend bars of steel, And spurn in pieces posts of adamant: Wherefore a guard of chosen shot I had, That walk'd about me every minute-while; And if I did but stir out of my bed, Ready they were to shoot me to the heart.

Sal. I grieve to hear what torments you endure'd; But we will be reveng'd sufficiently.

Now it is supper-time in Orleans: Here, through this grate, I count each one,<sup>7</sup> And view the Frenchmen how they fortify; Let us look in, the sight will much delight thee. Sir Thomas Gargrave, and sir William Glansdale, Let me have your express opinions, Where is best place to make our battery next.

Gar. I think, at the north gate; for there stand lords.

Glan. And I, here, at the bulwark of the bridge.

Tal. For aught I see, this city must be famish'd, Or with light skirmishes enfeebled.

[Shot from the town, SALISBURY and SIR THOMAS GARGRAVE fall.]

Sal. O Lord, have mercy on us, wretched sinners!

Gar. O Lord, have mercy on me, woeful man!

Tal. What chance is this that suddenly hath cross'd us? Speak, Salisbury; at least, if thou canst speak; How far'st thou, mirror of all martial men? One of thy eyes, and thy cheek's side struck off!— Accursed tower! accursed fatal hand, That hath contriv'd this woeful tragedy! In thirteen battles Salisbury o'ercame; Henry the Fifth he first train'd to the wars; Whilst any trump did sound, or drum struck up, His sword did ne'er leave striking in the field.

<sup>4</sup> Wont. The old copies read went. The correction, which is a very judicious one, was made by Tyrwhitt. Wont—are accustomed—accords with the construction of the remainder of the sentence.

<sup>5</sup> We follow the reading of the second folio. In the first the passage stands thus:—

“ And even these three days have I watch'd
If I could see them. Now do thou watch.”

“ Here, through this grate, I can count every one.”

Yet liv'st thou, Salisbury? though thy speech doth fail,
 One eye thou hast, to look to heaven for grace:
 The sun with one eye vieweth all the world.
 Heaven, be thou gracious to none alive,
 If Salisbury wants mercy at thy hand!
 Bear hence his body, I will help to bury it.
 Sir Thomas Gargrave, hast thou any life?
 Speak unto Talbot; nay, look up to him.
 Salisbury, cheer thy spirit with this comfort;
 Thou shalt not die, whiles—
 He beckons with his hand, and smiles on me;
 As who should say, "When I am dead and gone,
 Remember to avenge me on the French."—
 Plantagenet, I will; and like thee, Nero,<sup>1</sup>
 Play on the lute, beholding the towns burn:
 Wretched shall France be only in my name.
 [Thunder heard; afterwards an alarum.]
 What stir is this? What tumult's in the heavens?
 Whence cometh this alarum, and the noise?

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My lord, my lord, the French have gather'd head:
 The Dauphin, with one Joan la Pucelle join'd,—
 A holy prophetess, new risen up,—
 Is come with a great power to raise the siege.

[SALISBURY groans.]

Tal. Hear, hear, how dying Salisbury doth groan!
 It irks his heart he cannot be reveng'd.—
 Frenchmen, I'll be a Salisbury to you:—
 Pucelle or puzzel,<sup>2</sup> dolphin or dogfish,
 Your hearts I'll stamp out with my horse's heels,
 And make a quagmire of your mingled brains.
 Convey me Salisbury into his tent,
 And then we'll try what these dastard Frenchmen dare.
 [Exeunt, bearing out the bodies.]

SCENE V.—The same. Before one of the Gates.

Alarum. Skirmishings. TALBOT pursueth the Dauphin, and driveth him in; then enter JOAN LA PUCELLE, driving Englishmen before her. Then enter TALBOT.

Tal. Where is my strength, my valour, and my force?
 Our English troops retire, I cannot stay them;
 A woman, clad in armour, chaseth them.

Enter LA PUCELLE.

Here, here she comes:—I'll have a bout with thee;
 Devil, or devil's dam, I'll conjure thee:
 Blood will I draw on thee, thou art a witch,<sup>3</sup>
 And straightway give thy soul to him thou serv'st.

Puc. Come, come, 'tis only I that must disgrace thee.

[They fight.]

Tal. Heavens, can you suffer hell so to prevail?
 My breast I'll burst with straining of my courage,
 And from my shoulders crack my arms asunder,
 But I will chastise this high-minded strumpet.

Puc. Talbot, farewell; thy hour is not yet come:
 I must go victual Orleans forthwith.
 O'ertake me, if thou canst; I scorn thy strength.

<sup>1</sup> The original folio reads—

"Plantagenet, I will; and like thee."

The second folio has—

"Plantagenet, I will, and Nero-like, will."

We prefer to add Nero to the end of the line, according to Malone's suggestion; for nothing is more common, in printing with movable types, than for a letter or a word at the end of a line of poetry to drop out, from the careless filling up of the space by the compositor.

<sup>4</sup> An allusion to Hannibal's stratagem, recorded in Livy, of fixing lighted twigs on the horns of oxen.

Go, go, cheer up thy hunger-starved men;
 Help Salisbury to make his testament:
 This day is ours, as many more shall be.

[PUCELLE enters the town, with Soldiers.]

Tal. My thoughts are whirled like a potter's wheel;
 I know not where I am, nor what I do:
 A witch, by fear, not force, like Hannibal,<sup>4</sup>
 Drives back our troops, and conquers as she lists:
 So bees with smoke, and doves with noisome stench,
 Are from their hives and houses driven away.
 They call'd us, for our fierceness, English dogs;
 Now, like to whelps, we crying run away.

[A short alarum.]

Hark, countrymen! either renew the fight,
 Or tear the lions out of England's coat;
 Renounce your soil, give sheep in lions' stead:
 Sheep run not half so timorous from the wolf,
 Or horse, or oxen, from the leopard,
 As you fly from your oft-subdued slaves.

[Alarum. Another skirmish.]

It will not be:—Retire into your trenches:
 You all consented unto Salisbury's death,
 For none would strike a stroke in his revenge.—
 Pucelle is enter'd into Orleans,
 In spite of us, or aught that we could do.
 O, would I were to die with Salisbury!
 The shame hereof will make me hide my head!
 [Alarum. Retreat. Exeunt TALBOT and his Forces, &c.]

SCENE VI.—The same.

Enter, on the walls, PUCELLE, CHARLES, REIGNIER, ALENÇON, and Soldiers.

Puc. Advance our waving colours on the walls;
 Rescued is Orleans from the English wolves:<sup>5</sup>—
 Thus Joan la Pucelle hath perform'd her word.

Char. Divinest creature, bright Astræa's<sup>6</sup> daughter,
 How shall I honour thee for this success?
 Thy promises are like Adonis' gardens,
 That one day bloom'd, and fruitful were the next.—
 France, triumph in thy glorious prophetess!—
 Recover'd is the town of Orleans:
 More blessed hap did ne'er befall our state.

Reig. Why ring not out the bells aloud throughout the town?

Dauphin, command the citizens make bonfires,
 And feast and banquet in the open streets,
 To celebrate the joy that God hath given us.

Alen. All France will be replete with mirth and joy,
 When they shall hear how we have play'd the men.

Char. 'Tis Joan, not we, by whom the day is won;
 For which, I will divide my crown with her:
 And all the priests and friars in my realm
 Shall, in procession, sing her endless praise.
 A statelier pyramid to her I'll rear,
 Than Rhodope's, or Memphis',<sup>7</sup> ever was:
 In memory of her, when she is dead,
 Her ashes, in an urn more precious
 Than the rich jewell'd coffer of Darius,<sup>8</sup>
 Transported shall be at high festivals

<sup>5</sup> So the second folio; the first omits wolves.

<sup>6</sup> Bright is omitted in the first folio, but is in the second.

"Than Rhodope's, of Memphis."

The pyramid of Rhodope, near Memphis, is mentioned by Pliny:—"The fairest and most commended for workmanship was built at the cost and charges of one Rhodope, a very strumpet." Herodotus (ii. 134) maintains that the pyramid was not built by Rhodope (Rhodopis).

<sup>8</sup> The expression of the text, and the explanation, are found in a passage of Puttenham's "Arte of English Poesie" (1589):—"In what price the noble poems of Homer were holden with Alexander the Great, insomuch that every night they were laid under his pillow, and by day were carried in the rich jewel-coffer of Darius, lately before vanquished by him in battle."

Before the kings and queens of France.
No longer on Saint Denis will we cry,
But Joan la Pucelle shall be France's saint.
Come in: and let us banquet royally,
After this golden day of victory. [Flourish. Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Orleans.

Enter to the gates, a French Sergeant, and Two Sentinels.

Serg. Sirs, take your places, and be vigilant:
If any noise, or soldier, you perceive
Near to the walls, by some apparent sign
Let us have knowledge at the court of guard.<sup>1</sup>
i Sent. Sergeant, you shall. [Exit Sergeant.] Thus are poor servitors
(When others sleep upon their quiet beds)
Constrain'd to watch in darkness, rain, and cold.

Enter TALBOT, BEDFORD, BURGUNDY, and Forces, with scaling ladders; their drums beating a dead march.

Tal. Lord Regent, and redoubted Burgundy,—
By whose approach, the regions of Artois,
Walloon, and Picardy, are friends to us,—
This happy night the Frenchmen are secure,
Having all day carous'd and banqueted:
Embrace we then this opportunity;
As fitting best to quittance their deceit,
Contriv'd by art and baleful sorcery.

Bed. Coward of France!—how much he wrongs his fame,
Despairing of his own arm's fortitude,
To join with witches, and the help of hell.

Bur. Traitors have never other company.
But what's that Pucelle, whom they term so pure?

Tal. A maid, they say.

Bed. A maid, and be so martial?

Bur. Pray God she prove not masculine ere long;
If underneath the standard of the French,
She carry armour, as she hath begun.

Tal. Well, let them practise and converse with spirits:
God is our fortress; in whose conquering name
Let us resolve to scale their flinty bulwarks.

Bed. Ascend, brave Talbot; we will follow thee.

Tal. Not all together: better far, I guess,
That we do make our entrance several ways;
That if it chance the one of us do fail,
The other yet may rise against their force.

Bed. Agreed; I'll to yon corner.

Bur. And I to this.

Tal. And here will Talbot mount, or make his grave.
Now, Salisbury! for thee, and for the right
Of English Henry, shall this night appear
How much in duty I am bound to both.

[*The English scale the walls, crying "St. George!"
"A Talbot!" and all enter by the town.*]

Sent. [Within.] Arm, arm! the enemy doth make assault!

The French leap over the walls in their shirts. Enter, several ways, Bastard, ALENÇON, REIGNIER, half ready, and half unready.

Alen. How now, my lords? what, all unready<sup>2</sup> so?

Bast. Unready? ay, and glad we 'scap'd so well.

Reig. 'Twas time, I trow, to wake and leave our beds,
Hearing alarums at our chamber doors.

Alen. Of all exploits, since first I follow'd arms,
Ne'er heard I of a warlike enterprise
More venturous or desperate than this.

Bast. I think this Talbot be a fiend of hell.

Reig. If not of hell, the heavens sure favour him.

Alen. Here cometh Charles; I marvel how he sped.

Enter CHARLES and LA PUCELLE.

Bast. Tut! holy Joan was his defensive guard.

Char. Is this thy cunning, thou deceitful dame?
Didst thou at first, to flatter us withal,
Make us partakers of a little gain,
That now our loss might be ten times so much?

Puc. Wherefore is Charles impatient with his friend?

At all times will you have my power alike?
Sleeping, or waking, must I still prevail,
Or will you blame and lay the fault on me?
Improvident soldiers! had your watch been good,
This sudden mischief never could have fall'n.

Char. Duke of Alençon, this was your default;
That, being captain of the watch to-night,
Did look no better to that weighty charge.

Alen. Had all your quarters been as safely kept
As that whereof I had the government,
We had not been thus shamefully surpris'd.

Bast. Mine was secure.

Reig. And so was mine, my lord.

Char. And, for myself, most part of all this night,
Within her quarter, and mine own precinct,
I was employ'd in passing to and fro,
About relieving of the sentinels:

Then how, or which way, should they first break in?

Puc. Question, my lords, no further of the case,
How, or which way; 'tis sure they found some place
But weakly guarded, where the breach was made.
And now there rests no other shift but this,—
To gather our soldiers, scatter'd and dispers'd,
And lay new platforms<sup>3</sup> to endamage them.

Alarum. Enter an English Soldier, crying "A Talbot! a Talbot!" They fly, leaving their clothes behind.

Sold. I'll be so bold to take what they have left.
The cry of Talbot serves me for a sword;
For I have loaden me with many spoils,
Using no other weapon but his name. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Orleans. Within the Town.

Enter TALBOT, BEDFORD, BURGUNDY, a Captain, and others.

Bed. The day begins to break, and night is fled,
Whose pitchy mantle over-veil'd the earth.
Here sound retreat, and cease our hot pursuit.

[Retreat sounded.]

Tal. Bring forth the body of old Salisbury;

<sup>1</sup> Court of guard. Steevens says this is equivalent to the modern term "guard-room." This is rather a forced interpretation; for the word court indicates with sufficient precision the general place of guard—the enclosed space where a guard is held, in which the guard-room is situated.

"Make me unready;
I slept but ill last night."

And here advance it in the market-place,
The middle centre of this cursed town.
Now have I paid my vow unto his soul;
For every drop of blood was drawn from him,
There hath at least five Frenchmen died to-night.
And, that hereafter ages may behold
What ruin happen'd in revenge of him,
Within their chiefest temple I'll erect
A tomb, wherein his corpse shall be interr'd:
Upon the which, that every one may read,
Shall be engrav'd the sack of Orleans;
The treacherous manner of his mournful death,
And what a terror he had been to France.
But, lords, in all our bloody massacre,
I muse we met not with the Dauphin's grace,
His new-come champion, virtuous Joan of Arc,
Nor any of his false confederates.

Bed. 'Tis thought, lord Talbot, when the fight began,
Rous'd on the sudden from their drowsy beds,
They did, amongst the troops of armed men,
Leap o'er the walls for refuge in the field.

Bur. Myself (as far as I could well discern,
For smoke, and dusky vapours of the night)
Am sure I scar'd the Dauphin, and his trull;
When arm in arm they both came swiftly running,
Like to a pair of loving turtle-doves,
That could not live asunder, day or night.
After that things are set in order here,
We'll follow them with all the power we have.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. All hail, my lords! which of this princely train
Call ye the warlike Talbot, for his acts
So much applauded through the realm of France?

Tal. Here is the Talbot; who would speak with him

Mess. The virtuous lady, countess of Auvergne,
With modesty admiring thy renown,
By me entreats, great lord,<sup>1</sup> thou wouldst vouchsafe
To visit her poor castle where she lies;<sup>2</sup>
That she may boast she hath beheld the man
Whose glory fills the world with loud report.

Bur. Is it even so? Nay, then, I see our wars
Will turn into a peaceful comic sport,
When ladies crave to be encounter'd with.
You may not, my lord, despise her gentle suit.

Tal. Ne'er trust me then; for, when a world of men
Could not prevail with all their oratory,
Yet hath a woman's kindness overrul'd:
And therefore tell her, I return great thanks;
And in submission will attend on her.

Will not your honours bear me company?

Bed. No, truly; it is more than manners will:
And I have heard it said,—Unbidden guests
Are often welcomest when they are gone.

Tal. Well then, alone, (since there's no remedy,
I mean to prove this lady's courtesy.

Come hither, captain. [Whispers.—You perceive my mind.

Capt. I do, my lord; and mean accordingly. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—Auvergne. Court of the Castle.

Enter the COUNTESS and her Porter.

Count. Porter, remember what I gave in charge;
And when you have done so, bring the keys to me.

Port. Madam, I will. [Exit.

Count. The plot is laid: if all things fall out right,
I shall as famous be by this exploit
As Scythian Thomyris by Cyrus' death.
Great is the rumour of this dreadful knight,
And his achievements of no less account:
Fain would mine eyes be witness with mine ears,
To give their censure<sup>3</sup> of these rare reports.

Enter Messenger and TALBOT.

Mess. Madam,
According as your ladyship desir'd,
By message crav'd, so is lord Talbot come.

Count. And he is welcome. What! is this the man?

Mess. Madam, it is.

Count. Is this the scourge of France?
Is this the Talbot, so much fear'd abroad,
That with his name the mothers still their babes?
I see report is fabulous and false:
I thought I should have seen some Hercules,
A second Hector, for his grim aspect,
And large proportion of his strong-knit limbs.
Alas! this is a child, a silly dwarf:
It cannot be this weak and writhled<sup>4</sup> shrimp
Should strike such terror to his enemies.

Tal. Madam, I have been bold to trouble you:
But since your ladyship is not at leisure,
I'll sort some other time to visit you.

Count. What means he now?—Go ask him whither he goes.

Mess. Stay, my lord Talbot; for my lady craves
To know the cause of your abrupt departure.

Tal. Marry, for that she's in a wrong belief,
I go to certify her Talbot's here.

Re-enter Porter, with keys.

Count. If thou be he, then art thou prisoner.

Tal. Prisoner! to whom?

Count. To me, blood-thirsty lord;
And for that cause I train'd thee to my house.
Long time thy shadow hath been thrall to me,
For in my gallery thy picture hangs:
But now thy substance shall endure the like;
And I will chain these legs and arms of thine,
That hast by tyranny, these many years,
Wasted our country, slain our citizens,
And sent our sons and husbands captivate.

Tal. Ha, ha, ha!

Count. Laughest thou, wretch thy mirth shall turn to moan.

Tal. I laugh to see your ladyship so fond,
To think that you have aught but Talbot's shadow,
Whereon to practise your severity.

Count. Why, art not thou the man?

Tal. I am, indeed.

Count. Then have I substance too.

Tal. No, no, I am but shadow of myself:
You are deceiv'd, my substance is not here;
For what you see is but the smallest part
And least proportion of humanity;
I tell you, madam, were the whole frame here,
It is of such a spacious lofty pitch,
Your roof were not sufficient to contain it.

Count. This is a riddling merchant for the nonce;
He will be here, and yet he is not here:
How can these contrarieties agree?

“Her writhled skin, as rough as maple rind.”

PE R. A. FINX

THE SCENE IN THE TEMPLE GARDEN

Tal. That will I show you presently.

[He winds a horn. Drums heard; then a peal of ordnance. The gates being forced, enter Soldiers.

How say you, madam? are you now persuaded
That Talbot is but shadow of himself?
These are his substance, sinews, arms, and strength,
With which he yoketh your rebellious necks;
Razeth your cities, and subverts your towns,
And in a moment makes them desolate.

Count. Victorious Talbot! pardon my abuse:
I find thou art no less than fame hath bruted,
And more than may be gather'd by thy shape.
Let my presumption not provoke thy wrath;
For I am sorry, that with reverence
I did not entertain thee as thou art.

Tal. Be not dismay'd, fair lady; nor misconster<sup>1</sup>
The mind of Talbot, as you did mistake
The outward composition of his body.
What you have done hath not offended me:
Nor other satisfaction do I crave,
But only (with your patience) that we may Taste of your wine, and see what cates you have;
For soldiers' stomachs always serve them well.

Count. With all my heart; and think me honoured
To feast so great a warrior in my house. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—London. The Temple Garden.

Enter the EARLS OF SOMERSET, SUFFOLK, and WARWICK;
RICHARD PLANTAGENET, VERNON, and another Lawyer.

Plan. Great lords, and gentlemen, what means this silence?

Dare no man answer in a case of truth?

Suf. Within the Temple hall we were too loud;
The garden here is more convenient.

Plan. Then say at once, if I maintain the truth;
Or, else, was wrangling Somerset in the error?

Suf. 'Faith, I have been a truant in the law;
And never yet could frame my will to it;
And, therefore, frame the law unto my will.

Som. Judge you, my lord of Warwick, then between us.

War. Between two hawks, which flies the higher pitch,
Between two dogs, which hath the deeper mouth,
Between two blades, which bears the better temper,
Between two horses, which doth bear him best,
Between two girls, which hath the merriest eye,
I have, perhaps, some shallow spirit of judgment:
But in these nice sharp quillets of the law,
Good faith, I am no wiser than a daw.

Plan. Tut, tut, here is a mannerly forbearance:
The truth appears so naked on my side,
That any purblind eye may find it out.

Som. And on my side it is so well apparell'd,
So clear, so shining, and so evident,
That it will glimmer through a blind man's eye.

Plan. Since you are tongue-tied, and so loath to speak,
In dumb significants proclaim your thoughts:
Let him that is a true-born gentleman,
And stands upon the honour of his birth,
If he suppose that I have pleaded truth,
From off this brier pluck a white rose with me.

Som. Let him that is no coward, nor no flatterer,
But dare maintain the party of the truth,
Pluck a red rose from off this thorn with me.

<sup>1</sup> Misconster. So the original: it was ordinarily printed misconstrue. In the quarto edition of Othello we find the word:—

War. I love no colours;<sup>2</sup> and, without all colour
Of base insinuating flattery,
I pluck this white rose, with Plantagenet.

Suf. I pluck this red rose, with young Somerset;
And say withal, I think he held the right.

Ver. Stay, lords and gentlemen; and pluck no more,
Till you conclude—that he upon whose side
The fewest roses are cropp'd from the tree,
Shall yield the other in the right opinion.

Som. Good master Vernon, it is well objected;<sup>3</sup>
If I have fewest I subscribe in silence.

Plan. And I.

Ver. Then, for the truth and plainness of the case,
I pluck this pale and maiden blossom here,
Giving my verdict on the white rose side.

Som. Prick not your finger as you pluck it off;
Lest, bleeding, you do paint the white rose red,
And fall on my side so against your will.

Ver. If I, my lord, for my opinion bleed,
Opinion shall be surgeon to my hurt,
And keep me on the side where still I am.

Som. Well, well, come on; Who else?

Law. Unless my study and my books be false,
The argument you held was wrong in you;

[To SOMERSET.]

In sign whereof, I pluck a white rose too.

Plan. Now, Somerset, where is your argument?

Som. Here, in my scabbard; meditating that Shall dye your white rose in a bloody red.

Plan. Meantime, your cheeks do counterfeit our roses;
For pale they look with fear, as witnessing
The truth on our side.

Som. No, Plantagenet,
'Tis not for fear, but anger,—that thy cheeks
Blush for pure shame, to counterfeit our roses;
And yet thy tongue will not confess thy error.

Plan. Hath not thy rose a canker, Somerset?

Som. Hath not thy rose a thorn, Plantagenet?

Plan. Ay, sharp and piercing, to maintain his truth;
Whiles thy consuming canker eats his falsehood.

Som. Well, I'll find friends to wear my bleeding roses,
That shall maintain what I have said is true,
Where false Plantagenet dare not be seen.

Plan. Now, by this maiden blossom in my hand,
I scorn thee and thy fashion,<sup>4</sup> peevish boy.

Suf. Turn not thy scorns this way, Plantagenet.

Plan. Proud Poole, I will; and scorn both him and thee.

Suf. I'll turn my part thereof into thy throat.

Som. Away, away, good William De la Poole!

We grace the yeoman, by conversing with him.

War. Now, by God's will, thou wrong'st him, Somerset;
His grandfather was Lionel duke of Clarence,
Third son to the third Edward king of England;
Spring crestless yeomen from so deep a root?

Plan. He bears him on the place's privilege,
Or durst not, for his craven heart, say thus.

Som. By him that made me, I'll maintain my words
On any plot of ground in Christendom:
Was not thy father, Richard, earl of Cambridge,
For treason executed in our late king's days?
And, by his treason, stand'st not thou attainted,
Corrupted, and exempt<sup>5</sup> from ancient gentry?
His trespass yet lives guilty in thy blood;
And, till thou be restor'd, thou art a yeoman.

Plan. My father was attached, not attainted;
Condemn'd to die for treason, but no traitor;

<sup>3</sup> Objected. The word is not here used in the ordinary sense of opposed, but in its less common meaning of proposed, suggested.

And that I'll prove on better men than Somerset,
Were growing time once ripen'd to my will.
For your partaker<sup>1</sup> Poole, and you yourself,
I'll note you in my book of memory,
To scourge you for this apprehension:<sup>2</sup>
Look to it well; and say you are well warn'd.

Som. Ay, thou shalt find us ready for thee still:
And know us, by these colours, for thy foes;
For these my friends, in spite of thee, shall wear.

Plan. And, by my soul, this pale and angry rose,
As cognizance<sup>3</sup> of my blood-drinking hate,
Will I for ever, and my faction, wear;
Until it wither with me to my grave,
Or flourish to the height of my degree.

Suf. Go forward, and be chok'd with thy ambition!
And so farewell, until I meet thee next. [Exit.]

Som. Have with thee, Poole.—Farewell, ambitious Richard. [Exit.]

Plan. How I am brav'd, and must perforce endure it!

War. This blot, that they object against your house,
Shall be wip'd out in the next parliament,
Call'd for the truce of Winchester and Gloster:
And, if thou be not then created York,
I will not live to be accounted Warwick.

Meantime, in signal of my love to thee,
Against proud Somerset and William Poole,
Will I upon thy party wear this rose:

And here I prophesy,—This brawl to-day,
Grown to this faction, in the Temple garden,
Shall send, between the red rose and the white,
A thousand souls to death and deadly night.

Plan. Good master Vernon, I am bound to you,
That you on my behalf would pluck a flower.

Ver. In your behalf still will I wear the same.

Lav. And so will I.

Plan. Thanks, gentle sir.

Come, let us four to dinner: I dare say
This quarrel will drink blood another day. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—The same. A Room in the Tower.

Enter MORTIMER, brought in a chair by Two Keepers.

Mor. Kind keepers of my weak decaying age,
Let dying Mortimer here rest himself.
Even like a man new haled from the rack,
So fare my limbs with long imprisonment:
And these grey locks, these pursuivants of death,
Nestor-like aged, in an age of care,
Argue the end of Edmund Mortimer.
These eyes, like lamps whose wasting oil is spent,
Wax dim, as drawing to their exigent:<sup>4</sup>
Weak shoulders, overborne with burd'ning grief;
And pithless arms, like to a wither'd vine
That droops his sapless branches to the ground:
Yet are these feet, whose strengthless stay is numb,
Unable to support this lump of clay,
Swift-winged with desire to get a grave,
As witting I no other comfort have.
But tell me, keeper, will my nephew come?

1 Keep. Richard Plantagenet, my lord, will come:
We sent unto the Temple, to his chamber;
And answer was return'd, that he will come.

Mor. Enough; my soul shall then be satisfied.
Poor gentleman! his wrong doth equal mine.
Since Henry Monmouth first began to reign,
(Before whose glory I was great in arms,)
This loathsome sequestration have I had;

And even since then hath Richard been obscur'd,
Depriv'd of honour and inheritance:
But now, the arbitrator of despairs,
Just death, kind umpire of men's miseries,
With sweet enlargement doth dismiss me hence;
I would his troubles likewise were expir'd,
That so he might recover what was lost.

Enter RICHARD PLANTAGENET.

1 Keep. My lord, your loving nephew now is come.

Mor. Richard Plantagenet, my friend? Is he come?

Plan. Ay, noble uncle, thus ignobly us'd,
Your nephew, late-despised Richard, comes.

Mor. Direct mine arms, I may embrace his neck,
And in his bosom spend my latter gasp:
O, tell me, when my lips do touch his cheeks,
That I may kindly give one fainting kiss.
And now declare, sweet stem from York's great stock,
Why didst thou say—of late thou wert despis'd?

Plan. First, lean thine aged back against mine arm;
And, in that ease, I'll tell thee my disease.<sup>5</sup>

This day, in argument upon a case,
Some words there grew 'twixt Somerset and me:
Among which terms, he us'd his lavish tongue,
And did upbraid me with my father's death;
Which obloquy set bars before my tongue,
Else with the like I had requited him:
Therefore, good uncle,—for my father's sake,
In honour of a true Plantagenet,
And for alliance' sake,—declare the cause
My father, earl of Cambridge, lost his head.

Mor. That cause, fair nephew,<sup>6</sup> that imprison'd me,
And hath detain'd me, all my flow'ring youth,
Within a loathsome dungeon, there to pine,
Was curs'd instrument of his decease.

Plan. Discover more at large what cause that was;
For I am ignorant, and cannot guess.

Mor. I will; if that my fading breath permit,
And death approach not ere my tale be done.
Henry the Fourth, grandfather to this king,
Depos'd his nephew Richard,—Edward's son,
The first-begotten, and the lawful heir
Of Edward king, the third of that descent:
During whose reign, the Percies of the north,
Finding his usurpation most unjust,
Endeavour'd my advancement to the throne
The reason mov'd these warlike lords to this,
Was—for that (young king Richard thus remov'd, Leaving no heir begotten of his body)
I was the next by birth and parentage,
For by my mother I derived am
From Lionel duke of Clarence, the third son
To king Edward the Third, whereas he
From John of Gaunt doth bring his pedigree,
Being but fourth of that heroic line.
But mark; as, in this haughty great attempt,
They laboured to plant the rightful heir,
I lost my liberty, and they their lives.
Long after this, when Henry the Fifth,
Succeeding his father Bolingbroke, did reign,
Thy father, earl of Cambridge, then deriv'd
From famous Edmund Langley, duke of York,
Marrying my sister, that thy mother was,
Again, in pity of my hard distress,
Levied an army; weening to redeem,
And have install'd me in the diadem:
But, as the rest, so fell that noble earl,

And was beheaded. Thus the Mortimers,
In whom the title rested, were suppress'd.

Plan. Of which, my lord, your honour is the last.

Mor. True; and thou seest that I no issue have;
And that my fainting words do warrant death:
Thou art my heir; the rest, I wish thee gather;
And yet be wary in thy studious care.

Plan. Thy grave admonishments prevail with me:
But yet, methinks, my father's execution
Was nothing less than bloody tyranny.

Mor. With silence, nephew, be thou politic;
Strong-fixed is the house of Lancaster,
And, like a mountain, not to be remov'd.
But now thy uncle is removing hence;
As princes do their courts, when they are cloy'd
With long continuance in a settled place.

Plan. O, uncle, would some part of my young years
Might but redeem the passage of your age!

Mor. Thou dost then wrong me; as the slaught'rer doth,
Which giveth many wounds when one will kill.

Mourn not, except thou sorrow for my good;
Only, give order for my funeral;
And so farewell; and fair be all thy hopes!
And prosperous be thy life, in peace and war! [Dies.]

Plan. And peace, no war, befall thy parting soul!

In prison hast thou spent a pilgrimage,
And like a hermit overpass'd thy days.
Well, I will lock his counsel in my breast;
And what I do imagine, let that rest.
Keepers, convey him hence: and I myself
Will see his burial better than his life.

[Exeunt Keepers, bearing out MORTIMER.]

Here dies the dusky torch of Mortimer,
Chok'd with ambition of the meaner sort:
And, for those wrongs, those bitter injuries,
Which Somerset hath offer'd to my house,
I doubt not but with honour to redress:
And therefore haste I to the parliament;
Either to be restored to my blood,
Or make my ill<sup>1</sup> the advantage of my good. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—London. The Parliament-House.

Flourish. Enter KING HENRY, EXETER, GLOSTER, WAR-WICK, SOMERSET, and SUFFOLK; the BISHOP OF WIN-
CHESTER, RICHARD PLANTAGENET, and others. GLOS-TER offers to put up a bill; WINCHESTER snatches it, and tears it.

Win. Com'st thou with deep premeditated lines,
With written pamphlets studiously devis'd,
Humphrey of Gloster? if thou canst accuse,
Or aught intend'st to lay unto my charge,
Do it without invention suddenly;
As I with sudden and extemporal speech
Purpose to answer what thou canst object.

Glo. Presumptuous priest! this place commands my patience,
Or thou shouldst find thou hast dishonour'd me.
Think not, although in writing I preferr'd
The manner of thy vile outrageous crimes,
That therefore I have forg'd, or am not able Verbatim to rehearse the method of my pen:

<sup>1</sup> Ill—ill-usage.

"Am I not the protector, saucy priest?"

No, prelate; such is thy audacious wickedness,
Thy lewd, pestiferous, and dissentious pranks,
As very infants prattle of thy pride.
Thou art a most pernicious usurer;
Froward by nature, enemy to peace;
Lascivious, wanton, more than well beseems
A man of thy profession and degree;
And for thy treachery, what's more manifest?
In that thou laid'st a trap to take my life,
As well at London bridge, as at the Tower?
Beside, I fear me, if thy thoughts were sifted,
The king, thy sovereign, is not quite exempt
From envious malice of thy swelling heart.

Win. Gloster, I do defy thee. Lords, vouchsafe
To give me hearing what I shall reply.
If I were covetous, ambitious, or perverse,
As he will have me, how am I so poor?
Or how haps it I seek not to advance
Or raise myself, but keep my wonted calling?
And for dissension, who preferreth peace
More than I do,—except I be provok'd?
No, my good lords, it is not that offends;
It is not that that hath incens'd the duke:
It is, because no one should sway but he;
No one but he should be about the king;
And that engenders thunder in his breast,
And makes him roar these accusations forth.
But he shall know, I am as good—

Glo. As good?

Thou bastard of my grandfather!—

Win. Ay, lordly sir: For what are you, I pray,
But one imperious in another's throne?

Glo. Am I not protector, saucy priest?<sup>2</sup>

Win. And am I not a prelate of the church?

Glo. Yes, as an outlaw in a castle keeps,
And useth it to patronage his theft.

Win. Unreverent Gloster!

Glo. Thou art reverent,
Touching thy spiritual function, not thy life.

Win. Rome shall remedy this.

War. Roam thither then.

Som. My lord, it were your duty to forbear.

War. Ay, see the bishop be not overborne.

Som. Methinks, my lord should be religious,
And know the office that belongs to such.

War. Methinks, his lordship should be humbler;
It fitteth not a prelate so to plead.

Som. Yes, when his holy state is touch'd so near.

War. State holy, or unhallow'd, what of that?

Is not his grace protector to the king?

Plan. Plantagenet, I see, must hold his tongue;
Lest it be said, "Speak, sirrah, when you should;
Must your bold verdict enter talk with lords?"

Else would I have a fling at Winchester. [Aside.]

K. Hen. Uncles of Gloster, and of Winchester,
The special watchmen of our English weal,
I would prevail, if prayers might prevail,
To join your hearts in love and amity.
O, what a scandal is it to our crown,
That two such noble peers as ye should jar!
Believe me, lords, my tender years can tell,
Civil dissension is a viperous worm
That gnaws the bowels of the commonwealth.—

[A noise within; "Down with the tawny-coats!"]

What tumult's this?

War. An uproar, I dare warrant,
Begun through malice of the bishop's men.

[A noise again; "Stones! Stones!"]

The opportunities in this play for Steevens's interference in this manner are remarkably few. We should not notice them, except to mention that we hold it of importance to exhibit this play as we have received it, except in cases of manifest error, which rarely occur. It is printed with singular correctness in the original folio.

Enter the Mayor of London, attended.

May. O, my good lords,—and virtuous Henry,— Pity the city of London, pity us!
The bishop and the duke of Gloster's men,
Forbidden late to carry any weapon,
Have fill'd their pockets full of pebble-stones;
And banding themselves in contrary parts,
Do pelt so fast at one another's pate,
That many have their giddy brains knock'd out:
Our windows are broke down in every street,
And we, for fear, compell'd to shut our shops.

Enter, skirmishing, the Retainers of GLOSTER and WINCHESTER, with bloody pates.

K. Hen. We charge you, on allegiance to ourself,
To hold your slaught'ring hands, and keep the peace.
Pray, uncle Gloster, mitigate this strife.

1 Serv. Nay, if we be forbidden stones, we'll fall to it with our teeth.

2 Serv. Do what ye dare, we are as resolute.

[Skirmish again.]

Glo. You of my household, leave this peevish broil,
And set this unaccustom'd fight aside.

3 Serv. My lord, we know your grace to be a man
Just and upright; and, for your royal birth,
Inferior to none but to his majesty:

And ere that we will suffer such a prince,
So kind a father of the commonweal,
To be disgraced by an inkhorn mate,<sup>1</sup>
We, and our wives, and children, all will fight,
And have our bodies slaughter'd by thy foes.

1 Serv. Ay, and the very parings of our nails
Shall pitch a field, when we are dead. [Skirmish again.]

Glo. Stay, stay, I say!

And, if you love me, as you say you do,
Let me persuade you to forbear awhile.

K. Hen. O, how this discord doth afflict my soul!
Can you, my lord of Winchester, behold
My sighs and tears, and will not once relent?
Who should be pitiful, if you be not?
Or who should study to prefer a peace,
If holy churchmen take delight in broils?

War. Yield, my lord protector;—yield, Winchester;—
Except you mean, with obstinate repulse,
To slay your sovereign, and destroy the realm.
You see what mischief, and what murder too,
Hath been enacted through your enmity;
Then be at peace, except ye thirst for blood.

Win. He shall submit, or I will never yield.

Glo. Compassion on the king commands me stoop;
Or I would see his heart out ere the priest
Should ever get that privilege of me.

War. Behold, my lord of Winchester, the duke
Hath banish'd moody discontented fury,
As by his smoothed brows it doth appear:
Why look you still so stern and tragical?

Glo. Here, Winchester, I offer thee my hand.

K. Hen. Fie, uncle Beaufort! I have heard you preach
That malice was a great and grievous sin:
And will not you maintain the thing you teach,
But prove a chief offender in the same?

War. Sweet king!—the bishop hath a kindly gird.<sup>2</sup>—
For shame, my lord of Winchester! relent;
What, shall a child instruct you what to do?

Win. Well, duke of Gloster, I will yield to thee;
Love for thy love, and hand for hand I give.

Glo. Ay; but, I fear me, with a hollow heart.
See here, my friends, and loving countrymen;
This token serveth for a flag of truce,
Betwixt ourselves and all our followers:
So help me God, as I dissemble not!

Win. So help me God, as I intend it not! [Aside.]

K. Hen. O loving uncle, kind duke of Gloster,
How joyful am I made by this contract!
Away, my masters! trouble us no more;
But join in friendship, as your lords have done.

1 Serv. Content; I'll to the surgeon's.

2 Serv.

And so will I.

3 Serv. And I will see what physic the tavern affords.

[Exeunt Servants, Mayor, &c.]

War. Accept this scroll, most gracious sovereign;
Which in the right of Richard Plantagenet
We do exhibit to your majesty.

Glo. Well urg'd, my lord of Warwick;—for, sweet prince,
An if your grace mark every circumstance,
You have great reason to do Richard right:
Especially, for those occasions
At Eltham-place I told your majesty.

K. Hen. And those occasions, uncle, were of force:
Therefore, my loving lords, our pleasure is
That Richard be restored to his blood.

War. Let Richard be restored to his blood;
So shall his father's wrongs be recompens'd.

Win. As will the rest, so willeth Winchester.

K. Hen. If Richard will be true, not that alone,
But all the whole inheritance I give
That doth belong unto the house of York,
From whence you spring by lineal descent.

Plan. Thy humble servant vows obedience,
And humble service, till the point of death.

K. Hen. Stoop then, and set your knee against my foot:
And, in reguerdon<sup>3</sup> of that duty done,
I girt thee with the valiant sword of York:
Rise, Richard, like a true Plantagenet;
And rise created princely duke of York.

Plan. And so thrive Richard, as thy foes may fall!
And as my duty springs, so perish they
That grudge one thought against your majesty!

All. Welcome, high prince, the mighty duke of York!

Som. Perish, base prince, ignoble duke of York! [Aside.]

Glo. Now will it best avail your majesty
To cross the seas, and to be crown'd in France:
The presence of a king engenders love
Amongst his subjects, and his loyal friends;
As it dnaisimates his enemies.

K. Hen. When Gloster says the word, king Henry goes;
For friendly counsel cuts off many foes.

Glo. Your ships already are in readiness.

[Sennet. Flourish. Exeunt all but EXETER.]

Exe. Ay, we may march in England, or in France,
Not seeing what is likely to ensue:

This late dissension, grown betwixt the peers,
Burns under feigned ashes of forg'd love,
And will at last break out into a flame:

As fester'd members rot but by degree,
Till bones, and flesh, and sinews fall away,
So will this base and envious discord breed.

And now I fear that fatal prophecy,
Which, in the time of Henry nam'd the Fifth,
Was in the mouth of every sucking babe,—
That Henry, born at Monmouth, should win all;
And Henry, born at Windsor, should lose all:<sup>4</sup>
Which is so plain, that Exeter doth wish
His days may finish ere that hapless time. [Exit.]

<sup>2</sup> A kindly gird—a reproof meant in kindness. Falstaff says—
"Men of all sorts take a pride to gird at me."

SCENE II.—France. Before Rouen.

Enter LA PUCELLE disguised, and Soldiers dressed like Countrymen with sacks upon their backs.

Puc. These are the city gates, the gates of Rouen,
Through which our policy must make a breach:
Take heed, be wary how you place your words;
Talk like the vulgar sort of market-men,
That come to gather money for their corn.
If we have entrance (as I hope we shall)
And that we find the slothful watch but weak,
I'll by a sign give notice to our friends,
That Charles the Dauphin may encounter them.

Sold. Our sacks shall be a mean to sack the city,
And we be lords and rulers over Rouen;
Therefore we'll knock. [Knocks.]

Guard. [Within.] Qui est là ?

Puc. Paysans, pauvres gens de France ;
Poor market-folks that come to sell their corn.

Guard. Enter, go in ; the market-bell is rung.

[Opens the gates.]

Puc. Now, Rouen, I'll shake thy bulwarks to the ground.
[PUCELLE, &c., enter the city.]

Enter CHARLES, Bastard of Orleans, ALENÇON, and Forces.

Char. Saint Denis bless this happy stratagem!
And once again we'll sleep secure in Rouen.

Bast. Here enter'd Pucelle, and her practisants;
Now she is there, how will she specify
Where is the best and safest passage in ?

Alen. By thrusting out a torch from yonder tower;
Which, once discern'd, shows that her meaning is,—
No way to that, for weakness, which she enter'd.

Enter LA PUCELLE on a battlement, holding out a torch burning.

Puc. Behold, this is the happy wedding torch,
That joineth Rouen unto her countrymen;
But burning fatal to the Talbotites.

Bast. See, noble Charles! the beacon of our friend,
The burning torch in yonder turret stands.

Char. Now shine it like a comet of revenge,
A prophet to the fall of all our foes!

Alen. Defer no time: Delays have dangerous ends;
Enter, and cry—"The Dauphin!"—presently,
And then do execution on the watch. [They enter.]

Alarums. Enter TALBOT, and certain English.

Tal. France, thou shalt rue this treason with thy tears,
If Talbot but survive thy treachery.
Pucelle, that witch, that damned sorceress,
Hath wrought this hellish mischief unawares,
That hardly we escap'd the pride of France.

[Exeunt to the town.]

Alarum Excursions. Enter, from the town, BEDFORD, brought in sick, in a chair, with TALBOT, BURGUNDY, and the English Forces. Then, enter on the walls, LA PUCELLE, CHARLES, Bastard, ALENÇON, and others.

Puc. Good morrow, gallants! want ye corn for bread?
I think the duke of Burgundy will fast,
Before he'll buy again at such a rate:
'Twas full of darnel: Do you like the taste?

Bur. Scoff on, vile fiend, and shameless courtesan!
I trust, ere long, to choke thee with thine own,
And make thee curse the harvest of that corn.

Char. Your grace may starve, perhaps, before that time.

Bed. O, let no words, but deeds, revenge this treason!

Puc. What will you do, good grey-beard? break a lance,
And run a tilt at death within a chair?

Tal. Foul fiend of France, and hag of all despite,
Encompass'd with thy lustful paramours,
Becomes it thee to taunt his valiant age,
And twit with cowardice a man half dead?
Damsel, I'll have a bout with you again,
Or else let Talbot perish with his shame.

Puc. Are you so hot, sir? Yet, Pucelle, hold thy peace;
If Talbot do but thunder, rain will follow.

[TALBOT, and the rest, consult together.]

God speed the parliament! who shall be the speaker?

Tal. Dare ye come forth, and meet us in the field?

Puc. Belike, your lordship takes us then for fools,
To try if that our own be ours, or no.

Tal. I speak not to that railing Hecate,
But unto thee, Alençon, and the rest;
Will ye, like soldiers, come and fight it out?

Alen. Signior, no.

Tal. Signior, hang!—base muleteers of France!
Like peasant foot-boys do they keep the walls,
And dare not take up arms like gentlemen.

Puc. Away, captains: let's get us from the walls;
For Talbot means no goodness by his looks.
God be wi' you, my lord! we came but to tell you
That we are here.

[Exeunt LA PUCELLE, &c., from the walls.]

Tal. And there will we be too, ere it be long,
Or else reproach be Talbot's greatest fame!
Vow, Burgundy, by honour of thy house,
(Prick'd on by public wrongs sustain'd in France,)
Either to get the town again, or die:
And I, as sure as English Henry lives,
And as his father here was conqueror;
As sure as in this late-betrayed town
Great Cœur-de-lion's heart was buried;
So sure I swear, to get the town or die.

Bur. My vows are equal partners with thy vows.

Tal. But, ere we go, regard this dying prince,
The valiant duke of Bedford:—Come, my lord,
We will bestow you in some better place,
Fitter for sickness and for crazy age.

Bed. Lord Talbot, do not so dishonour me:
Here will I sit before the walls of Rouen,
And will be partner of your weal or woe.

Bur. Courageous Bedford, let us now persuade you.

Bed. Not to be gone from hence; for once I read,
That stout Pendragon, in his litter, sick,
Came to the field, and vanquished his foes:
Methinks I should revive the soldiers' hearts,
Because I ever found them as myself.

Tal. Undaunted spirit in a dying breast!—
Then be it so:—Heavens keep old Bedford safe!—
And now no more ado, brave Burgundy,
But gather we our forces out of hand,
And set upon our boasting enemy.

[Exeunt BURGUNDY, TALBOT, and Forces, leaving BEDFORD, and others.]

Alarum Excursions. Enter SIR JOHN FASTOLFE, and a Captain.

Cap. Whither away, Sir John Fastolfe, in such haste?

Fast. Whither away? to save myself by flight.
We are like to have the overthrow again.

Cap. What! will you fly and leave lord Talbot?

Fast.

All the Talbots in the world, to save my life.

Cap. Cowardly knight! ill fortune follow thee!

Ay,

[Exit.]

[Exit.]

Retreat Excursions. Enter, from the town, LA PUCELLE, ALENÇON, CHARLES, &c., and exeunt flying.

Bed. Now, quiet soul, depart when heaven please;
For I have seen our enemies' overthrow.
What is the trust or strength of foolish man?
They, that of late were daring with their scoffs,
Are glad and fain by flight to save themselves.
[Dies, and is carried off in his chair.]

Alarum. Enter TALBOT, BURGUNDY, and others.

Tal. Lost, and recover'd in a day again!
This is a double honour, Burgundy:
Yet heavens<sup>1</sup> have glory for this victory!

Bur. Warlike and martial Talbot, Burgundy
Enshrines thee in his heart; and there erects
Thy noble deeds, as valour's monuments.

Tal. Thanks, gentle duke. But where is Pucelle now?
I think her old familiar is asleep:
Now where's the Bastard's braves, and Charles his gleeke?
What, all a-mort?<sup>2</sup> Rouen hangs her head for grief
That such a valiant company are fled.
Now will we take some order in the town,
Placing therein some expert officers;
And then depart to Paris, to the king;
For there young Henry, with his nobles, lies.

Bur. What wills lord Talbot pleaseth Burgundy.

Tal. But yet, before we go, let's not forget
The noble duke of Bedford, late deceas'd,
But see his exequies fulfill'd in Rouen;
A braver soldier never couched lance,
A gentler heart did never sway in court:
But kings, and mightiest potentates, must die;
For that's the end of human misery. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The same. The Plains near the City.

Enter CHARLES, the Bastard, ALENÇON, LA PUCELLE, and Forces.

Puc. Dismay not, princes, at this accident,
Nor grieve that Rouen is so recovered:
Care is no cure, but rather corrosive,
For things that are not to be remedied.
Let frantic Talbot triumph for awhile,
And like a peacock sweep along his tail;
We'll pull his plumes, and take away his train,
If Dauphin and the rest will be but rul'd.

Char. We have been guided by thee hitherto,
And of thy cunning had no diffidence;
One sudden foil shall never breed distrust.

Bast. Search out thy wit for secret policies,
And we will make thee famous through the world.

Alen. We'll set thy statue in some holy place,
And have thee reverenc'd like a blessed saint;
Employ thee then, sweet virgin, for our good.

Puc. Then thus it must be; this doth Joan devise:
By fair persuasions, mix'd with sugar'd words,
We will entice the duke of Burgundy
To leave the Talbot, and to follow us.

Char. Ay, marry, sweetening, if we could do that,
France were no place for Henry's warriors;
Nor should that nation boast it so with us,
But be extirped from our provinces.

Alen. For ever should they be expuls'd from France,
And not have title of an earldom here.

Puc. Your honours shall perceive how I will work,

To bring this matter to the wished end. [Drums heard.]
Hark! by the sound of drum you may perceive
Their powers are marching unto Paris-ward.

An English March. Enter, and pass over at a distance, TALBOT and his Forces.

There goes the Talbot, with his colours spread;
And all the troops of English after him.

A French March. Enter the DUKE OF BURGUNDY and Forces.

Now, in the rearward, comes the duke, and his;
Fortune, in favour, makes him lag behind.
Summon a parley, we will talk with him.

[A parley sounded.]

Char. A parley with the duke of Burgundy.

Bur. Who craves a parley with the Burgundy?

Puc. The princely Charles of France, thy countryman.

Bur. What say'st thou, Charles? for I am marching
hence.

Char. Speak, Pucelle; and enchant him with thy words.

Puc. Brave Burgundy, undoubted hope of France!

Stay, let thy humble handmaid speak to thee.

Bur. Speak on; but be not over-tedious.

Puc. Look on thy country, look on fertile France,

And see the cities and the towns defac'd
By wasting ruin of the cruel foe!

As looks the mother on her lowly babe,
When death doth close his tender dying eyes,
See, see, the pining malady of France;
Behold the wounds, the most unnatural wounds,
Which thou thyself hast given her woeful breast!
O, turn thy edged sword another way:

Strike those that hurt, and hurt not those that help
One drop of blood drawn from thy country's bosom
Should grieve thee more than streams of foreign gore;
Return thee, therefore, with a flood of tears,
And wash away thy country's stained spots!

Bur. Either she hath bewitch'd me with her words,
Or nature makes me suddenly relent.

Puc. Besides, all French and France exclaims on thee,
Doubting thy birth and lawful progeny.

Who join'st thou with, but with a lordly nation,
That will not trust thee but for profit's sake?

When Talbot hath set footing once in France,

And fashion'd thee that instrument of ill,

Who then, but English Henry, will be lord,

And thou be thrust out like a fugitive?

Call we to mind,—and mark but this, for proof;—

Was not the duke of Orleans thy foe?

And was he not in England prisoner?

But, when they heard he was thine enemy,

They set him free, without his ransom paid,

In spite of Burgundy and all his friends.

See then, thou fight'st against thy countrymen,

And join'st with them will be thy slaughtermen.

Come, come, return; return, thou wand'ring lord;

Charles and the rest will take thee in their arms.

Bur. I am vanquish'd; these haughty<sup>3</sup> words of hers

Have batter'd me like roaring cannon-shot,

And made me almost yield upon my knees.

Forgive me, country, and sweet countrymen!

And, lords, accept this hearty kind embrace:

My forces and my power of men are yours;

So, farewell, Talbot; I'll no longer trust thee.

Puc. Done like a Frenchman; turn, and turn again!

“Valiant and virtuous, full of haughty courage.”

Char. Welcome, brave duke! thy friendship makes us fresh.

Bast. And doth beget new courage in our breasts.

Alen. Pucelle hath bravely play'd her part in this, And doth deserve a coronet of gold.

Char. Now let us on, my lords, and join our powers; And seek how we may prejudice the foe. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Paris. A Room in the Palace.

Enter KING HENRY, GLOSTER, and other Lords, VERNON, BASSET, &c. To them TALBOT, and some of his Officers.

Tal. My gracious prince, and honourable peers, Hearing of your arrival in this realm, I have awhile given truce unto my wars, To do my duty to my sovereign: In sign whereof, this arm,—that hath reclaim'd To your obedience fifty fortresses, Twelve cities, and seven walled towns of strength, Besides five hundred prisoners of esteem,— Lets fall his sword before your highness' feet; And, with submissive loyalty of heart, Ascribes the glory of his conquest got, First to my God, and next unto your grace.

K. Hen. Is this the lord Talbot, uncle Gloster, That hath so long been resident in France?

Glo. Yes, if it please your majesty, my liege.

K. Hen. Welcome, brave captain, and victorious lord! When I was young (as yet I am not old,) I do remember how my father said A stouter champion never handled sword. Long since we were resolved of your truth, Your faithful service, and your toil in war; Yet never have you tasted our reward, Or been reguerdon'd with so much as thanks, Because till now we never saw your face: Therefore, stand up; and for these good deserts, We here create you earl of Shrewsbury; And in our coronation take your place.

[Exeunt KING HENRY, GLOSTER, TALBOT, and Nobles.

Ver. Now, sir, to you, that were so hot at sea, Disgracing of these colours that I wear In honour of my noble lord of York,— Dar'st thou maintain the former words thou spak'st?

Bas. Yes, sir; as well as you dare patronage The envious barking of your saucy tongue Against my lord, the duke of Somerset.

Ver. Sirrah, thy lord I honour as he is.

Bas. Why, what is he? as good a man as York.

Ver. Hark ye; not so: in witness take ye that.

[Strikes him.]

Bas. Villain, thou know'st the law of arms is such, That whoso draws a sword 'tis present death, Or else this blow should broach thy dearest blood. But I'll unto his majesty, and crave I may have liberty to venge this wrong; When thou shalt see I'll meet thee to thy cost.

Ver. Well, miscreant, I'll be there as soon as you; And, after, meet you sooner than you would. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Paris. A Room of State.

Enter KING HENRY, GLOSTER, EXETER, YORK, SUFFOLK, SOMERSET, WINCHESTER, WARWICK, TALBOT, the Governor of Paris, and others.

Glo. Lord bishop, set the crown upon his head.

Win. God save king Henry, of that name the sixth!

Glo. Now, governor of Paris, take your oath,—

[Governor kneels.]

That you elect no other king but him: Esteem none friends but such as are his friends; And none your foes but such as shall pretend<sup>1</sup> Malicious practices against his state: This shall ye do, so help you righteous God!

[Exeunt Governor and his Train.

Enter SIR JOHN FASTOLFE.

Fast. My gracious sovereign, as I rode from Calais, To haste unto your coronation, A letter was deliver'd to my hands, Writ to your grace from the duke of Burgundy.

Tal. Shame to the duke of Burgundy, and thee! I vow'd, base knight, when I did meet thee next, To tear the garter from thy craven's leg, [Plucking it off.] (Which I have done) because unworthily Thou wast installed in that high degree. Pardon me, princely Henry, and the rest: This dastard, at the battle of Patay, When but in all I was six thousand strong, And that the French were almost ten to one, Before we met, or that a stroke was given, Like to a trusty squire, did run away; In which assault we lost twelve hundred men; Myself, and divers gentlemen beside, Were there surpris'd and taken prisoners. Then judge, great lords, if I have done amiss; Or whether that such cowards ought to wear This ornament of knighthood, yea or no.

Glo. To say the truth, this fact was infamous, And ill-beseeming any common man; Much more a knight, a captain, and a leader.

Tal. When first this order was ordain'd, my lords, Knights of the garter were of noble birth; Valiant, and virtuous, full of haughty courage, Such as were grown to credit by the wars; Not fearing death, nor shrinking for distress, But always resolute in most extremes. He then that is not furnish'd in this sort Doth but usurp the sacred name of knight, Profaning this most honourable order; And should (if I were worthy to be judge) Be quite degraded, like a hedge-born swain That doth presume to boast of gentle blood.

K. Hen. Stain to thy countrymen! thou hear'st thy doom:

Be packing therefore, thou that wast a knight; Henceforth we banish thee, on pain of death.—

[Exit FASTOLFE.

And now, lord protector, view the letter Sent from our uncle duke of Burgundy.

Glo. What means his grace, that he hath chang'd his style? [Viewing the superscription.]

No more but, plain and bluntly,—“To the king?”

Hath he forgot he is his sovereign?

Or doth this churlish superscription

Pretend some alteration in good will?<sup>2</sup>

What's here?—“I have, upon especial cause,— [Reads.]

Mov'd with compassion of my country's wrack,

Together with the pitiful complaints

Of such as your oppression feeds upon,—

Forsaken your pernicious faction,

And join'd with Charles, the rightful king of France.”

O monstrous treachery! Can this be so;

That in alliance, amity, and oaths,

There should be found such false dissembling guile?

K. Hen. What! doth my uncle Burgundy revolt?

Glo. He doth, my lord; and is become your foe.

K. Hen. Is that the worst this letter doth contain?

Glo. It is the worst, and all, my lord, he writes.

K. Hen. Why then, lord Talbot there shall talk with him,

And give him chastisement for this abuse:—

How say you, my lord? are you not content?

Tal. Content, my liege? Yes; but that I am prevented, I should have begg'd I might have been employ'd.

K. Hen. Then gather strength, and march unto him straight:

Let him perceive how ill we brook his treason;

And what offence it is to flout his friends.

Tal. I go, my lord; in heart desiring still
You may behold confusion of your foes.

[Exit.

Enter VERNON and BASSET.

Ver. Grant me the combat, gracious sovereign!

Bas. And me, my lord, grant me the combat too!

York. This is my servant: Hear him, noble prince!

Som. And this is mine: Sweet Henry, favour him!

K. Hen. Be patient, lords, and give them leave to speak.—

Say, gentlemen, What makes you thus exclaim?

And wherefore crave you combat? or with whom?

Ver. With him, my lord; for he hath done me wrong.

Bas. And I with him; for he hath done me wrong.

K. Hen. What is that wrong whereof you both complain?
First let me know, and then I'll answer you.

Bas. Crossing the sea from England into France,
This fellow here, with envious carping tongue,
Upbraided me about the rose I wear;
Saying—the sanguine colour of the leaves
Did represent my master's blushing cheeks,
When stubbornly he did repugn<sup>1</sup> the truth,
About a certain question in the law,
Argued betwixt the duke of York and him;
With other vile and ignominious terms:
In confutation of which rude reproach,
And in defence of my lord's worthiness,
I crave the benefit of law of arms.

Ver. And that is my petition, noble lord:
For though he seem, with forged quaint conceit,
To set a gloss upon his bold intent,
Yet know, my lord, I was provok'd by him;
And he first took exceptions at this badge,
Pronouncing—that the paleness of this flower
Bewray'd the faintness of my master's heart.

York. Will not this malice, Somerset, be left?

Som. Your private grudge, my lord of York, will out,
Though ne'er so cunningly you smother it.

K. Hen. Good Lord! what madness rules in brain-sick men;

When, for so slight and frivolous a cause,
Such factious emulations shall arise:
Good cousins both, of York and Somerset,
Quiet yourselves, I pray, and be at peace.

York. Let this dissension first be tried by fight,
And then your highness shall command a peace.

Som. The quarrel toucheth none but us alone;
Betwixt ourselves let us decide it then.

York. There is my pledge; accept it, Somerset.

Ver. Nay, let it rest where it began at first.

Bas. Confirm it so, mine honourable lord.

Glo. Confirm it so? Confounded be your strife!
And perish ye, with your audacious prate!
Presumptuous vassals! are you not asham'd,

With this immodest clamorous outrage
To trouble and disturb the king and us?
And you, my lords,—methinks you do not well,
To bear with their perverse objections;
Much less to take occasion from their mouths
To raise a mutiny betwixt yourselves;
Let me persuade you, take a better course.

Exe. It grieves his highness:—Good my lords, be friends.

K. Hen. Come hither, you that would be combatants:
Henceforth, I charge you, as you love our favour,
Quite to forget this quarrel, and the cause.
And you, my lords, remember where we are;
In France, amongst a fickle wavering nation:
If they perceive dissension in our looks,
And that within ourselves we disagree,
How will their grudging stomachs be provok'd
To wilful disobedience, and rebel?
Beside, what infamy will there arise,
When foreign princes shall be certified
That for a toy, a thing of no regard,
King Henry's peers and chief nobility
Destroy'd themselves, and lost the realm of France!
O, think upon the conquest of my father,
My tender years; and let us not forego
That for a trifle that was bought with blood!
Let me be umpire in this doubtful strife.

I see no reason, if I wear this rose, [Putting on a red rose.

That any one should therefore be suspicious
I more incline to Somerset than York:

Both are my kinsmen, and I love them both:

As well they may upbraid me with my crown,

Because, forsooth, the king of Scots is crown'd.

But your discretions better can persuade

Than I am able to instruct or teach:

And therefore, as we hither came in peace,

So let us still continue peace and love.

Cousin of York, we institute your grace

To be our regent in these parts of France:

And good my lord of Somerset, unite

Your troops of horsemen with his bands of foot;

And, like true subjects, sons of your progenitors,

Go cheerfully together, and digest

Your angry choler on your enemies.

Ourselves, my lord protector, and the rest,

After some respite, will return to Calais;

From thence to England, where I hope ere long

To be presented, by your victories,

With Charles, Alençon, and that traitorous rout.

[Flourish. Exeunt KING HENRY, GLO., SOM.,
WIN., SUF., and BASSET.

War. My lord of York, I promise you, the king
Prettily, methought, did play the orator.

York. And so he did; but yet I like it not,

In that he wears the badge of Somerset.

War. Tush! that was but his fancy, blame him not;

I dare presume, sweet prince, he thought no harm.

York. And, if I wist he did,—But let it rest;

Other affairs must now be managed.

[Exeunt YORK, WARWICK, and VERNON.

Exe. Well didst thou, Richard, to suppress thy voice:

For had the passions of thy heart burst out,

I fear we should have seen decipher'd there

More rancorous spite, more furious raging broils,

Than yet can be imagin'd or suppos'd.

But howsoe'er, no simple man that sees

This jarring discord of nobility,

This shouldering of each other in the court,

This factious bandying of their favourites,

But that it doth presage some ill event.

'Tis much, when sceptres are in children's hands:

But more, when envy breeds unkind division;

There comes the ruin, there begins confusion.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—France. Before Bourdeaux.Enter TALBOT with his Forces.

Tal. Go to the gates of Bourdeaux, trumpeter :
Summon their general unto the wall.

Trumpet sounds a parley. Enter, on the walls, the General of the French Forces, and others.

English John Talbot, captains, calls you forth,
Servant in arms to Harry king of England ;
And thus he would,—Open your city gates ;
Be humble to us ; call my sovereign yours,
And do him homage as obedient subjects ;
And I'll withdraw me and my bloody power :
But, if you frown upon this proffer'd peace,
You tempt the fury of my three attendants,
Lean famine, quartering steel, and climbing fire ;
Who, in a moment, even with the earth
Shall lay your stately and air-braving towers,
If you forsake the offer of our<sup>1</sup> love.

Gen. Thou ominous and fearful owl of death,
Our nation's terror, and their bloody scourge !
The period of thy tyranny approacheth.
On us thou canst not enter, but by death :
For, I protest, we are well fortified,
And strong enough to issue out and fight :
If thou retire, the Dauphin, well appointed,
Stands with the snares of war to tangle thee :
On either hand thee there are squadrons pitch'd,
To wall thee from the liberty of flight ;
And no way canst thou turn thee for redress,
But death doth front thee with apparent spoil,
And pale destruction meets thee in the face.
Ten thousand French have ta'en the sacrament,
To rive their dangerous artillery
Upon no Christian soul but English Talbot.
Lo ! there thou stand'st, a breathing valiant man,
Of an invincible unconquer'd spirit :
This is the latest glory of thy praise,
That I, thy enemy, due<sup>2</sup> thee withal ;
For ere the glass that now begins to run
Finish the process of his sandy hour,
These eyes, that see thee now well coloured,
Shall see thee wither'd, bloody, pale, and dead.

[Drum afar off.]

Hark ! hark ! the Dauphin's drum, a warning bell,
Sings heavy music to thy timorous soul,
And mine shall ring thy dire departure out.

[Excunt General, &c., from the walls.]

Tal. He fables not, I hear the enemy ;—
Out, some light horsemen, and peruse their wings.—
O, negligent and heedless discipline !
How are we park'd, and bounded in a pale ;
A little herd of England's timorous deer,
Maz'd with a yelping kennel of French curs !
If we be English deer, be then in blood :<sup>3</sup>
Not rascal-like,<sup>4</sup> to fall down with a pinch ;
But rather moody-mad and desperate stags,
Turn on the bloody hounds with heads of steel,
And make the cowards stand aloof at bay :
Sell every man his life as dear as mine,
And they shall find dear deer of us, my friends.
God, and Saint George ! Talbot, and England's right !
Prosper our colours in this dangerous fight ! [Excunt.]

SCENE III.—Plains in Gascony.Enter YORK, with Forces; to him a Messenger.

York. Are not the speedy scouts return'd again,
That dogg'd the mighty army of the Dauphin ?

Mess. They are return'd, my lord : and give it out
That he's march'd to Bourdeaux with his power,
To fight with Talbot : As he march'd along,
By your espials were discovered
Two mightier troops than that the Dauphin led ;
Which join'd with him, and made their march for Bourdeaux.

York. A plague upon that villain Somerset,
That thus delays my promised supply
Of horsemen, that were levied for this siege !
Renowned Talbot doth expect my aid ;
And I am lowted<sup>5</sup> by a traitor villain,
And cannot help the noble chevalier :
God comfort him in this necessity !
If he miscarry, farewell wars in France.

Enter SIR WILLIAM LUCY.

Lucy. Thou princely leader of our English strength,
Never so needful on the earth of France,
Spur to the rescue of the noble Talbot ;
Who now is girdled with a waist of iron,
And hemm'd about with grim destruction :
To Bourdeaux, warlike duke ! to Bourdeaux, York !
Else, farewell Talbot, France, and England's honour.

York. O God ! that Somerset, who in proud heart
Doth stop my cornets, were in Talbot's place !
So should we save a valiant gentleman,
By forfeiting a traitor and a coward.
Mad ire, and wrathful fury, makes me weep,
That thus we die, while remiss traitors sleep.

Lucy. O, send some succour to the distress'd lord !

York. He dies, we lose ; I break my warlike word :
We mourn, France smiles ; we lose, they daily get ;
All 'long of this vile traitor Somerset.

Lucy. Then, God take mercy on brave Talbot's soul !
And on his son, young John ; whom, two hours since,
I met in travel toward his warlike father !
This seven years did not Talbot see his son ;
And now they meet where both their lives are done.

York. Alas ! what joy shall noble Talbot have,
To bid his young son welcome to his grave ?
Away ! vexation almost stops my breath,
That sunder'd friends greet in the hour of death.
Lucy, farewell : no more my fortune can,
But curse the cause I cannot aid the man.
Maine, Blois, Poitiers, and Tours, are won away,
'Long all of Somerset, and his delay. [Exit.]

Lucy. Thus while the vulture of sedition
Feeds in the bosom of such great commanders,
Sleeping neglect doth betray to loss
The conquest of our scarce-cold conqueror,
That ever-living man of memory,
Henry the Fifth :—Whiles they each other cross,
Lives, honours, lands, and all, hurry to loss. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—Other Plains of Gascony.Enter SOMERSET, with his Forces; an Officer of TALBOT'S with him.

Som. It is too late ; I cannot send them now :
This expedition was by York and Talbot

<sup>4</sup> Rascal-like. Rascal was also a term of wood-craft for a lean deer.

Lowted. Malone explains this, I am treated with contempt like a lowt.

Too rashly plotted ; all our general force
Might with a sally of the very town
Be buckled with : the over-daring Talbot
Hath sullied all his gloss of former honour,
By this unheedful, desperate, wild adventure :
York set him on to fight, and die in shame,
That, Talbot dead, great York might bear the name.

Off. Here is sir William Lucy, who with me
Set from our o'ermatch'd forces forth for aid.

Enter SIR WILLIAM LUCY.

Som. How now ? sir William, whither were you sent ?

Lucy. Whither, my lord ? from bought and sold lord
Talbot ;

Who, ring'd about with bold adversity,
Cries out for noble York and Somerset,
To beat assailing death from his weak legions.
And whiles the honourable captain there
Drops bloody sweat from his war-wearied limbs,
And, in advantage ling'ring, looks for rescue,
You, his false hopes, the trust of England's honour,
Keep off aloof with worthless emulation.

Let not your private discord keep away
The levied succours that should lend him aid,
While he, renowned noble gentleman,
Yields up his life unto a world of odds :

Orleans the Bastard, Charles, Burgundy,
Alençon, Reignier, compass him about,
And Talbot perisheth by your default.

Som. York set him on, York should have sent him aid.

Lucy. And York as fast upon your grace exclaims ;
Swearing that you withhold his levied horse,<sup>1</sup>
Collected for this expedition.

Som. York lies ; he might have sent and had the horse ;
I owe him little duty and less love ;
And take foul scorn to fawn on him by sending.

Lucy. The fraud of England, not the force of France,
Hath now entrapp'd the noble-minded Talbot :
Never to England shall he bear his life ;
But dies, betray'd to fortune by your strife.

Som. Come go ; I will despatch the horsemen straight :
Within six hours they will be at his aid.

Lucy. Too late comes rescue ; he is ta'en or slain :
For fly he could not, if he would have fled ;
And fly would Talbot never, though he might.

Som. If he be dead, brave Talbot then adieu !

Lucy. His fame lives in the world, his shame in you.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—The English Camp near Bourdeaux.

Enter TALBOT and JOHN his Son.

Tal. O young John Talbot ! I did send for thee,
To tutor thee in stratagems of war ;
That Talbot's name might be in thee reviv'd,
When sapless age, and weak unable limbs,
Should bring thy father to his drooping chair.
But,—O malignant and ill-boding stars !—
Now thou art come unto a feast of death,
A terrible and unavoyed danger :
Therefore, dear boy, mount on my swiftest horse ;
And I'll direct thee how thou shalt escape
By sudden flight : come, dally not, begone.

John. Is my name Talbot ? and am I your son ?
And shall I fly ? O, if you love my mother,
Dishonour not her honourable name,

To make a bastard, and a slave of me :
The world will say,—He is not Talbot's blood,
That basely fled, when noble Talbot stood.

Tal. Fly, to revenge my death, if I be slain.

John. He that flies so, will ne'er return again.

Tal. If we both stay we both are sure to die.

John. Then let me stay ; and, father, do you fly :
Your loss is great, so your regard should be ;
My worth unknown, no loss is known in me.
Upon my death the French can little boast ;
In yours they will, in you all hopes are lost.
Flight cannot stain the honour you have won ;
But mine it will, that no exploit have done :
You fled for vantage, every one will swear ;
But, if I bow, they'll say it was for fear.
There is no hope that ever I will stay,
If the first hour I shrink and run away.
Here, on my knee, I beg mortality,
Rather than life preserv'd with infamy.

Tal. Shall all thy mother's hopes lie in one tomb ?

John. Ay, rather than I'll shame my mother's womb.

Tal. Upon my blessing I command thee go.

John. To fight I will, but not to fly the foe.

Tal. Part of thy father may be sav'd in thee.

John. No part of him but will be shame in me.

Tal. Thou never hadst renown, nor canst not lose it.

John. Yes, your renowned name : Shall flight abuse it ?

Tal. Thy father's charge shall clear thee from that stain.

John. You cannot witness for me, being slain.

If death be so apparent, then both fly.

Tal. And leave my followers here, to fight and die ?
My age was never tainted with such shame.

John. And shall my youth be guilty of such blame ?
No more can I be sever'd from your side,
Than can yourself yourself in twain divide :
Stay, go, do what you will, the like do I ;
For live I will not if my father die.

Tal. Then here I take my leave of thee, fair son,
Born to eclipse thy life this afternoon.
Come, side by side together live and die ;
And soul with soul from France to heaven fly. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—A Field of Battle.

Alarum : Excursions, whercin TALBOT'S Son is hemmed about, and TALBOT rescues him.

Tal. Saint George and victory ! fight, soldiers, fight :
The regent hath with Talbot broke his word,
And left us to the rage of France his sword.
Where is John Talbot ?—pause, and take thy breath ;
I gave thee life, and rescued thee from death.

John. O twice my father ! twice am I thy son :
The life thou gav'st me first was lost and done ;
Till with thy warlike sword, despite of fate,
To my determin'd time thou gav'st new date.

Tal. When from the Dauphin's crest thy sword struck fire,
It warm'd thy father's heart with proud desire
Of bold-fac'd victory. Then leaden age,
Quicken'd with youthful spleen and warlike rage,
Beat down Alençon, Orleans, Burgundy,
And from the pride of Gallia rescued thee.
The ireful bastard Orleans—that drew blood
From thee, my boy ; and had the maidenhood
Of thy first fight—I soon encountered ;
And, interchanging blows, I quickly shed
Some of his bastard blood ; and, in disgrace,
Bespoke him thus : " Contaminated, base,
And misbegotten blood I spill of thine,
Mean and right poor ; for that pure blood of mine,
Which thou didst force from Talbot, my brave boy :"—

<sup>1</sup> Horse. The original reads hoast. The correct'on was Hanmer's, and is fully borne out by what follows.

Here, purposing the Bastard to destroy,
 Came in strong rescue. Speak, thy father's care;
 Art thou not weary, John? How didst thou fare?
 Wilt thou yet leave the battle, boy, and fly,
 Now thou art seal'd the son of chivalry?
 Fly, to revenge my death, when I am dead;
 The help of one stands me in little stead.
 O, too much folly is it, well I wot,
 To hazard all our lives in one small boat.
 If I to-day die not with Frenchmen's rage,
 To-morrow I shall die with mickle age:
 By me they nothing gain an if I stay,
 'Tis but the short'ning of my life one day:
 In thee thy mother dies, our household's name,
 My death's revenge, thy youth, and England's fame:
 All these, and more, we hazard by thy stay;
 All these are sav'd if thou wilt fly away.

John. The sword of Orleans hath not made me smart;
 These words of yours draw life-blood from my heart;
 On that advantage, bought with such a shame,
 (To save a paltry life, and slay bright fame,)
 Before young Talbot from old Talbot fly,
 The coward horse that bears me fall and die:
 And like me to the peasant boys of France;
 To be shame's scorn and subject of mischance.
 Surely, by all the glory you have won,
 An if I fly I am not Talbot's son:
 Then talk no more of flight, it is no boot;
 If son to Talbot, die at Talbot's foot.

Tal. Then follow thou thy desperate sire of Crete,
 Thou Icarus; thy life to me is sweet:
 If thou wilt fight, fight by thy father's side;
 And, commendable prov'd, let's die in pride. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.—Another part of the same.

Alarum: Excursions. Enter TALBOT wounded, supported by a Servant.

Tal. Where is my other life?—mine own is gone;—
 O, where's young Talbot? where is valiant John Triumphant death, smear'd with captivity,
 Young Talbot's valour makes me smile at thee.
 When he perceiv'd me shrink, and on my knee,
 His bloody sword he brandish'd over me,
 And, like a hungry lion, did commence
 Rough deeds of rage and stern impatience;
 But when my angry guardant stood alone,
 Tend'ring my ruin, and assail'd of none,
 Dizzy-eyed fury, and great rage of heart,
 Suddenly made him from my side to start
 Into the clust'ring battle of the French:
 And in that sea of blood my boy did drench
 His over-mounting spirit; and there died
 My Icarus, my blossom, in his pride.

Enter Soldiers, bearing the body of JOHN TALBOT.

Serv. O my dear lord! lo, where your son is borne!

Tal. Thou antic death, which laugh'st us here to scorn,
 Anon, from thy insulting tyranny,
 Coupled in bonds of perpetuity,
 Two Talbots, winged through the lither sky,
 In thy despite shall 'scape mortality.
 O thou whose wounds become hard-favour'd death,
 Speak to thy father, ere thou yield thy breath:
 Brave death by speaking, whether he will or no;
 Imagine him a Frenchman, and thy foe.
 Poor boy! he smiles, methinks; as who should say,

Had death been French, then death had died to-day.
 Come, come, and lay him in his father's arms;
 My spirit can no longer bear these harms.
 Soldiers, adieu! I have what I would have,
 Now my old arms are young John Talbot's grave. [Dies.]

Alarums. Exeunt Soldiers and Servant, leaving the two bodies. Enter CHARLES, ALENCON, BURGUNDY, Bastard, LA PUCELLE, and Forces.

Char. Had York and Somerset brought rescue in,
 We should have found a bloody day of this.

Bast. How the young whelp of Talbot's, raging wood,<sup>1</sup>
 Did flesh his puny sword in Frenchmen's blood!

Puc. Once I encounter'd him, and thus I said,
 "Thou maiden youth, be vanquish'd by a maid:"
 But, with a proud, majestic high scorn,
 He answer'd thus: "Young Talbot was not born
 To be the pillage of a giglot wench;"
 So, rushing in the bowels of the French,
 He left me proudly, as unworthy fight.

Bur. Doubtless he would have made a noble knight:
 See, where he lies inhersed in the arms
 Of the most bloody nurser of his harms.

Bast. Hew them to pieces, hack their bones asunder;
 Whose life was England's glory, Gallia's wonder.

Char. O, no; forbear: for that which we have fled
 During the life, let us not wrong it dead.

Enter SIR WILLIAM LUCY, attended; a French Herald preceding.

Lucy. Herald, conduct me to the Dauphin's tent;
 To know who hath obtain'd the glory of the day.

Char. On what submissive message art thou sent?

Lucy. Submission, Dauphin? 'tis a mere French word;
 We English warriors wot not what it means.
 I come to know what prisoners thou hast ta'en,
 And to survey the bodies of the dead.

Char. For prisoners ask'st thou? hell our prison is.
 But tell me whom thou seek'st.

Lucy. But where's<sup>2</sup> the great Alcides of the field,
 Valiant lord Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury?
 Created, for his rare success in arms,
 Great earl of Washford, Waterford, and Valence;
 Lord Talbot of Goodrig and Urchinfield,
 Lord Strange of Blackmere, lord Verdun of Alton,
 Lord Cromwell of Wingfield, lord Furnival of Sheffield,
 The thrice-victorious lord of Falconbridge;
 Knight of the noble order of Saint George,
 Worthy Saint Michael, and the Golden Fleece;
 Great marshal to Henry the Sixth,
 Of all his wars within the realm of France?

Puc. Here is a silly stately style indeed!
 The Turk, that two and fifty kingdoms hath,
 Writes not so tedious a style as this.

Him, that thou magnifiest with all these titles,
 Stinking, and fly-blown, lies here at our feet.

Lucy. Is Talbot slain? the Frenchmen's only scourge,
 Your kingdom's terror and black Nemesis?

O, were mine eyeballs into bullets turn'd,
 That I, in rage, might shoot them at your faces!
 O, that I could but call these dead to life!

It were enough to fright the realm of France:

Were but his picture left among you here,

It would amaze the proudest of you all.

Give me their bodies; that I may bear them hence,

And give them burial as beseems their worth.

appears to us that Lucy utters an exclamation of surprise when he does not see Talbot, supposing him to be prisoner.

Puc. I think this upstart is old Talbot's ghost,
He speaks with such a proud commanding spirit.
For God's sake let him have 'em; to keep them here,
They would but stink and putrefy the air.

Char. Go, take their bodies hence.

Lucy. I'll bear them hence :
But from their ashes shall be rear'd
A phoenix that shall make all France afeard.

Char. So we be rid of them do with 'em what thou wilt.
And now to Paris, in this conquering vein ;
All will be ours, now bloody Talbot's slain. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—London. A Room in the Palace.Enter KING HENRY, GLOSTER, and EXETER.

K. Hen. Have you perus'd the letters from the pope,
The emperor, and the earl of Armagnac?

Glo. I have, my lord; and their intent is this,—
They humbly sue unto your excellence,
To have a godly peace concluded of,
Between the realms of England and of France.

K. Hen. How doth your grace affect their motion?

Glo. Well, my good lord; and as the only means
To stop effusion of our Christian blood,
And 'stablish quietness on every side.

K. Hen. Ay, marry, uncle; for I always thought
It was both impious and unnatural,
That such immanity<sup>1</sup> and bloody strife
Should reign among professors of one faith.

Glo. Beside, my lord,—the sooner to effect,
And surer bind, this knot of amity,—
The earl of Armagnac—near knit to Charles,
A man of great authority in France,— Proffers his only daughter to your grace
In marriage, with a large and sumptuous dowry.

K. Hen. Marriage, uncle! alas! my years are young;
And fitter is my study and my books
Than wanton dalliance with a paramour.
Yet, call the ambassadors; and, as you please,
So let them have their answers every one:
I shall be well content with any choice
Tends to God's glory and my country's weal.

Enter a Legate, and two Ambassadors, with WINCHESTER,
in a Cardinal's habit.

Exe. What! is my lord of Winchester install'd,
And call'd unto a cardinal's degree?
Then, I perceive that will be verified,
Henry the Fifth did sometime prophesy,—
"If once he come to be a cardinal,
He'll make his çap co-equal with the crown."

K. Hen. My lords ambassadors, your several suits
Have been consider'd and debated on.
Your purpose is both good and reasonable:
And, therefore, are we certainly resolv'd
To draw conditions of a friendly peace;
Which, by my lord of Winchester, we mean
Shall be transported presently to France.

Glo. And for the proffer of my lord your master,—

Immanity—barbarity.

<sup>2</sup> Periapts—amulets, charms. Cotgrave explains the words, "medicines hanged about any part of the body."

I have inform'd his highness so at large,
As—liking of the lady's virtuous gifts,
Her beauty, and the value of her dower,—
He doth intend she shall be England's queen.

K. Hen. In argument and proof of which contract,
Bear her this jewel, [to the Amb.] pledge of my affection.
And so, my lord protector, see them guarded,
And safely brought to Dover; where, inshipp'd,
Commit them to the fortune of the sea.

[Exeunt KING HENRY and Train; GLOSTER,
EXETER, and Ambassadors.]

Win. Stay, my lord legate; you shall first receive
The sum of money, which I promised
Should be deliver'd to his holiness
For clothing me in these grave ornaments.

Leg. I will attend upon your lordship's leisure.

Win. Now, Winchester will not submit, I trow,
Or be inferior to the proudest peer.
Humphrey of Gloster, thou shalt well perceive,
That, neither in birth, or for authority,
The bishop will be overborne by thee:
I'll either make thee stoop and bend thy knee,
Or sack this country with a mutiny. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—France. Plains in Anjou.Enter CHARLES, BURGUNDY, ALENÇON, LA PUCELLE, and
Forces, marching.

Char. These news, my lords, may cheer our drooping spirits:

'Tis said the stout Parisians do revolt,
And turn again unto the warlike French.

Alen. Then march to Paris, royal Charles of France,
And keep not back your powers in dalliance.

Puc. Peace be amongst them if they turn to us;
Else, ruin combat with their palaces!

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Success unto our valiant general,
And happiness to his accomplices!

Char. What tidings send our scouts? I prithee, speak.

Mess. The English army, that divided was Into two parties, is now conjoin'd in one;
And means to give you battle presently.

Char. Somewhat too sudden, sirs, the warning is;
But we will presently provide for them.

Bur. I trust the ghost of Talbot is not there;
Now he is gone, my lord, you need not fear.

Puc. Of all base passions, fear is most accurs'd:—
Command the conquest, Charles, it shall be thine;
Let Henry fret, and all the world repine.

Char. Then on, my lords; and France be fortunate!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The same. Before Angiers.Alarums Excursions. Enter LA PUCELLE.

Puc. The regent conquers, and the Frenchmen fly.
Now help, ye charming spells, and periapts;<sup>2</sup>
And ye choice spirits that admonish me,
And give me signs of future accidents! [Thunder.]
You speedy helpers, that are substitutes
Under the lordly monarch of the north,<sup>3</sup>
Appear, and aid me in this enterprise!

<sup>3</sup> "The monarch of the North," says Douce, "was Zimimar, one of the four principal devils invoked by witches. The others were, Amaimon king of the East, Gorson king of the South, and Goap, king of the West. Under these devil kings were devil marquesses, dukes, prelates, knights, presidents, and earls."

Enter Fiends.

This speedy and quick appearance argues proof
Of your accustom'd diligence to me.
Now, ye familiar spirits, that are cull'd
Out of the powerful legions under earth,<sup>1</sup>
Help me this once, that France may get the field.

[They walk about and speak not.

O, hold me not with silence over-long!
Where I was wont to feed you with my blood,
I'll lop a member off, and give it you,
In earnest of a further benefit;
So you do condescend to help me now.—

[They hang their heads.

No hope to have redress?—My body shall Pay recompense, if you will grant my suit.

[They shake their heads.

Cannot my body, nor blood-sacrifice,
Entreat you to your wonted furtherance?
Then take my soul; my body, soul, and all,
Before that England give the French the foil. [They depart.
See! they forsake me. Now the time is come
That France must vail her lofty-plumed crest,
And let her head fall into England's lap.
My ancient incantations are too weak,
And hell too strong for me to buckle with:
Now, France, thy glory droopeth to the dust. [Exit.

*Alarums. Enter French and English, fighting. LA
PUCELLE<sup>2</sup> and YORK fight hand to hand. LA PUCELLE is taken. The French fly.*

York. Damsel of France, I think I have you fast:
Unchain your spirits now with spelling charms,
And try if they can gain your liberty.
A goodly prize, fit for the devil's grace!
See, how the ugly witch doth bend her brows,
As if, with Circe, she would change my shape.

Puc. Chang'd to a worser shape thou canst not be.

York. O, Charles the Dauphin is a proper man;

No shape but his can please your dainty eye.
Puc. A plaguing mischief light on Charles, and thee!
And may ye both be suddenly surpris'd
By bloody hands, in sleeping on your beds!

York. Fell, banning hag! enchantress, hold thy tongue.

Puc. I prithee, give me leave to curse awhile.

York. Curse, miscreant, when thou comest to the stake.

[Exeunt.

Alarums. Enter SUFFOLK, leading in LADY MARGARET.

Suf. Be what thou wilt, thou art my prisoner.
[Gazes on her.

O fairest beauty, do not fear, nor fly;
For I will touch thee but with reverent hands.<sup>3</sup>
I kiss these fingers [kissing her hand] for eternal peace,
And lay them gently on thy tender side.
Who art thou? say, that I may honour thee.

Mar. Margaret my name, and daughter to a king,
The king of Naples; whoso'er thou art.

Suf. An earl I am, and Suffolk am I call'd.

Be not offended, nature's miracle,
Thou art allotted to be ta'en by me:
So doth the swan her downy cygnets save,
Keeping them prisoner underneath her wings.
Yet if this servile usage once offend,
Go, and be free again, as Suffolk's friend.

[She turns away as going.

O, stay!—I have no power to let her pass;
My hand would free her, but my heart says—no.
As plays the sun upon the glassy streams,
Twinkling another counterfeited beam,
So seems this gorgeous beauty to mine eyes.
Fain would I woo her, yet I dare not speak:
I'll call for pen and ink, and write my mind:
Fie, De la Poole! disable not thyself;
Hast not a tongue? is she not here thy prisoner?
Wilt thou be daunted at a woman's sight?
Ay; beauty's princely majesty is such,
Confounds the tongue, and makes the senses rough.<sup>4</sup>

Mar. Say, earl of Suffolk, if thy name be so,
What ransom must I pay before I pass?
For I perceive I am thy prisoner.

Suf. How canst thou tell, she will deny thy suit,
Before thou make a trial of her love? [Aside.

Mar. Why speak'st thou not? what ransom must I pay?

Suf. She's beautiful; and therefore to be woo'd:
She is a woman; therefore to be won. [Aside.

Mar. Wilt thou accept of ransom, yea, or no?

Suf. Fond man! remember that thou hast a wife;
Then how can Margaret be thy paramour? [Aside.

Mar. I were best to leave him, for he will not hear.

Suf. There all is marr'd; there lies a cooling card.

Mar. He talks at random; sure, the man is mad.

Suf. And yet a dispensation may be had.

Mar. And yet I would that you would answer me.

Suf. I'll win this lady Margaret. For whom?
Why, for my king: Tush! that's a wooden thing.

Mar. He talks of wood: it is some carpenter.

Suf. Yet so my fancy<sup>5</sup> may be satisfied,
And peace established between these realms.

But there remains a scruple in that too:
For though her father be the king of Naples,
Duke of Anjou and Maine, yet is he poor,
And our nobility will scorn the match. [Aside.

Mar. Hear ye, captain? Are you not at leisure?

Suf. It shall be so, disdain they ne'er so much:
Henry is youthful, and will quickly yield.
Madam, I have a secret to reveal.

Mar. What though I be enthrall'd? he seems a knight,
And will not any way dishonour me. [Aside.

Suf. Lady, vouchsafe to listen what I say.

Mar. Perhaps I shall be rescued by the French;
And then I need not crave his courtesy. [Aside.

Suf. Sweet madam, give me hearing in a cause—

Mar. Tush! women have been captivate ere now.

[Aside.

Suf. Lady, wherefore talk you so?

Mar. I cry you mercy, 'tis but quid pro quo.

Suf. Say, gentle princess, would you not suppose
Your bondage happy, to be made a queen?

Mar. To be a queen in bondage is more vile
Than is a slave in base servility;
For princes should be free.

<sup>3</sup> We print these lines as they stand in the original. Some modern editors, however, give them thus:—

"For I will touch thee but with reverent hands,
And lay them gently on thy tender side.
I kiss these fingers for eternal peace."

Malone says that by the original reading "Suffolk is made to kiss his own fingers, a symbol of peace of which there is, I believe, no example." We do not see this. Suffolk says—

"Do not fear, nor fly;
For I will touch thee but with reverent hands."

He then adds, kissing the lady's fingers,—

"I kiss these fingers for eternal peace,
And lay them gently on thy tender side," accompanying the words by a corresponding action. He takes the lady's hand, but, instead of seizing it as the hand of a prisoner, he replaces it, having kissed it, on her tender side.

Suf. And so shall you,
If happy England's royal king be free.

Mar. Why, what concerns his freedom unto me?

Suf. I'll undertake to make thee Henry's queen;
To put a golden sceptre in thy hand,
And set a precious crown upon thy head,
If thou wilt condescend to be my—

Mar. What?

Suf. His love.

Mar. I am unworthy to be Henry's wife.

Suf. No, gentle madam; I unworthy am
To woo so fair a dame to be his wife,
And have no portion in the choice myself.
How say you, madam; are you so content?

Mar. An if my father please, I am content.

Suf. Then call our captains, and our colours, forth:
And, madam, at your father's castle walls
We'll crave a parley, to confer with him.

[Troops come forward.]

A parley sounded. Enter REIGNIER, on the walls.

Suf. See, Reignier, see, thy daughter prisoner.

Reig. To whom?

Suf. To me.

Reig. Suffolk, what remedy?

I am a soldier; and unapt to weep,
Or to exclaim on fortune's fickleness.

Suf. Yes, there is remedy enough, my lord:
Consent, (and for thy honour, give consent,)
Thy daughter shall be wedded to my king;
Whom I with pain have woo'd and won thereto;
And this her easy-held imprisonment
Hath gain'd thy daughter princely liberty.

Reig. Speaks Suffolk as he thinks?

Suf. Fair Margaret knows
That Suffolk doth not flatter, face, or feign.

Reig. Upon thy princely warrant, I descend,
To give thee answer of thy just demand.

[Exit from the walls.]

Suf. And here I will expect thy coming.

Trumpets sounded. Enter REIGNIER, below.

Reig. Welcome, brave earl, into our territories;
Command in Anjou what your honour pleases.

Suf. Thanks, Reignier, happy for so sweet a child,
Fit to be made companion with a king:
What answer makes your grace unto my suit?

Reig. Since thou dost deign to woo her little worth,
To be the princely bride of such a lord;
Upon condition I may quietly
Enjoy mine own, the county Maine, and Anjou,
Free from oppression, or the stroke of war,
My daughter shall be Henry's, if he please.

Suf. That is her ransom, I deliver her;
And those two counties, I will undertake,
Your grace shall well and quietly enjoy.

Reig. And I again, in Henry's royal name,
As deputy unto that gracious king,
Give thee her hand, for sign of plighted faith.

Suf. Reignier, of France, I give thee kingly thanks,
Because this is in traffic of a king:
And yet, methinks, I could be well content
To be mine own attorney in this case. [Aside.]
I'll over then to England with this news,
And make this marriage to be solemniz'd;

So, farewell, Reignier, set this diamond safe
In golden palaces, as it becomes.

Reig. I do embrace thee, as I would embrace
The Christian prince, king Henry, were he here.

Mar. Farewell, my lord! Good wishes, praise, and prayers,

Shall Suffolk ever have of Margaret. [Going.]

Suf. Farewell, sweet madam! But hark you, Margaret,
No princely commendations to my king?

Mar. Such commendations as become a maid,
A virgin, and his servant, say to him.

Suf. Words sweetly plac'd, and modestly directed.
But, madam, I must trouble you again,—
No loving token to his majesty?

Mar. Yes, my good lord; a pure unspotted heart,
Never yet taint with love, I send the king.

Suf. And this withal. [Kisses her.]

Mar. That for thyself; I will not so presume,
To send such peevish tokens to a king.

[Exeunt REIGNIER and MARGARET.]

Suf. O, wert thou for myself!—But, Suffolk, stay;
Thou may'st not wander in that labyrinth;
There Minotaurs, and ugly treasons, lurk.
Solicit Henry with her wond'rous praise:
Bethink thee on her virtues that surmount;
And<sup>1</sup> natural graces that extinguish art;
Repeat their semblance often on the seas,
That, when thou com'st to kneel at Henry's feet,
Thou may'st bereave him of his wits with wonder. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—Camp of the Duke of York, in Anjou.

Enter YORK, WARWICK, and others.

York. Bring forth that sorceress, condemn'd to burn.

Enter LA PUCELLE, guarded, and a Shepherd.

Shep. Ah, Joan! this kills thy father's heart outright!
Have I sought every country far and near,
And, now it is my chance to find thee out,
Must I behold thy timeless cruel death?

Ah, Joan, sweet daughter Joan, I'll die with thee!

Puc. Decrepit miser!<sup>2</sup> base ignoble wretch!
I am descended of a gentler blood;
Thou art no father, nor no friend of mine.

Shep. Out, out!—My lords, an please you, 'tis not so;
I did beget her all the parish knows:
Her mother liveth yet, can testify
She was the first fruit of my bachelorship.

War. Graceless! wilt thou deny thy parentage?

York. This argues what her kind of life hath been;
Wicked and vile; and so her death concludes.

Shep. Fie, Joan! that thou wilt be so obstacle!<sup>3</sup>
God knows thou art a collop of my flesh;
And for thy sake have I shed many a tear:
Deny me not, I prithee, gentle Joan.

Puc. Peasant, avaunt!—You have suborn'd this man,
Of purpose to obscure my noble birth.

Shep. 'Tis true, I gave a noble to the priest,
The morn that I was wedded to her mother.
Kneel down and take my blessing, good my girl.
Wilt thou not stoop? Now cursed be the time
Of thy nativity! I would, the milk
Thy mother gave thee, when thou suck'dst her breast,
Had been a little ratsbane for thy sake!
Or else, when thou didst keep my lambs a-field,

<sup>1</sup> And. The original has Mad, which Steevens thought was used in the sense of wild. Monck Mason made the correction to And.

<sup>2</sup> Miser—wretch, miserable creature.

<sup>3</sup> Obstacle—obstinate. In Chapman's "May-Day" we have—

"An obstacle young thing it is."

I wish some ravenous wolf had eaten thee!

Dost thou deny thy father, cursed drab?

O, burn her, burn her; hanging is too good. [Exit.]

York. Take her away; for she hath liv'd too long,
To fill the world with vicious qualities.

Puc. First, let me tell you whom you have condemn'd:
Not me begotten of a shepherd swain,
But issued from the progeny of kings;
Virtuous, and holy; chosen from above,
By inspiration of celestial grace,
To work exceeding miracles on earth.

I never had to do with wicked spirits:
But you,—that are polluted with your lusts,
Stain'd with the guiltless blood of innocents,
Corrupt and tainted with a thousand vices,—
Because you want the grace that others have,
You judge it straight a thing impossible
To compass wonders, but by help of devils.
No, misconceived! Joan of Arc hath been
A virgin from her tender infancy,
Chaste and immaculate in very thought;
Whose maiden blood, thus rigorously effus'd,
Will cry for vengeance at the gates of heaven.

York. Ay, ay;—away with her to execution.

War. And hark ye, sirs; because she is a maid,
Spare for no fagots, let there be enow;
Place barrels of pitch upon the fatal stake,
That so her torture may be shortened.

Puc. Will nothing turn your unrelenting hearts?
Then, Joan, discover thine infirmity;
That warranteth by law to be thy privilege.
I am with child, ye bloody homicides:
Murder not then the fruit within my womb,
Although ye hale me to a violent death.

York. Now heaven forefend! the holy maid with child?

War. The grèatest miracle that e'er ye wrought:
Is all your strict preciseness come to this?

York. She and the Dauphin have been juggling:
I did imagine what would be her refuge.

War. Well, go to; we will have no bastards live;
Especially since Charles must father it.

Puc. You are deceiv'd; my child is none of his;
It was Alençon that enjoy'd my love.

York. Alençon! that notorious Machiavel!
It dies, an if it had a thousand lives.

Puc. O, give me leave, I have deluded you;
'Twas neither Charles nor yet the duke I nam'd,
But Reignier, king of Naples, that prevail'd.

War. A married man! that's most intolerable.

York. Why, here's a girl! I think she knows not well,
There were so many, whom she may accuse.

War. It's sign she hath been liberal and free.

York. And yet, forsooth, she is a virgin pure.
'Strumpet, thy words condemn thy brat and thee:
Use no entreaty, for it is in vain.

Puc. Then lead me hence;—with whom I leave my curse:
May never glorious sun reflex his beams
Upon the country where you made abode!
But darkness and the gloomy shade of death
Environ you; till mischief, and despair,
Drive you to break your necks, or hang yourselves!

[Exit guarded.]

York. Break thou in pieces, and consume to ashes,
Thou foul accursed minister of hell!

Enter CARDINAL BEAUFORT, attended.

Car. Lord regent, I do greet your excellence
With letters of commission from the king.
For know, my lords, the states of Christendom,
Mov'd with remorse of these outrageous broils,

Have earnestly implor'd a general peace
Betwixt our nation and the aspiring French;
And here at hand the Dauphin, and his train,
Approacheth to confer about some matter.

York. Is all our travail turn'd to this effect?
After the slaughter of so many peers,
So many captains, gentlemen, and soldiers,
That in this quarrel have been overthrown,
And sold their bodies for their country's benefit,
Shall we at last conclude effeminate peace?
Have we not lost most part of all the towns,
By treason, falsehood, and by treachery,
Our great progenitors had conquered?
O, Warwick, Warwick! I foresee with grief
The utter loss of all the realm of France.

War. Be patient, York: if we conclude a peace,
It shall be with such strict and severe covenants
As little shall the Frenchmen gain thereby.

Enter CHARLES, attended; ALENÇON, Bastard, REIGNIER, and others.

Char. Since, lords of England, it is thus agreed
That peaceful truce shall be proclaim'd in France,
We come to be informed by yourselves
What the conditions of that league must be.

York. Speak, Winchester; for boiling choler chokes
The hollow passage of my prison'd<sup>1</sup> voice,
By sight of these our baleful enemies.

Win. Charles, and the rest, it is enacted thus:
That, in regard king Henry gives consent,
Of mere compassion and of lenity,
To ease your country of distressful war,
And suffer you to breathe in fruitful peace,
You shall become true liegemen to his crown:
And, Charles, upon condition thou wilt swear
To pay him tribute, and submit thyself,
Thou shalt be plac'd as viceroy under him,
And still enjoy thy regal dignity.

Alen. Must he be then as shadow of himself?
Adorn his temples with a coronet;
And yet, in substance and authority,
Retain but privilege of a private man?
This proffer is absurd and reasonless.

Char. 'Tis known already that I am possess'd
With more than half the Gallian territories,
And therein reverenc'd for their lawful king:
Shall I, for lucre of the rest unvanquish'd,
Detract so much from that prerogative,
As to be call'd but viceroy of the whole?
No, lord ambassador; I'll rather keep
That which I have, than, coveting for more,
Be cast from possibility of all.

York. Insulting Charles! hast thou by secret means
Used intercession to obtain a league;
And, now the matter grows to compromise,
Stand'st thou aloof upon comparison?
Either accept the title thou usurp'st,
Of benefit proceeding from our king,
And not of any challenge of desert,
Or we will plague thee with incessant wars.

Reig. My lord, you do not well in obstinacy
To cavil in the course of this contract:
If once it be neglected, ten to one,
We shall not find like opportunity.

Alen. To say the truth, it is your policy,
To save your subjects from such massacre,
And ruthless slaughters, as are daily seen
By our proceeding in hostility:

<sup>1</sup> Prison'd. The original has poison'd. Pope made the correction.

And therefore take this compact of a truce,
Although you break it when your pleasure serves.

[Aside to CHARLES.

War. How say'st thou, Charles? shall our condition stand?

Char. It shall:

Only reserv'd, you claim no interest
In any of our towns of garrison.

York. Then swear allegiance to his majesty;
As thou art knight, never to disobey,
Nor be rebellious to the crown of England,
Thou, nor thy nobles, to the crown of England.—

[CHARLES, and the rest, give tokens of fealty.

So, now dismiss your army when ye please;
Hang up your ensigns, let your drums be still,
For here we entertain a solemn peace.

[Exeunt.

SCENE V.—London. A Room in the Palace.

Enter KING HENRY, in conference with SUFFOLK; GLOSTER and EXETER following.

K. Hen. Your wondrous rare description, noble earl,
Of beauteous Margaret hath astonish'd me:
Her virtues, graced with external gifts,
Do breed love's settled passions in my heart:
And like as rigour of tempestuous gusts
Provokes the mightiest hulk against the tide,
So am I driven, by breath of her renown,
Either to suffer shipwreck, or arrive
Where I may have fruition of her love.

Suf. Tush! my good lord! this superficial tale
Is but a preface of her worthy praise:
The chief perfections of that lovely dame
(Had I sufficient skill to utter them)
Would make a volume of enticing lines,
Able to ravish any dull conceit.

And, which is more, she is not so divine,
So full replete with choice of all delights,
But, with as humble lowliness of mind,
She is content to be at your command;
Command, I mean, of virtuous chaste intents,
To love and honour Henry as her lord.

K. Hen. And otherwise will Henry ne'er presume.
Therefore, my lord protector, give consent
That Margaret may be England's royal queen.

Glo. So should I give consent to flatter sin.
You know, my lord, your highness is betroth'd
Unto another lady of esteem;
How shall we then dispense with that contract,
And not deface your honour with reproach?

Suf. As doth a ruler with unlawful oaths;
Or one that at a triumph having vow'd
To try his strength, forsaketh yet the lists
By reason of his adversary's odds:
A poor earl's daughter is unequal odds,
And therefore may be broke without offence.

Glo. Why, what, I pray, is Margaret more than that?
Her father is no better than an earl,
Although in glorious titles he excel.

Suf. Yes, my lord, her father is a king,
The king of Naples and Jerusalem;
And of such great authority in France
As his alliance will confirm our peace,
And keep the Frenchmen in allegiance.

Glo. And so the earl of Armagnac may do,
Because he is near kinsman unto Charles.

Exe. Beside, his wealth doth warrant a liberal dower,
Where Reignier sooner will receive than give.

Suf. A dower, my lords! disgrace not so your king,
That he should be so abject, base, and poor,
To choose for wealth, and not for perfect love
Henry is able to enrich his queen,
And not to seek a queen to make him rich:
So worthless peasants bargain for their wives,
As market-men for oxen, sheep, or horse.
Marriage is a matter of more worth
Than to be dealt in by attorneyship;
Not whom we will, but whom his grace affects,
Must be companion of his nuptial bed:
And therefore, lords, since he affects her most,
It most of all these reasons bindeth us,
In our opinions she should be preferr'd.
For what is wedlock forced but a hell,
An age of discord and continual strife?
Whereas the contrary bringeth forth bliss,
And is a pattern of celestial peace.

Whom should we match with Henry, being a king,
But Margaret, that is daughter to a king?
Her peerless feature, joined with her birth,
Approves her fit for none but for a king:
Her valiant courage, and undaunted spirit,
(More than in women commonly is seen,)
Will answer our hope in issue of a king;
For Henry, son unto a conqueror,
Is likely to beget more conquerors,
If with a lady of so high resolve
As is fair Margaret he be link'd in love.
Then yield, my lords; and here conclude with me,
That Margaret shall be queen, and none but she.

K. Hen. Whether it be through force of your report,
My noble lord of Suffolk; or for that
My tender youth was never yet attain'd
With any passion of inflaming love,
I cannot tell; but this I am assur'd,
I feel such sharp dissension in my breast,
Such fierce alarms both of hope and fear,
As I am sick with working of my thoughts.
Take, therefore, shipping; post, my lord, to France;
Agree to any covenants; and procure
That lady Margaret do vouchsafe to come
To cross the seas to England, and be crown'd
King Henry's faithful and anointed queen:
For your expenses and sufficient charge,
Among the people gather up a tenth.
Be gone, I say; for, till you do return,
I rest perplexed with a thousand cares.
And you, good uncle, banish all offence:
If you do censure<sup>1</sup> me by what you were,
Not what you are, I know it will excuse
This sudden execution of my will.

And so conduct me, where, from company,
I may revolve and ruminate my grief.

[Exit.

Glo. Ay, grief, I fear me, both at first and last.

[Exeunt GLOSTER and EXETER.

Suf. Thus Suffolk hath prevail'd: and thus he goes,
As did the youthful Paris once to Greece;
With hope to find the like event in love,
But prosper better than the Trojan did.
Margaret shall now be queen, and rule the king,
But I will rule both her, the king, and realm.

[Exit.

ILLUSTRATIONS TO KING HENRY VI.—PART I.

ACT I.

<sup>a</sup> SCENE I.—“Hung be the heavens with black.”

“THE covering, or internal roof, of the theatre was anciently termed the heavens.” Malone, in his “History of the Stage,” has collected some passages from old writers to prove this. The passage before us would warrant us in believing that upon the performance of tragedy the roof, or heavens, underwent some gloomy transformation. There is a similar allusion in Marston’s “Insatiate Countess.”—

The stage of heaven is hung with solemn black,
A time best fitting to act tragedies.”

Mr. Whiter (“Specimen of a Commentary,” &c.) has a long and very ingenious passage to prove that several of the poetical images of Shakspeare are derived from this association.

<sup>b</sup> SCENE II.—“*Now am I like that proud insulting ship,
Which Cæsar and his fortune bare at once.*”

The comparison was suggested by a passage in Plutarch’s “Life of Cæsar,” thus translated by North :—“Cæsar, hearing that, straight discovered himself unto the master of the pinnace, who at the first was amazed when he saw him ; but Cæsar, &c., said unto him, Good fellow, be of good cheer, &c., and fear not, for thou hast Cæsar and his fortune with thee.”

In Prideaux’s “Life of Mahomet” we read that the prophet of the Arabians had a dove, “which he used to feed with wheat out of his ear ; which dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet’s shoulder, and thrust its bill in to find its breakfast ; Mahomet persuading the rude and simple Arabians that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice.”

It appears that the tawny coat was the livery of an apparitor, and probably of ecclesiastical officers in general. Stow describes the Bishop of London as “attended on by a goodly company of gentlemen in tawny coats.”

HISTORICAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

ACT I.

It was a favourite theory with the commentators upon Shakspeare after the time of Dr. Farmer, that the acquired knowledge of the poet was of the most limited character. According to these critics, he was not only unable to read any language but his own, but his power even of reading in English books was limited in a degree that would indicate him to have been the most idle or the most incurious of mankind. Malone’s favourite opinion is, that Shakspeare consulted but one historical writer for the materials of his Histories. In a note upon the passage in the first act of Henry V. in which the King of France is erroneously called “King Louis the Tenth,” Malone says that Holinshed led Shakspeare into the mistake, and that Hall calls the king correctly Charles the Ninth ; and he adds, “Here, therefore, we have a decisive proof that our author’s guide in all his historical plays was Holinshed, and not Hall.” In a note upon the second act of the First Part of Henry VI., where an English soldier enters crying, “A Talbot ! a Talbot !” the same critic says, “I have quoted a passage from Hall’s Chronicle, which probably furnished the author of this play with this circumstance. It is not mentioned by Holinshed (Shakspeare’s historian), and is one of the numerous proofs that have convinced me that this play was not the production of our author.” Without entering into a discussion in this place as to the value of Malone’s argument that Shakspeare was not the author of the First Part of Henry VI. because the author of that play had evidently consulted Hall’s Chronicle, we must express a decided opinion of the worthlessness of this point, in justification of our intention to illustrate the play before us by passages taken indifferently from Hall or Holinshed. We believe that the question whether Shakspeare was the author of the First Part of Henry VI. is not in the slightest degree affected by the circumstance that the author of this play appears to have been familiar with the narrative of Hall, in which the circumstances of this period of history are given more in detail than by Holinshed. It was perfectly impossible that any writer who undertook to produce four dramas upon the subject of the wars of York and Lancaster should not have gone to Hall’s Chronicle as an authority ; for that book is expressly on the subject of these wars. The original edition of 1548 bears this title :—“The Vnion of the two noble and illustre Famelies of Lancastre and Yorke, beeyng long in continual discension for the crowne of this noble realme, with all the actes done in bothe the tymes of the princes, bothe of the one linage and of the other, beginnyng at the tyme of Kyng Henry the fowerth, the first Aurther of this deuision, and so successiuey proceadyng to the reigne of the high and prudent prince Kyng Henry the eight, the vndubitate flower and very heire of both the sayd linages.” If it could be proved that Shakspeare had not consulted a book the entire subject of which he has dramatized, devoting to that subject nine out of his ten historical plays, we should consider it the most marvellous circumstance in literary history, and totally inexplicable upon any other theory than that of the grossest ignorance on the part of the author. The phrase of Malone, “Shakspeare’s historian,” assumes that Shakspeare could only read in one book. It was perfectly natural that he, for the most part, should follow Holinshed, which is a compilation from all the English historians ; but, as Holinshed constantly refers to his authorities, and in the period of the civil wars particularly to Hall, it is manifest that for some of his details he would go to the book especially devoted to the subject, in which they were treated more fully than in the abridgment which he generally consulted. For example, in Holinshed’s narrative of the pathetic interview between Talbot and his son, before they both fell at the battle of Chatillon, we have no dialogue between the father and son, but simply, “Many words he used to persuade him to have saved his life.” In Hall we have the very words at length, which the poet has paraphrased. We repeat, therefore, that we shall quote indifferently from Hall and Holinshed passages illustrating this play, without considering that the question of its authorship is in the slightest degree involved in thus tracing the footsteps of its author.

The play opens with the funeral of Henry V. In this, as it appears to us, there is great dramatic judgment. The death of that prince, who was the conqueror of France and the idol of England—who, by his extraordinary talents and energy, obliterated almost the memory of the circumstances under which his father obtained the throne—was the starting-point of a long period of error and misfortune, during which France was lost, and England torn to pieces by civil war. It was the purpose of the poet to mark most strikingly the obvious cause of these events ; and thus, surrounding the very bier of Henry V., the great lords, to whom were committed the management of his kingdom and the guardianship of his son, begin to dispute, and the messenger of France reproaches them for their party conflicts :—

“Among the soldiers this is muttered,—
That here you maintain several factions.”

This, indeed, was an anticipation ; for it was two or three years after the accession of Henry VI. that the quarrels of Gloster and Beaufort became dangerous to the realm. In the same way, the losses of towns in France, the coronation of the Dauphin at Rheims, and the defeat of Talbot at Patay, were all anticipations of events which occurred during the succeeding seven years. The poet had the Chronicles before him in which these events are detailed, year by year, with the strictest regard to dates. But he was not himself a chronicler. It was his business to crowd the narrative of these events upon the scene, so as to impress upon his audience the general truth that the death of Henry V. was succeeded by disasters which eventually overthrew the empire of the English in France. In the final chorus to Henry V., written some years after this play, the dramatic connection of these disasters with the death of this heroic prince is clearly indicated :—

“Fortune made his sword ;
By which the world's best garden he achiev'd,
And of it left his son imperial lord.
Henry the Sixth, in infant bands crown'd king
Of France and England, did this king succeed ;
Whose state so many had the managing,
That they lost France, and made his England bleed :
Which oft our stage hath shown.”

This is the theme of the Three Parts of Henry VI., and of Richard III. ; and in this, the first of these four dramas, or rather the first division of this one great drama, the poet principally shows how France was lost, whilst he slightly touches upon the growth of those factions through which England bled. Previous to the loss of France there was a period of brilliant success, during which the Regent Bedford appeared likely to insure to Henry VI. the quiet possession of what Henry V. had won for him. But it was not the province of the dramatist to exhibit this aspect of affairs. In the first scene he prepares us, by a bold condensation of the narrative of events connected in themselves, but occurring at distant periods, for the final loss of France. In the second scene he brings us at once into the heart of the extraordinary circumstances in which the final discomfiture of the English commenced—the appearance of Joan of Arc before Orleans, and the almost miraculous success which attended that appearance. There was a real interval of nearly seven years between the events of the first scene and of the second. Henry V. died on the 31st of August, 1422 ; Joan of Arc entered Orleans in April, 1429. Here, then, commences the true dramatic action of this play. The preceding scene stands in the place of a prologue, and is the key-note to what is to follow.

The narrative of Holinshed, and not that of Hall, has been followed by the poet in the second scene of this act. Malone did some injustice to Shakspeare in maintaining that he could not have been the author of the First Part of Henry VI., because the author consulted Hall ; for, as it is manifest that the author consulted both chroniclers, Malone gives to his unknown author the merit of doing what he affirms Shakspeare did not do—consult two writers on one subject. To have been consistent in his argument, he ought to have shown that the unknown author did not consult Holinshed. The narrative of Holinshed, then, who has been consulted in this case, of the first interview of Joan of Arc with Charles VII., is as follows :—

“In time of this siege at Orleans, unto Charles the Dauphin, at Chinon, as he was in very great care and study how to wrestle against the English nation, by one Peter Badricourt, captain of Vacouleur (made after marshal of France by the Dauphin's creation), was carried a young wench of an eighteen years old, called Joan Arc, by name of her father (a sorry shepherd), James of Arc, and Isabella her mother, brought up poorly in their trade of keeping cattle, born at Domprin (therefore reported by Bale, Joan Domprin), upon Meuse in Lorraine, within the diocese of Thoule. Of favour was she counted likesome, of person strongly made and manly, of courage great, hardy, and stout withal, an understander of counsels though she were not at them, great semblance of chastity both of body and behaviour, the name of Jesus in her mouth about all her businesses, humble, obedient, and fasting divers days in the week. A person (as their books make her) raised up by power divine, only for succour to the French estate, then deeply in distress, in whom, for planting a credit the rather, first the company that towards the Dauphin did conduct her, through places all dangerous, as held by the English, where she never was afore, all the way and by nightertale* safely did she lead : then at the Dauphin's sending by her assignement, from St. Katherine's church of Fierbois in Touraine (where she never had been and knew not), in a secret place there, among old iron, appointed she her sword to be sought out and brought her, that with five fleurs-de-lis was graven on both sides, wherewith she fought and did many slaughters by her own hands. In warfare rode she in armour, cap-à-pie and mustered as a man, before her an ensign all white, wherein was Jesus Christ painted with a fleur-de-lis in his hand.

“Unto the Dauphin into his gallery when first she was brought, and he shadowing himself behind, setting other gay lords before him to try her cunning from all the company, with a salutation (that indeed was all the matter) she picked him out alone, who thereupon had her to the end of the gallery, where she held him an hour in secret and private talk, that of his privy chamber was thought very long, and therefore would have broken it off ; but he made them a sign to let her say on. In which (among other), as likely it was, she set out unto him the singular feats (forsooth) given her to understand by revelation divine, that in virtue of that sword she should achieve, which were, how with honour and victory she would raise the siege at Orleans, set him in state of the crown of France, and drive the English out of the country, thereby he to enjoy the kingdom alone. Hereupon he hearkened at full, appointed her a sufficient army with absolute power to lead them, and they obediently to do as she bade them.”

Our quotation is from the second and enlarged edition of Holinshed published in 1586-7 ; and by this quotation the fact is established, which has not before been noticed, that the author of the First Part of Henry VI. must have consulted that very edition. In the original edition of Holinshed, the first appearance of Joan of Arc at Orleans is treated in a very different manner :—

“While this treaty was in hand, the Dauphin studied daily how to provide remedy, by the delivery of his friends in Orleans out of their present danger. And even at the same time that monstrous woman, named Joan la Pucell de Dieu, was presented to him at Chinon, where as then he sojourned, of which woman ye may find more written in the French history, touching her birth, estate, and quality. But, briefly to speak of her doings, so much credit was given to her, that she was honoured as a saint, and so she handled the matter that she was thought to be sent from God to the aid of the Dauphin, otherwise called the French King, Charles, the seventh of that name, as an instrument to deliver France out of the Englishmen's hands, and to establish him in the kingdom.”

In this passage the term “monstrous woman” is taken from Hall, who says, “She as a monster was sent to the Dolphin.” Hall says she was “a great space a chamberlain in a common hostery, and was a ramp of such boldness that she would course horses and ride them to water, and do things that other young maidens both abhorred and were ashamed to do.” The description of Joan of Arc by herself—is suggested by Holinshed :—“Brought up poorly in their trade of keeping cattle.” Of the choice of her sword “out of a deal of old iron” we have nothing in Hall, nor in the first edition of Holinshed, nor have we the selection of the Dauphin from amongst his courtiers in these earlier authorities.

The third scene of this act hurries us back to London. The poet will not lose sight of the events which made England bleed, whilst he delineates those by which France was lost. The narrative of Holinshed, upon which this scene is founded, is almost a literal transcript from Hall. Both chroniclers give the complaint before the Parliament at Leicester of Gloster against Beaufort, of which the first article alleges that the bishop incited Woodville, the Lieutenant of the Tower, to refuse admission to Gloster, “he being protector and defender of this land.”

The fourth scene is a dramatic amplification of a dramatic scene which the poet found both in Hall and Holinshed. We give the passage from the latter chronicler, as it differs very slightly from that of his predecessor :—

“In the tower that was taken at the bridge end (as before you

* Night-time. The word is in Chaucer :—

“So hote he loved, that by nightertale
He slept no more than doth the nightingale.”

Tyrwhitt explains it as derived from the Saxon nightern dæl—nocturna portio.

have heard) there was an high chamber, having a grate full of bars of iron, by the which a man might look all the length of the bridge into the city; at which grate many of the chief captains stood many times, viewing the city, and devising in what place it was best to give the assault. They within the city well perceived this tooting-hole, and laid a piece of ordinance directly against the window. It so chanced, that, the nine-and-fiftieth day after the siege was laid, the Earl of Salisbury, Sir Thomas Gargrave, and William Glansdale, with divers others, went into the said tower, and so into the high chamber, and looked out at the grate, and, within a short space, the son of the master-gunner, perceiving men looking out at the window, took his match (as his father had taught him, who was gone down to dinner), and fired the gun; the shot whereof broke and shivered the iron bars of the grate, so that one of the same bars struck the earl so violently on the head, that it struck away one of his eyes and the side of his cheek. Sir Thomas Gargrave was likewise stricken, and died within two days. The earl was conveyed to Meun on Loire, where, after eight days, he likewise departed this world."

The fifth scene, the subject of which is the entry of Joan of Arc into Orleans, follows the course of narration in both chroniclers; but it was in Hall that the poet found a suggestion for this passage:—

"Why ring not out the bells throughout the town?
Dauphin, command the citizens make bonfires,
And feast and banquet in the open streets,
To celebrate the joy that God hath given us."

The old historian is quaintly picturesque in his notice of the joy which this great event produced amongst the French:—

"After this siege thus broken up, to tell you what triumphs were made in the city of Orleans, what wood was spent in fires, what wine was drunk in houses, what songs were sung in the streets, what melody was made in taverns, what rounds were danced in large and broad places, what lights were set up in the churches, what anthems were sung in chapels, and what joy was showed in every place, it were a long work, and yet no necessary cause. For they did as we in like case would have done; and we, being in like estate, would have done as they did."

ACT II.

This is that terrible Talbot, so famous for his sword, or rather whose sword was so famous for his arm that used it; a sword with bad Latin* upon it, but good steel within it; which constantly conquered where it came, in so much that the bare fame of his approach frightened the French from the siege of Burdeaux."

Such is the quaint notice which old Fuller, in his "Worthies," gives of Talbot. He is the hero of the play before us; and it is easy to see how his bold, chivalrous bearing, and, above all, the manner of his death, should have made him the favourite of the poet as well as of the chroniclers. His name appears to have been a traditionary household word up to the time of Shakspeare; and other writers, besides the chroniclers, rejoiced in allusions to his warlike deeds. Edward Kerke, the commentator on Spenser's "Pastorals," thus speaks of him in 1579:—"His nobleness bred such a terror in the hearts of the French, that oftentimes great armies were defeated and put to flight at the only hearing of his name: in so much that the French women, to affray their children, would tell them that the Talbot cometh." By a poetical license, Talbot, in this act, is made to retake Orleans; whereas in truth his defeat at the battle of Patay soon followed upon the raising of the siege after the appearance of Joan of Arc. The loss of this battle is attributed, in the description of the messenger in the first act, solely to the cowardice of Sir John Fastolfe; and in the fourth act we are witnesses to the degradation of this knight upon the same imputation of cowardice. There is scarcely enough in the chroniclers to have warranted the poet in making this charge against Fastolfe so prominent. The account of Holinshed, which we subjoin, is nearly a transcript from Hall:—"From this battle departed, without any strokes stricken, Sir John Fastolfe, the same year for his valiantness elected into the Order of the Garter; for which cause the Duke of Bedford took from him the image of St. George, and his garter, though afterward, by mean of friends and apparent causes of good excuse, the same were to him again delivered, against the mind of the Lord Talbot." It is highly probable that Fastolfe, of whose private character we have an intimate knowledge from those most curious records of social life in the days of Henry VI., the Paston Letters, was a commander whose discretion was habitually opposed to the fiery temperament of Talbot; and that, Talbot being the especial favourite of his soldiers, the memory of Fastolfe was handed down to Shakspeare's day as that of one who had contributed to lose France by his timidity, he dying in prosperity and ease in England, whilst the great Talbot perished in the field, leaving in the popular mouth the sentiment which Fuller has preserved, "Henceforward we may say good night to the English in France."

The Bastard of Orleans, who appears in this act, gave the first serious blow to the power of the English in France at the battle of Montargis.

The scene in the Temple Gardens is of purely dramatic creation. It is introduced, we think, with singular judgment, with reference to the purpose of connecting the First Part of Henry VI. with the Second and Third Parts. The scene of the death of Mortimer is introduced with the same object. Edmund Mortimer did not die in confinement, nor was he an old man at the time of his death; but the accounts of the chroniclers are so confused that the poet has not committed any violation of historical truth, such as it presented itself to him, in dramatizing the following passage of Hall (the third year of Henry VI.):—"During which season Edmund Mortimer, the last Earl of March of that name (which long time had been restrained from his liberty, and finally waxed lame), deceased without issue, whose inheritance descended to Lord Richard Plantagenet, son and heir to Richard Earl of Cambridge, beheaded, as you have heard before, at the town of Southampton. Which Richard, within less than thirty years, as heir to this Earl Edmund, in open parliament claimed the crown and sceptre of this realm."

ACT III.

It is here that Henry is first introduced on the scene. The poet has represented him as very young:—

"What, shall a child instruct you what to do?"

He was, in truth, only in his fifth year when the contest between Gloster and Beaufort was solemnly arbitrated before the Parliament at Leicester. But the poor child was made to go through the ceremonies of royalty even before this. Hall, writing of the third year of his reign, says, "About Easter, this year, the king called his high court of parliament at his town of Westminster: and coming to the parliament-house, he was conveyed through the city upon a great courser with great triumph: which child was judged of all men not only to have the very image, the lively portraiture, and lovely countenance of his noble parent and famous father, but also like to succeed and be his heir in all moral virtues, martial policies, and princely feats."

At the Parliament of Leicester Bedford presided, and "openly rebuked the lords in general because that they, in the time of war, through their privy malice and inward grudge, had almost moved the people to war and commotion." This rebuke the poet has put into the mouth of Henry:—

"Believe me, lords, my tender years can tell,
Civil dissension is a viperous worm,
That gnaws the bowels of the commonwealth."

The creation of Richard Plantagenet as Duke of York has been dramatically introduced by the poet into the same scene. The honours bestowed upon Plantagenet immediately followed the hollow reconciliation between Gloster and Beaufort.

The second scene brings us again to France. The stratagem by which Joan of Arc is here represented to have taken Rouen is found in Holinshed, as a narrative of the mode in which Evreux was taken in 1442. The scene of Bedford dying in the field is purely imaginary. The chronicler simply records his death in 1435, and that his "body was with all funeral solemnity buried in the cathedral church of our lady in Rone, on the north side of the high altar, under a sumptuous and costly monument."

The defection of the Duke of Burgundy from the English cause did not take place till 1434, and was in that year that he wrote the letter to Henry to which Gloster alludes in the first scene of the fourth act. The English chroniclers are totally silent as to any influence exercised, or attempted to be exercised, by Joan of Arc in the separation of Burgundy from the interests of England. The actual event, of course, took place after Joan's death; yet it is most remarkable that the spirited dialogue between La Pucelle and Burgundy in this act is wholly borne out by the circumstance that the Maid, on the very day of the coronation of Charles at Rheims, in 1429, addressed a letter to the Duke of Burgundy, in which she uses arguments not at all unlike those of this scene of the play. The letter is published by Barante ("Histoire des Ducs de Bourgogne," tom. iv. p. 259). The original is in the archives of Lille; and Barante says it was first published in 1780. We can scarcely avoid thinking that the author of this play had access to some French chronicler, by whom the substance of the letter was given. We transcribe the original from Barante; for the characteristic simplicity of the style would be lost in a translation:—

"Jhesus Maria.

"Haut et redouté prince, duc de Bourgogne, Jehanne la Pucelle vous requiert, de par le roi du ciel, mon droiturier souverain seigneur, que le roi de France et vous fassiez bonne paix, ferme, qui dure longuement. Pardonnez l'un à l'autre de bon cœur, entièrement, ainsi que doivent faire loyaux chrétiens; et s'il vous plaît guerroyer, allez sur le Sarrasin. Prince de Bourgogne, je vous prie, supplie, et requiers tant humblement que je vous puis requérir, que ne guerroyiez plus au saint royaume de France, et faites retraire incontinent et brièvement vos gens qui sont en aucunes places et forteresses du dit royaume. De la part du gentil roi de France, il est prêt de faire paix avec vous, sauf son honneur; et il ne tient qu'à vous. Et je vous fais savoir, de par le roi du ciel, mon droiturier et souverain seigneur, pour votre bien et pour votre honneur, que vous ne gagnerez point de bataille contre les loyaux Français; et que tous ceux qui guerroyent au dit saint royaume de France guerroyent contre le roi Jhesus, roi du ciel et de tout le monde, mon droiturier et souverain seigneur. Et vous prie et vous requiers à jointes mains que ne fassiez nulle bataille, ni ne guerroyiez contre nous, vous, vos gens, et vos sujets. Croyez sûrement, quelque nombre de gens que vous ameniez contre nous, qu'ils n'y gagneront mie; et sera grand pitié de la grand bataille et du sang qui sera répandu de ceux qui y viendront contre nous. Il y a trois semaines que je vous ai écrit et envoyez de bonnes lettres par un héraut pour que vous fussiez au sacre du roi qui, aujourd'hui dimanche, dix-septième jour de ce présent mois de juillet, se fait en la cité de Reims. Je n'en ai pas eu réponse, ni onc depuis n'a ouï nouvelles du héraut. A Dieu vous recommande et soit garde de vous, s'il lui plaît, et prie Dieu qu'il y mette bonne paix. Ecrit au dit lieu de Reims, le 17 juillet."

ACT IV.

The coronation of Henry VI. in Paris took place as early as 1431. In the scene of the play where this event is represented, Talbot receives a commission to proceed against Burgundy; and the remainder of the fourth act is occupied with the events of the campaign in which Talbot fell. Twenty years or more are leaped over by the poet, for the purpose of showing, amidst the disasters of our countrymen in France, the heroism by which the struggle for empire was so long maintained. We have already alluded to the detailed narrative which Hall gives of Talbot's death, and the brief notice of Holinshed. The account of the elder historian is very graphic, and no doubt furnished the materials for the fifth, sixth, and seventh scenes of this act:—

"This conflict continued in doubtful judgement of victory two long hours; during which fight the lords of Montamban and Humadayre, with a great company of Frenchmen, entered the battle, and began a new field; and suddenly the gunners, perceiving the Englishmen to approach near, discharged their ordinance, and slew three hundred persons near to the earl, who, perceiving the imminent jeopardy and subtile labyrinth in the which he and his people were inclosed and illaqueate, despising his own safeguard, and desiring the life of his entire and well beloved son the Lord Lisle, willed, advertised, and counselled him to depart out of the field, and to save himself. But when the son had answered that it was neither honest nor natural for him to leave his father in the extreme jeopardy of his life, and that he would taste of that draught which his father and parent should assay and begin, the noble earl and comfortable captain said to him, Oh, son, son! I, thy father, which only hath been the terror and scourge of the French people so many years,—which hath subverted so many towns, and profligate and discomfited so many of them in open battle and martial conflict,—neither can here die, for the honour of my country, without great laud and perpetual fame, nor fly or depart without perpetual shame and continual infamy. But because this is thy first journey and enterprise, neither thy flying shall redound to thy shame, nor thy death to thy glory: for as hardy a man wisely flieth as a temerarious person foolishly abideth, therefore the fleeing of me shall be the dishonour, not only of me and my progeny, but also a discomfiture of all my company: thy departure shall save thy life, and make thee able another time, if I be slain, to revenge my death, and to do honour to thy prince and profit to his realm. But nature so wrought in the son, that neither desire of life, nor thought of security, could withdraw or pluck him from his natural father; who, considering the constancy of his child, and the great danger that they stood in, comforted his soldiers, cheered his captains, and valiantly set on his enemies, and slew of them more in number than he had in his company. But his enemies, having a great company of men, and more abundance of ordinance than before had been seen in a battle, first shot him through the thigh with a hand-gun, and slew his horse, and cowardly killed him, lying on the ground, whom they never durst look in the face while he stood on his feet: and with him there died manfully his son the Lord Lisle, his bastard son Henry Talbot, and Sir Edward Hull, elect to the noble Order of the Garter, and thirty valiant personages of the English nation; and the Lord Molyns was there taken prisoner with sixty other. The residue of the English people fled to Burdeaux and other places; whereof in the flight were slain above a thousand persons. At this battle of Chastillon, fought the 13th day of July, in this year, ended his life, John Lord Talbot, and of his progeny the first Earl of Shrewsbury, after that he with much fame, more glory, and most victory, had for his prince and country, by the space of twenty-four years and more, valiantly made war and served the king in the parts beyond the sea, whose corps was left on the ground, and after was found by his friends, and conveyed to Whitchurch in Shropshire, where it is intumulate."

ACT V.

The circumstances which attended the capture of Joan of Arc are differently told by the French chroniclers. They all agree, however, that the event happened at Compiègne. The narrative which we find in the first edition of Holinshed is almost entirely taken from that of Hall. In the second edition we have an abstract of the details of the "Chroniques de Bretagne." The poet has departed from the literal exactness of all the accounts. We give the passage from Holinshed:—

"After this the Duke of Bourgoyne, accompanied with the Earls of Arundel and Suffolk, and the Lord John of Lutzenburg, besieged the town of Compiègne with a great puissance. This town was well walled, manned, and victualled, so that the besiegers were constrained to cast trenches, and make mines, for otherwise they saw not how to compass their purpose. In the meantime it happened, in the night of the Ascension of our Lord (A. 1430), that Poyton de Saintreyles, Joan la Pucelle, and five or six hundred men of arms, issued out by the bridge towards Mondedier, intending to set fire in the tents and lodgings of the Lord Bawdo de Noyelle. At the same very time, Sir John de Lutzenburg, with eight other gentlemen, chanced to be near unto the lodgings of the said Lord Bawdo, where they espied the Frenchmen, which began to cut down tents, overthrow pavilions, and kill men in their beds; whereupon they with all speed assembled a great number of men, as well English as Burgoyne, and courageously set on the Frenchmen, and in the end beat them back into the town, so that they fled so fast that one letted another, as they would have entered. In the chase and pursuit was the Pucelle taken with divers other, besides those that were slain, which were no small number."

The mode in which the author of this play has chosen to delineate the character of Joan of Arc in the last act has been held to be a proof that Shakspeare was not the author. It will be our duty to treat this subject at length in another place; but we would here observe that, however the dramatist may have represented this extraordinary woman as a sorceress, and made her accuse herself of licentious conduct, he has fallen very far short of the injustice of the English chroniclers, who, no doubt, represented the traditionary opinions of the English nation. Upon her first appearance at Orleans she was denounced by Bedford in his letter to the King of France as "a devilish witch and satanical enchantress." After the cruel revenge which the English took upon their captive, a letter was written in the name of Henry to the Duke of Burgundy, setting forth and defending the proceedings which had taken place at Rouen. The conclusion of this letter marks the spirit of the age; and Hall, writing more than a century afterwards, affirms that the letter is quite sufficient evidence that Joan was an organ of the devil:—"And because she still was obstinate in her trespasses and villainous offences," says the letter of Henry, "she was delivered to the secular power, the which condemned her to be burnt and consumed her in the fire. And when she saw that the fatal day of her obstinacy was come, she openly confessed that the spirits which to her often did appear were evil and false, and apparent liars; and that their promise which they had made to deliver her out of captivity was false and untrue, affirming herself by those spirits to be often beguiled, blinded, and mocked. And so, being in good mind, she was by the justices carried to the old market within the city of Roan, and there by the fire consumed to ashes in the sight of all the people." The confession in the fourth scene, which is so revolting to us, is built upon an assertion which the dramatist found in Holinshed. Taken altogether, the character of Joan of Arc, as represented in this play, appears to us to be founded upon juster views than those of the chroniclers; and the poet, without any didactic expression of his opinion, has dramatically made us feel that the conduct of her persecutors was atrocious. That in a popular play, written more than two hundred and fifty years ago, we should find those tolerant, and therefore profound, views of the character of such an enthusiast as Joan of Arc by which she is estimated in our own day, was hardly to be expected. From her own countrymen Joan of Arc had an equally scanty measure of justice. Monstrelet, the French chronicler, does not hesitate to affirm that the whole affair was a got-up imposture. The same views prevailed in France in the next century; and it is scarcely necessary to observe that Voltaire converted the story of the Maid into a vehicle for the most profligate ribaldry. Long after France had erected monuments to Joan of Arc her memory was ridiculed by those who claimed to be in advance of public opinion.

The narrative of the wooing of Margaret of Anjou by Suffolk is thus given by Holinshed:—

"In the treating of this truce, the Earl of Suffolk, extending his commission to the uttermost, without the assent of his associates, imagined in his fantasy that the next way to come to a perfect peace was to move some marriage between the French king's kinswoman, the Lady Margaret, daughter to Regner Duke of Anjou, and his sovereign lord King Henry. This Regner Duke of Anjou named himself King of Sicily, Naples, and Jerusalem, having only the name and style of those realms, without any penny profit or foot of possession. This marriage was made strange to the earl at first, and one thing seemed to be a great hindrance to it, which was, because the King of England occupied a great part of the duchy of Anjou, and the whole county of Maine, appertaining (as was alleged) to King Regner. The Earl of Suffolk (I cannot say) either corrupted with bribes, or too much affection to this unprofitable marriage, condescended and agreed that the duchy of Anjou and the county of Maine should be delivered to the king, the bride's father, demanding for her marriage neither penny nor farthing, as who would say that this new affinity passed all riches, and excelled both gold and precious stone.

But although this marriage pleased the king and others of his counsel, yet Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, protector of the realm, was much against it, alleging that it should be both contrary to the laws of God and dishonourable to the prince if he should break that promise and contract of marriage made by ambassadors, sufficiently thereto instructed, with the daughter of the Earl of Arminack, upon conditions, both to him and his realm, as much profitable as honourable. But the duke's words could not be heard, for the earl's doings were only liked and allowed.

The Earl of Suffolk was made Marquis of Suffolk, which marquis, with his wife and many honourable personages of men and women, sailed into France for the conveyance of the nominated queen into the realm of England. For King Regner, her father, for all his long style, had too short a purse to send his daughter honourably to the king her spouse."

In the fourth scene we find

"That peaceful truce shall be proclaim'd in France."

By this was probably intended the truce of 1444, which lasted till 1449. It was in that year that Charles VII. poured his troops into Normandy, and that Rouen, "that rich city," as Holinshed calls it,—the scene of the English glory and the English shame,—was delivered to the French.

KING HENRY VI.

PART II.

INTRODUCTORY NOTICE.

THIS drama appears in the original folio edition of Shakspeare's plays under the title of "The Second Part of Henry the Sixth, with the Death of the Good Duke Humfrey." In the form in which it has been transmitted to us by the editors of that first collected edition of our author, it had not been previously printed. But in 1594 there appeared a separate play, in quarto, under the following title:—"The First Part of the Contention betwixt the two famous Houses of Yorke and Lancaster, with the Death of the Good Duke Humphrey, and the Banishment and Death of the Duke of Suffolke, and the Tragical End of the proud Cardinal of Winchester, with the notable Rebellion of Jack Cade, and the Duke of Yorke's first Claime unto the Croune. Printed by Thomas Creede for Thomas Millington." This play, in the entire conduct of the scenes, and in a great measure in the dialogue, is "The Second Part of Henry the Sixth." But the alterations and additions are so considerable that it has been held, of late years, that "The First Part of the Contention," as published by Millington in 1594, reprinted by him in 1600, and subsequently republished about 1619 as written by Shakspeare, was the entire work of some other dramatist, and that Shakspeare only added certain lines to this original, and altered others. This is the question which, in connection with the more general question of the literary history of the Three Parts of Henry VI. and of Richard III., we propose to examine in a separate Dissertation. It has appeared to us, however, that it would be desirable on many accounts if we were to reprint "The First Part of the Contention" as a Supplement to this Second Part of Henry VI., and "The Second Part of the Contention" as a Supplement to the Third Part of Henry VI. To enable the reader fairly to compare the original and the revised dramas, we have modernised the orthography of the elder performances, as well as corrected the punctuation, and printed some lines metrically which, although appearing as prose, were obviously intended to be read as verse, and the contrary. We have also, for the convenience of reference, divided each of these plays into acts and scenes. In every other respect we strictly follow the original copies.

COSTUME OF HENRY VI., PART II.

In our Notice to the First Part of this play we mentioned that we knew of no contemporary portrait or effigy of Humphrey Duke of Gloster. A figure supposed to represent him exists in a piece of tapestry belonging to St. Mary's Hall, at Coventry; but the tapestry is, in our opinion, of the date of Henry VII., although Major Hamilton Smith, in his "Ancient Costume of England," quotes the suggestion of an antiquarian friend that it was put up in all probability during the lives of Henry VI. and Queen Margaret, who both frequently visited the city, and were entertained in that hall. Our reason for doubting this circumstance is, that the costume is evidently of a later date than the accession of Edward IV., and that during the reign of that monarch, or of Richard III., not even the Lancastrian citizens of Coventry would have been likely to venture so ostentatious a display of the portraits of Henry, Margaret, Cardinal Beaufort, the Duke of Bedford, Duke Humphrey, and all the principal nobility and courtiers attached to the party of the Red Rose. We believe it to have been executed immediately after the triumph of Henry VII. at Bosworth Field; and therefore the figures must not be taken as authorities for the dress of this precise period. The plates in Major Hamilton Smith's work are incorrectly drawn and coloured; but in the original tapestry the dresses of the King and Queen exhibit the peculiar pine-apple pattern so much in vogue during the close of the fifteenth century. The dress of Cardinal Beaufort has been described in the First Part. Of Edmund Beaufort, the Duke of Somerset in this part of the play, we have no representation; he was buried in the Abbey of St. Alban's.

Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, is depicted on glass in Trinity Hall, Cambridge: the figure has been frequently but improperly engraved as Richard Duke of Gloster. Sandford mentions another painting on glass of this Richard Plantagenet, in the east window of the north aisle of Cirencester Church in Gloucestershire, "having on the pomel of his sword the arms of Mortimer Earl of March, it may be thereby to signifie that, although he was forced to use the blade to dispute his right to the crown, yet did he shroud himself under the shield or hilt of a good title." Of Humphrey Stafford Duke of Buckingham, or of the Cliffords, father and son, we have no representation; neither know we any of Richard Nevil Earl of Salisbury; but his son Richard Nevil Earl of Warwick is depicted by Rouse in the Warwick Roll, College of Arms, London. The general costume of this period may be observed in Lydgate's MS. in the Harleian Collection mentioned in Part I.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—London. A Room of State in the Palace.

Flourish of trumpets then hautboys. Enter, on one side, KING HENRY, DUKE OF GLOSTER, SALISBURY, WARWICK, and CARDINAL BEAUFORT; on the other, QUEEN MARGARET, led in by SUFFOLK; YORK, SOMERSET, BUCKINGHAM, and others following.

Suf. As by your high imperial majesty
I had in charge at my depart for France,
As procurator to your excellence,
To marry princess Margaret for your grace;
So, in the famous ancient city, Tours,—
In presence of the kings of France and Sicil,
The dukes of Orleans, Calaber, Bretainne, and Alençon,
Seven earls, twelve barons, and twenty reverend bishops,—
I have perform'd my task, and was espous'd:
And humbly now upon my bended knee,
In sight of England and her lordly peers,
Deliver up my title in the queen
To your most gracious hands, that are the substance
Of that great shadow I did represent;
The happiest gift that ever marquess gave,
The fairest queen that ever king receiv'd.

K. Hen. Suffolk, arise.—Welcome, queen Margaret:
I can express no kinder sign of love,
Than this kind kiss.—O Lord, that lends me life,
Lend me a heart replete with thankfulness!
For thou hast given me, in this beauteous face,
A world of earthly blessings to my soul,
If sympathy of love unite our thoughts.

Q. Mar. Great king of England, and my gracious lord,
The mutual conference that my mind hath had,

By day, by night,—waking, and in my dreams,—
In courtly company, or at my beads,—
With you mine alder-liefest<sup>1</sup> sovereign,
Makes me the bolder to salute my king
With ruder terms, such as my wit afford
And over-joy of heart doth minister.

K. Hen. Her sight did ravish; but her grace in speech,
Her words y-clad with wisdom's majesty,
Makes me from wondering fall to weeping joys;<sup>2</sup>
Such is the fulness of my heart's content.
Lords, with one cheerful voice welcome my love.

All. [Knéeing.] Long live queen Margaret, England's happiness!

Q. Mar. We thank you all. [Flourish.]

Suf. My lord protector, so it please your grace,
Here are the articles of contracted peace,
Between our sovereign, and the French king Charles,
For eighteen months concluded by consent.

Glo. [Reads.] "Imprimis, It is agreed between the French king, Charles, and William de la Poole, marquess of Suffolk, ambassador for Henry king of England, that the said Henry shall espouse the lady Margaret, daughter unto Reignier king of Naples, Sicilia, and Jerusalem; and crown her queen of England, ere the thirtieth of May next ensuing.—Item,—That the duchy of Anjou and the county of Maine shall be released and delivered to the king her father"—

K. Hen. Uncle, how now?

Glo. Pardon me, gracious lord;
Some sudden qualm hath struck me at the heart,
And dimm'd mine eyes; that I can read no further.

K. Hen. Uncle of Winchester, I pray, read on.

Car. "Item,—It is further agreed between them, that the duchies of Anjou and Maine<sup>3</sup> shall be released and

<sup>2</sup> This line is usually pointed thus:—

"Makes me, from wondering, fall to weeping joys."

But wondering is an adjective agreeing with joys as well as weeping.

<sup>3</sup> Gloster reads this document thus:—"That the duchy of Anjou and the county of Maine shall be released," &c. In the cardinal's hands the words are changed—"That the duchies of Anjou and Maine shall be released," &c. Malone says, "The words in the instrument could not thus vary whilst it was passing from the hands of the duke to those of the cardinal;" and he adds that the inaccuracy is not found in the original play. It seems to us that the variation was intentional. The cardinal reads the document correctly; but Gloster, whose mind had seized upon the substance of the articles before he recited the conclusion of the sentence, ceases to read when the sudden qualm hath struck him at the heart, and delivers the import of the words which have so moved him with substantial correctness, but formal inaccuracy.

delivered over to the king her father; and she sent over of the king of England's own proper cost and charges, without having any dowry."

K. Hen. They please us well.—Lord marquess, kneel down;

We here create thee the first duke of Suffolk,
And girt thee with the sword. Cousin of York,
We here discharge your grace from being regent
In the parts of France, till term of eighteen months
Be full expir'd. Thanks, uncle Winchester,
Gloster, York, Buckingham, Somerset,
Salisbury, and Warwick;
We thank you all for this great favour done,
In entertainment to my princely queen.
Come, let us in; and with all speed provide
To see her coronation be perform'd.

[Exeunt KING, QUEEN, and SUFFOLK.]

Glo. Brave peers of England, pillars of the state,
To you duke Humphrey must unload his grief;
Your grief, the common grief of all the land.
What! did my brother Henry spend his youth,
His valour, coin, and people, in the wars?
Did he so often lodge in open field,
In winter's cold, and summer's parching heat,
To conquer France, his true inheritance?
And did my brother Bedford toil his wits,
To keep by policy what Henry got?
Have you yourselves, Somerset, Buckingham,
Brave York, Salisbury, and victorious Warwick,
Receiv'd deep scars in France and Normandy?
Or hath mine uncle Beaufort, and myself,
With all the learned council of the realm,
Studied so long, sat in the council-house,
Early and late, debating to and fro
How France and Frenchmen might be kept in awe?
And hath his highness in his infancy
Been<sup>1</sup> crown'd in Paris, in despite of foes?
And shall these labours, and these honours, die?
Shall Henry's conquest, Bedford's vigilance,
Your deeds of war, and all our counsel, die?
O peers of England, shameful is this league!
Fatal this marriage! cancelling your fame;
Blotting your names from books of memory;
Razing the characters of your renown;
Defacing monuments of conquer'd France;
Undoing all, as all had never been!

Car. Nephew, what means this passionate discourse,—
This peroration with such circumstance?
For France, 'tis ours; and we will keep it still.

Glo. Ay, uncle, we will keep it, if we can;
But now it is impossible we should:
Suffolk, the new-made duke, that rules the roast,
Hath given the duchies of Anjou and Maine
Unto the poor king Reignier, whose large style
Agrees not with the leanness of his purse.

Sal. Now, by the death of him that died for all,
These counties were the keys of Normandy:—
But wherefore weeps Warwick, my valiant son?

War. For grief, that they are past recovery:
For were there hope to conquer them again,
My sword should shed hot blood, mine eyes no tears.
Anjou and Maine! myself did win them both;
Those provinces these arms of mine did conquer:
And are the cities that I got with wounds
Deliver'd up again with peaceful words?
Mort Dieu!

York. For Suffolk's duke, may he be suffocate,
That dims the honour of this warlike isle!
France should have torn and rent my very heart
Before I would have yielded to this league.

I never read but England's kings have had Large sums of gold, and dowries, with their wives:
And our king Henry gives away his own,
To match with her that brings no vantages.

Glo. A proper jest, and never heard before,
That Suffolk should demand a whole fifteenth,
For costs and charges in transporting her!
She should have stay'd in France, and starv'd in France,
Before—

Car. My lord of Gloster, now you grow too hot;
It was the pleasure of my lord the king.

Glo. My lord of Winchester, I know your mind;
'Tis not my speeches that you do dislike,
But 'tis my presence that doth trouble you.
Rancour will out: Proud prelate, in thy face
I see thy fury: if I longer stay
We shall begin our ancient bickerings.

Lordings, farewell; and say, when I am gone,
I prophesied—France will be lost ere long.

[Exit.]

Car. So, there goes our protector in a rage.
'Tis known to you he is mine enemy:
Nay, more, an enemy unto you all;
And no great friend, I fear me, to the king.
Consider, lords,—he is the next of blood,
And heir apparent to the English crown;
Had Henry got an empire by his marriage,
And all the wealthy kingdoms of the west,
There's reason he should be displeas'd at it.
Look to it, lords; let not his smoothing words
Bewitch your heart; be wise, and circumspect.
What, though the common people favour him,
Calling him—"Humphrey, the good duke of Gloster;"
Clapping their hands, and crying with loud voice—
"Jesu maintain your royal excellence!"
With—"God preserve the good duke Humphrey!"
I fear me, lords, for all this flattering gloss,
He will be found a dangerous protector.

Buck. Why should he then protect our sovereign,
He being of age to govern of himself?
Cousin of Somerset, join you with me,
And all together with the duke of Suffolk,
We'll quickly hoise duke Humphrey from his seat.

Car. This weighty business will not brook delay;
I'll to the duke of Suffolk presently.

[Exit.]

Som. Cousin of Buckingham, though Humphrey's pride,
And greatness of his place, be grief to us,
Yet let us watch the haughty cardinal;
His insolence is more intolerable
Than all the princes in the land beside;
If Gloster be displac'd, he'll be protector.

Buck. Or thou, or I, Somerset, will be protector,
Despite duke Humphrey, or the cardinal.

[Exeunt BUCKINGHAM and SOMERSET.]

Sal. Pride went before, ambition follows him.
While these do labour for their own preferment,
Behoves it us to labour for the realm.
I never saw but Humphrey duke of Gloster
Did bear him like a noble gentleman.
Oft have I seen the haughty cardinal—
More like a soldier than a man o' the church,
As stout and proud as he were lord of all,—
Swear like a ruffian, and demean himself
Unlike the ruler of a commonweal.
Warwick, my son, the comfort of my age!
Thy deeds, thy plainness, and thy house-keeping,
Hath won the greatest favour of the commons,
Excepting none but good duke Humphrey.
And, brother York, thy acts in Ireland,
In bringing them to civil discipline;
Thy late exploits, done in the heart of France,
When thou wert regent for our sovereign,
Have made thee fear'd and honour'd of the people:

Join we together for the public good,
In what we can, to bridle and suppress
The pride of Suffolk, and the cardinal,
With Somerset's and Buckingham's ambition
And, as we may, cherish duke Humphrey's deeds
While they do tend the profit of the land.

War. So God help Warwick, as he loves the land,
And common profit of his country!

York. And so says York, for he hath greatest cause.

Sal. Then let's make haste away, and look unto the main.

War. Unto the main! O father, Maine is lost;
That Maine, which by main force Warwick did win,
And would have kept, so long as breath did last:
Main chance, father, you meant; but I meant Maine;
Which I will win from France, or else be slain.

[Exeunt WARWICK and SALISBURY.]

York. Anjou and Maine are given to the French;
Paris is lost; the state of Normandy
Stands on a tickle<sup>1</sup> point, now they are gone:
Suffolk concluded on the articles;
The peers agreed; and Henry was well pleas'd
To change two dukedoms for a duke's fair daughter.
I cannot blame them all: What is't to them?
'Tis thine they give away, and not their own.
Pirates may make cheap pennyworths of their pillage,
And purchase friends, and give to courtesans,
Still revelling, like lords, till all be gone:
While as the silly owner of the goods
Weeps over them, and wrings his hapless hands,
And shakes his head, and trembling stands aloof,
While all is shar'd, and all is borne away;
Ready to starve, and dare not touch his own.
So York must sit, and fret, and bite his tongue,
While his own lands are bargain'd for and sold.
Methinks, the realms of England, France, and Ireland,
Bear that proportion to my flesh and blood
As did the fatal brand Althea burn'd,
Unto the prince's heart of Calydon.<sup>2</sup>
Anjou and Maine, both given unto the French!
Cold news for me; for I had hope of France,
Even as I have of fertile England's soil.
A day will come when York shall claim his own;
And therefore I will take the Nevils' parts,
And make a show of love to proud duke Humphrey,
And, when I spy advantage, claim the crown,
For that's the golden mark I seek to hit:
Nor shall proud Lancaster usurp my right,
Nor hold the sceptre in his childish fist,
Nor wear the diadem upon his head,
Whose church-like humours fit not for a crown.
Then, York, be still awhile, till time do serve:
Watch thou, and wake, when others be asleep,
To pry into the secrets of the state;
Till Henry, surfeiting in joys of love,
With his new bride, and England's dear-bought queen,
And Humphrey with the peers be fall'n at jars:
Then will I raise aloft the milk-white rose,
With whose sweet smell the air shall be perfum'd;
And in my standard bear the arms of York,
To grapple with the house of Lancaster;
And, force perforce, I'll make him yield the crown,
Whose bookish rule hath pull'd fair England down.

[Exit.]

<sup>1</sup> Tickle—uncertain; the Saxon tikel. So in Chaucer, "The Miller's Tale:"—

"This world is now full tikel sikerly;"

i.e. this world is now quite uncertain, surely.

<sup>2</sup> Meleager, the Prince of Calydon, died in great torments when his mother Althea threw into the flames the firebrand upon the preservation of which his life depended.

SCENE II.—The same. A Room in the Duke of Gloster's House.

Enter GLOSTER and the DUCHESS.

Duch. Why droops my lord, like over-ripen'd corn,
Hanging the head at Ceres' plenteous load?
Why doth the great duke Humphrey knit his brows,
As frowning at the favours of the world?
Why are thine eyes fix'd to the sullen earth,
Gazing on that which seems to dim thy sight?
What seest thou there? king Henry's diadem,
Enchas'd with all the honours of the world?
If so, gaze on, and grovel on thy face,
Until thy head be circled with the same.
Put forth thy hand, reach at the glorious gold:
What, is't too short? I'll lengthen it with mine:
And, having both together heav'd it up,
We'll both together lift our heads to heav'n;
And never more abase our sight so low
As to vouchsafe one glance unto the ground.

Glo. O Nell, sweet Nell, if thou dost love thy lord,
Banish the canker of ambitious thoughts:
And may that thought, when I imagine ill
Against my king and nephew, virtuous Henry,
Be my last breathing in this mortal world!
My troublous dream this night doth make me sad.

Duch. What dream'd my lord? tell me, and I'll requite it
With sweet rehearsal of my morning's dream.

Glo. Methought this staff, mine office-badge in court,
Was broke in twain; by whom I have forgot,
But, as I think, it was by the cardinal;
And, on the pieces of the broken wand
Were plac'd the heads of Edmund duke of Somerset,
And William de la Poole first duke of Suffolk.
This was my dream; what it doth bode, God knows.

Duch. Tut, this was nothing but an argument,
That he that breaks a stick of Gloster's grove
Shall lose his head for his presumption.
But list to me, my Humphrey, my sweet duke:
Methought, I sat in seat of majesty,
In the cathedral church of Westminster,
And in that chair where kings and queens are crown'd;
Where Henry, and dame Margaret, kneel'd to me,
And on my head did set the diadem.

Glo. Nay, Eleanor, then must I chide outright:
Presumptuous dame, ill-nurtur'd<sup>3</sup> Eleanor!
Art thou not second woman in the realm:
And the protector's wife, belov'd of him?
Hast thou not worldly pleasure at command,
Above the reach or compass of thy thought?
And wilt thou still be hammering treachery,
To tumble down thy husband and thyself,
From top of honour to disgrace's feet?
Away from me, and let me hear no more.

Duch. What, what, my lord! are you so choleric
With Eleanor, for telling but her dream?
Next time, I'll keep my dreams unto myself,
And not be check'd.

Glo. Nay, be not angry, I am pleas'd again.

Enter a Messenger.

Mes. My lord protector, 'tis his highness' pleasure,
You do prepare to ride unto Saint Alban's,
Whereas<sup>4</sup> the king and queen do mean to hawk.

<sup>3</sup> So in "Venus and Adonis:"—

"Were I hard-favour'd, foul, or wrinkled-old,
Ill-nurtur'd, crooked, churlish, harsh in voice."

<sup>4</sup> Whereas is here used in the sense of where, as it frequently is by Shakspeare's contemporaries. Thus, in Daniel's tragedy of "Cleopatra" (1594), we have—

"That I should pass whereas Octavia stands
To view my misery."

Glo. I go.—Come, Nell, thou wilt ride with us?

Duch. Yes, my good lord, I'll follow presently [Exeunt GLOSTER and Messenger.]

Follow I must, I cannot go before,
While Gloster bears this base and humble mind.
Were I a man, a duke, and next of blood,
I would remove these tedious stumbling-blocks,
And smooth my way upon their headless necks :
And, being a woman, I will not be slack
To play my part in fortune's pageant.
Where are you there? Sir John!<sup>1</sup> nay, fear not, man,
We are alone; here's none but thee and I.

Enter HUME.

Hume. Jesu preserve your royal majesty!

Duch. What say'st thou, majesty! I am but grace.

Hume. But, by the grace of God, and Hume's advice,
Your grace's title shall be multiplied.

Duch. What say'st thou, man? hast thou as yet conferr'd
With Margery Jourdain, the cunning witch;
With Roger Bolingbroke, the conjurer?
And will they undertake to do me good?

Hume. This they have promised,—to show your highness

A spirit rais'd from depth of under ground,
That shall make answer to such questions,
As by your grace shall be propounded him.

Duch. It is enough; I'll think upon the questions :
When from Saint Alban's we do make return,
We'll see these things effected to the full.
Here, Hume, take this reward; make merry, man,
With thy confederates in this weighty cause.

[Exit DUCHESS.]

Hume. Hume must make merry with the duchess' gold;
Marry, and shall. But how now, sir John Hume?
Seal up your lips, and give no words but—mum!
The business asketh silent secrecy.

Dame Eleanor gives gold, to bring the witch :
Gold cannot come amiss, were she a devil.
Yet have I gold, flies from another coast :
I dare not say from the rich cardinal,
And from the great and new-made duke of Suffolk
Yet I do find it so : for, to be plain,
They, knowing dame Eleanor's aspiring humour,
Have hired me to undermine the duchess,
And buz these conjurations in her brain.
They say, A crafty knave does need no broker ;
Yet am I Suffolk and the cardinal's broker.
Hume, if you take not heed, you shall go near
To call them both a pair of crafty knaves.
Well, so it stands : And thus, I fear, at last,
Hume's knavery will be the duchess' wrack ;
And her attainture will be Humphrey's fall :
Sort how it will, I shall have gold for all. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The same. A Room in the Palace.

Enter PETER, and others, with petitions.

<sup>1</sup> Pet. My masters, let's stand close; my lord protector will come this way by-and-by, and then we may deliver our supplications in the quill.<sup>2</sup>

Jesu bless him!

Enter SUFFOLK and QUEEN MARGARET.

<sup>1</sup> Pet. Here'a comes, methinks, and the queen with him :
I'll be the first, sure.

<sup>2</sup> Pet. Come back, fool; this is the duke of Suffolk, and not my lord protector.

Suf. How now, fellow? wouldst anything with me?

<sup>1</sup> Pet. I pray, my lord, pardon me! I took ye for my lord protector.

Q. Mar. [Reading the superscription.] "To my lord protector!" are your supplications to his lordship? Let me see them : What is thine?

<sup>1</sup> Pet. Mine is, an't please your grace, against John Goodman, my lord cardinal's man, for keeping my house, and lands, and wife and all, from me.

Suf. Thy wife too? that is some wrong, indeed.—What's yours?—What's here? [Reads.] "Against the duke of Suffolk, for enclosing the commons of Melford."—How now, sir knave?

<sup>2</sup> Pet. Alas, sir, I am but a poor petitioner of our whole township.

Peter. [Presenting his petition.] Against my master, Thomas Horner, for saying, That the duke of York was rightful heir to the crown.

Q. Mar. What say'st thou? Did the duke of York say, he was rightful heir to the crown?

Peter. That my master was? No, forsooth : my master said, That he was; and that the king was an usurper.

Suf. Who is there? [Enter Servants.]—Take this fellow in, and send for his master with a pursuivant presently :—
we'll hear more of your matter before the king.

[Exeunt Servants, with PETER.]

Q. Mar. And as for you that love to be protected
Under the wings of our protector's grace,
Begin your suits anew, and sue to him. [Tears the petition.]
Away, base cullions!—Suffolk, let them go.

All. Come, let's be gone. [Exeunt Petitioners.]

Q. Mar. My lord of Suffolk, say, is this the guise,
Is this the fashion in the court of England?
Is this the government of Britain's isle,
And this the royalty of Albion's king?
What, shall king Henry be a pupil still,
Under the surly Gloster's governance?
Am I a queen in title and in style,
And must be made a subject to a duke
I tell thee, Poole, when in the city Tours
Thou ran'st a tilt in honour of my love,
And stol'st away the ladies' hearts of France,
I thought king Henry had resembled thee,
In courage, courtship, and proportion :
But all his mind is bent to holiness,
To number Ave-Marias on his beads :
His champions are the prophets and apostles ;
His weapons, holy saws of sacred writ ;
His study is his tilt-yard, and his loves
Are brazen images of canoniz'd saints.
I would the college of the cardinals
Would choose him pope, and carry him to Rome,
And set the triple crown upon his head ;
That were a state fit for his holiness.

Suf. Madam, be patient : as I was cause
Your highness came to England, so will I
In England work your grace's full content.

Q. Mar. Beside the haughty protector, have we Beaufort,<sup>3</sup>
The imperious churchman; Somerset, Buckingham,
And grumbling York : and not the least of these
But can do more in England than the king.

Tyrwhitt says that, from the title being so usually given in this way, "a Sir John came to be a nickname for a priest."

<sup>2</sup> In the quill, or in quill, may mean written—our written petitions. In the same way in print means printed.

notices the reading of haughty as "a remarkable instance of Mr. Knight's slavery to the [first] folio." The preference of haught is a "remarkable instance," amongst many others, of my late friend's "slavery" to a syllable-counting principle, frequently opposed to the freedom and harmony of dramatic verse.

Suf. And he of these that can do most of all
Cannot do more in England than the Nevils:
Salisbury and Warwick are no simple peers.

Q. Mar. Not all these lords do vex me half so much
As that proud dame, the lord protector's wife.
She sweeps it through the court with troops of ladies,
More like an empress than duke Humphrey's wife;
Strangers in court do take her for the queen:
She bears a duke's revenues on her back,
And in her heart she scorns our poverty:
Shall I not live to be aveng'd on her?
Contemptuous base-born callat as she is,
She vaunted 'mongst her minions t' other day,
The very train of her worst wearing-gown
Was better worth than all my father's lands,
Till Suffolk gave two dukedoms for his daughter.

Suf. Madam, myself have lim'd a bush for her;
And plac'd a quire of such enticing birds,
That she will light to listen to the lays,
And never mount to trouble you again.
So, let her rest: And, madam, list to me;
For I am bold to counsel you in this:
Although we fancy not the cardinal,
Yet must we join with him, and with the lords,
Till we have brought duke Humphrey in disgrace.
As for the duke of York, this late complaint
Will make but little for his benefit:
So, one by one, we'll weed them all at last,
And you yourself shall steer the happy helm.

Enter KING HENRY, YORK, and SOMERSET; DUKE and DUCHESS OF GLOSTER, CARDINAL BEAUFORT, BUCKINGHAM, SALISBURY, and WARWICK.

K. Hen. For my part, noble lords, I care not which;
Or Somerset, or York, all's one to me.

York. If York have ill demean'd himself in France,
Then let him be deny'd<sup>1</sup> the regentship.

Som. If Somerset be unworthy of the place,
Let York be regent, I will yield to him.

War. Whether your grace be worthy, yea or no,
Dispute not that: York is the worthier.

Car. Ambitious Warwick, let thy betters speak.

War. The cardinal's not my better in the field.

Buck. All in this presence are thy betters, Warwick.

War. Warwick may live to be the best of all.

Sal. Peace, son; and show some reason, Buckingham,
Why Somerset should be preferr'd in this.

Q. Mar. Because the king, forsooth, will have it so.

Glo. Madam, the king is old enough himself
To give his censure;<sup>2</sup> these are no women's matters.

Q. Mar. If he be old enough, what needs your grace
To be protector of his excellence?

Glo. Madam, I am protector of the realm;
And at his pleasure will resign my place.

Suf. Resign it then, and leave thine insolence.
Since thou wert king (as who is king but thou?)
The commonwealth hath daily run to wrack:
The Dauphin hath prevail'd beyond the seas;
And all the peers and nobles of the realm
Have been as bondmen to thy sovereignty.

Car. The commons hast thou rack'd; the clergy's bags
Are lank and lean with thy extortion.

<sup>1</sup> Denay'd—denied. So in Twelfth Night :—

“My love can give no place, bide no denay.”

Censure—opinion.

Ten commandments. This phrase, which might more worthily fill the mouth of a lady of the fish-market, was common to the dramatists who wrote before the date of this play, and after. Thus, in “The Four P's” (1569)—

Som. Thy sumptuous buildings, and thy wife's attire,
Have cost a mass of public treasury.

Buck. Thy cruelty in execution,
Upon offenders, hath exceeded law,
And left thee to the mercy of the law.

Q. Mar. Thy sale of offices, and towns in France,
If they were known, as the suspect is great,
Would make thee quickly hop without thy head.

[Exit GLOSTER. The QUEEN drops her fan.

Give me my fan: What, minion! can you not?

[Gives the DUCHESS a box on the ear.

I cry you mercy, madam; was it you?

Duch. Was't I? yea, I it was, proud Frenchwoman
Could I come near your beauty with my nails,
I'd set my ten commandments<sup>3</sup> in your face.

K. Hen. Sweet aunt, be quiet; 'twas against her will.

Duch. Against her will! Good king, look to't in time;
She'll hamper thee, and dandle thee like a baby.
Though in this place most master wear no breeches,
She shall not strike dame Eleanor unreveng'd.

[Exit DUCHESS.

Buck. Lord cardinal, I will follow Eleanor,
And listen after Humphrey, how he proceeds:
She's tickled now: her fume needs no spurs,<sup>4</sup>
She'll gallop far<sup>5</sup> enough to her destruction.

[Exit BUCKINGHAM.

Re-enter GLOSTER.

Glo. Now, lords, my choler being over-blown,
With walking once about the quadrangle,
I come to talk of commonwealth affairs.

As for your spiteful false objections,
Prove them, and I lie open to the law:
But God in mercy so deal with my soul,
As I in duty love my king and country!
But, to the matter that we have in hand:
I say, my sovereign, York is meetest man
To be your regent in the realm of France.

Suf. Before we make election, give me leave
To show some reason, of no little force,
That York is most unmeet of any man.

York. I'll tell thee, Suffolk, why I am unmeet
First, for I cannot flatter thee in pride:
Next, if I be appointed for the place,
My lord of Somerset will keep me here,
Without discharge, money, or furniture,
Till France be won into the Dauphin's hands.
Last time, I danc'd attendance on his will,
Till Paris was besieg'd, famish'd, and lost.

War. That can I witness; and a fouler fact
Did never traitor in the land commit.

Suf. Peace, headstrong Warwick!

War. Image of pride, why should I hold my peace

Enter Servants of SUFFOLK, bringing in HORNER and PETER.

Suf. Because here is a man accus'd of treason
Pray God, the duke of York excuse himself!

York. Doth any one accuse York for a traitor?

K. Hen. What mean'st thou, Suffolk? Tell me: What are these?

“Now ten times I beseech him that he sits,
Thy wifes X com. may serche thy five wits.”

And in “Westward Hoe” (1607)—

“Your harpy has set his ten commandments on my back.”

<sup>4</sup> The first folio has fume needs; the second, fume can need.

Suf. Please it your majesty, this is the man
That doth accuse his master of high treason :
His words were these ;—that Richard, duke of York,
Was rightful heir unto the English crown ;
And that your majesty was an usurper.

K. Hen. Say, man, were these thy words ?

Hor. An't shall please your majesty, I never said nor thought any such matter : God is my witness, I am falsely accused by the villain.

Pet. By these ten bones,<sup>1</sup> my lords, [holding up his hands] he did speak them to me in the garret one night, as we were scouring my lord of York's armour.

York. Base dunghill villain and mechanical,
I'll have thy head for this thy traitor's speech :—
I do beseech your royal majesty,
Let him have all the rigour of the law.

Hor. Alas, my lord, hang me, if ever I spake the words.
My accuser is my prentice ; and when I did correct him for his fault the other day, he did vow upon his knees he would be even with me : I have good witness of this ; therefore, I beseech your majesty, do not cast away an honest man for a villain's accusation.

K. Hen. Uncle, what shall we say to this in law ?

Glo. This doom, my lord, if I may judge.
Let Somerset be regent o'er the French,
Because in York this breeds suspicion :
And let these have a day appointed them
For single combat, in convenient place ;
For he hath witness of his servant's malice :
This is the law, and this duke Humphrey's doom.<sup>2</sup>

Som. I humbly thank your royal majesty.

Hor. And I accept the combat willingly.

Pet. Alas, my lord, I cannot fight ; for God's sake, pity my case ! the spite of man prevaieth against me. O Lord, have mercy upon me ! I shall never be able to fight a blow : O Lord, my heart !

Glo. Sirrah, or you must fight, or else be hang'd.

K. Hen. Away with them to prison : and the day
Of combat shall be the last of the next month.—
Come, Somerset, we'll see thee sent away. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The same. The Duke of Gloster's Garden.

Enter MARGERY JOURDAIN, HUME, SOUTHWELL, and BOLINGBROKE.

Hume. Come, my masters ; the duchess, I tell you, expects performance of your promises.

Boling. Master Hume, we are therefore provided : Will her ladyship behold and hear our exorcisms ?

Hume. Ay : What else ? fear you not her courage.

Boling. I have heard her reported to be a woman of an invincible spirit : But it shall be convenient, master Hume, that you be by her aloft while we be busy below ; and so,
I pray you, go in God's name, and leave us. [Exit HUME.]
Mother Jourdain, be you prostrate, and grovel on the earth :—John Southwell, read you ; and let us to our work.

Enter DUCHESS, above.

Duch. Well said, my masters ; and welcome all. To this gear ; the sooner the better.

<sup>1</sup> Ten bones. This is an ancient adjuration.
In this place the following two lines are usually inserted :—

"K. Hen. Then be it so. My lord of Somerset,
We make your grace lord regent o'er the French."

The lines were found by Theobald in "The First Part of the Contention," and he introduced them because he thought that "duke Humphrey's doom" required the confirmation of King Henry. But Henry, having given the power of deciding to Gloster, both in the case of the armourer and of the regency, might be intended by the poet, on his revival of the play, to speak by the mouth of the protector. The scene as it stands is an exhibition of the almost kingly authority of Gloster

Boling. Patience, good lady ; wizards know their times :
Deep night, dark night, the silent of the night,<sup>3</sup>
The time of night when Troy was set on fire ;
The time when screech-owls cry, and ban-dogs howl,
And spirits walk, and ghosts break up their graves,
That time best fits the work we have in hand.
Madam, sit you, and fear not ; whom we raise,
We will make fast within a hallow'd verge

[*Here they perform the ceremonies appertaining, and make the circle ; BOLINGBROKE, or SOUTHWELL, reads,
"Conjuro te," &c. It thunders and lightens terribly ; then the Spirit riseth.*]

Spir. Adsum.

M. Fourd. Asmath,

By the eternal God, whose name and power
Thou tremblest at, answer that I shall ask ;
For, till thou speak, thou shalt not pass from hence.

Spir. Ask what thou wilt : That I had said and done !

Boling. "First of the king. What shall of him become ?"

[Reading out of a paper.]

Spir. The duke yet lives that Henry shall depose ;
But him outlive, and die a violent death.

[As the Spirit speaks, SOUTHWELL writes the answer.]

Boling. "What fates await the duke of Suffolk ?"

Spir. By water shall he die, and take his end.

Boling. "What shall befall the duke of Somerset ?"

Spir. Let him shun castles ;

Safer shall he be upon the sandy plains,
Than where castles mounted stand.
Have done, for more I hardly can endure.

Boling. Descend to darkness and the burning lake :
False fiend, avoid !

[Thunder and lightning. Spirit descends.]

Enter YORK and BUCKINGHAM, hastily, with their Guards, and others.

York. Lay hands upon these traitors, and their trash.
Beldame, I think, we watch'd you at an inch.—
What, madam, are you there ? the king and commonweal
Are deeply indebted for this piece of pains ;
My lord protector will, I doubt it not,
See you well guerdon'd for these good deserts.

Duch. Not half so bad as thine to England's king,
Injurious duke ; that threat'st where is no cause.

Buck. True, madam, none at all. What call you this ?

[Showing her the papers.]

Away with them ; let them be clapp'd up close,
And kept asunder :—You, madam, shall with us :—
Stafford, take her to thee. [Exit DUCHESS from above.]

We'll see your trinkets here all forthcoming ;

All, away ! [Exeunt Guards, with SOUTH., BOLING, &c.]

York. Lord Buckingham, methinks, you watch'd her
well :

A pretty plot, well chosen to build upon :
Now, pray, my lord, let's see the devil's writ.
What have we here ?

[Reads.]

"The duke yet lives that Henry shall depose ;
But him outlive, and die a violent death."

Why, this is just,

Aio te, Æacida, Romanos vincere posse.

Well, to the rest :

"Tell me, what fate awaits the duke of Suffolk ?"

immediately before his fall. Mr. Dyce restores the lines, because "the king has not given the power of deciding to Gloster, but merely puts a question to him." Mr. Grant White holds that "the terms of that question clearly imply that Gloster is to decide the matter, and he pronounces doom, with the mere ceremonious expression of deference, 'if I may judge.' And that his judgment was considered final is plain."

"Dark night, dread night, the silence of the night."

The use of silent as a noun is wonderfully fine, and reminds us of "the vast of night" in The Tempest.

By water shall he die, and take his end.—
 What shall betide the duke of Somerset?
 Let him shun castles;
 Safer shall he be upon the sandy plains,
 Than where castles mounted stand.”
 Come, come, my lords;
 These oracles are hardily<sup>1</sup> attain'd,
 And hardly understood.
 The king is now in progress toward Saint Alban's,
 With him the husband of this lovely lady:
 Thither go these news, as fast as horse can carry them;
 A sorry breakfast for my lord protector.
Buck. Your grace shall give me leave, my lord of York,
 To be the post, in hope of his reward.
York. At your pleasure, my good lord.—
 Who's within there, ho!

Enter a Servant.

Invite my lords of Salisbury, and Warwick,
 To sup with me to-morrow night.—Away! [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—Saint Alban's.

Enter KING HENRY, QUEEN MARGARET, GLOSTER, CARDINAL, and SUFFOLK, with Falconers hollaring.

Q. Mar. Believe me, lords, for flying at the brook,<sup>2</sup>
 I saw not better sport these seven years' day:
 Yet, by your leave, the wind was very high;
 And ten to one old Joan had not gone out.<sup>3</sup>
K. Hen. But what a point, my lord, your falcon made,
 And what a pitch she flew above the rest!—
 To see how God in all his creatures works!
 Yea, man and birds are fain<sup>4</sup> of climbing high.
Suf. No marvel, an it like your majesty,
 My lord protector's hawks do tower so well;
 They know their master loves to be aloft,
 And bears his thoughts above his falcon's pitch.
Glo. My lord, 'tis but a base ignoble mind
 That mounts no higher than a bird can soar.
Car. I thought as much; he would be above the clouds.
Glo. Ay, my lord cardinal: How think you by that?
 Were it not good your grace could fly to heaven?
K. Hen. The treasury of everlasting joy!
Car. Thy heaven is on earth; thine eyes and thoughts
 Beat on a crown,<sup>5</sup> the treasure of thy heart;
 Pernicious protector, dangerous peer,
 That smooth'st it so with king and commonweal!
Glo. What, cardinal, is your priesthood grown peremp-tory?
Tantæne animis cælestibus iræ?
 Churchmen so hot? good uncle, hide such malice;
 With such holiness can you do it?
Suf. No malice, sir; no more than well becomes
 So good a quarrel, and so bad a peer.
Glo. As who, my lord?
Suf. Why, as you, my lord;
 An't like your lordly lord-protectorship.
Glo. Why, Suffolk, England knows thine insolence.
Q. Mar. And thy ambition, Gloster.

<sup>3</sup> Percy explains that “the wind was so high it was ten to one that old Joan would not have taken her flight at the game.”

<sup>4</sup> Fain. Steevens says that fain here signifies fond; and he quotes Heywood's “Epigrams on Proverbs:”—

K. Hen. I prithee, peace,
 Good queen; and whet not on these furious peers,
 For blessed are the peacemakers on earth.
Car. Let me be blessed for the peace I make,
 Against this proud protector with my sword!
Glo. 'Faith, holy uncle, 'would 'twere come to that!
[Aside to the CARDINAL.]
Car. Marry, when thou dar'st. [Aside.]
Glo. Make up no factious numbers for the matter,
 In thine own person answer thy abuse. [Aside.]
Car. Ay, where thou dar'st not peep: an if thou dar'st,
 This evening, on the east side of the grove. [Aside.]
K. Hen. How now, my lords?
Car. Believe me, cousin Gloster,
 Had not your man put up the fowl so suddenly,
 We had had more sport.—Come with thy two-hand sword.
[Aside to GLO.]
Glo. True, uncle.
Car. Are you advis'd?—the east side of the grove?
Glo. Cardinal, I am with you. [Aside.]
K. Hen. Why, how now, uncle Gloster!
Glo. Talking of hawking; nothing else, my lord.—
 Now, by God's mother, priest, I'll shave your crown for this,
 Or all my fence shall fail. [Aside.]
Car. Medice teipsum;
 Protector, see to't well, protect yourself. [Aside.]
K. Hen. The winds grow high; so do your stomachs, lords.
 How irksome is this music to my heart:
 When such strings jar, what hope of harmony?
 I pray, my lords, let me compound this strife.

Enter One, crying, “A miracle!”

Glo. What means this noise?
 Fellow, what miracle dost thou proclaim?
One. A miracle! a miracle!
Suf. Come to the king, and tell him what miracle.
One. Forsooth, a blind man at Saint Alban's shrine
 Within this half-hour, hath receiv'd his sight;
 A man that ne'er saw in his life before.
K. Hen. Now, God be prais'd! that to believing souls
 Gives light in darkness, comfort in despair!

Enter the Mayor of Saint Alban's, and his Brethren; and SIMPCOX, borne between two Persons in a chair; his Wife and a great multitude following.

Car. Here come the townsmen on procession,
 To present your highness with the man.
K. Hen. Great is his comfort in this earthly vale,
 Although by his sight his sin be multiplied.
Glo. Stand by, my masters, bring him near the king;
 His highness' pleasure is to talk with him.
K. Hen. Good fellow, tell us here the circumstance
 That we for thee may glorify the Lord.
 What, hast thou been long blind, and now restor'd?
Simp. Born blind, an't please your grace.
Wife. Ay, indeed, was he.
Suf. What woman is this?
Wife. His wife, an't like your worship.
Glo. Hadst thou been his mother thou couldst have better told.
K. Hen. Where wert thou born?

“Fayre words make foolles faine.”

Surely in this quotation fain means glad, the Saxon meaning. And this, it appears to us, is the signification in the passage before us.
<sup>5</sup> Beat on a crown—are intent on a crown. This fine expression may be explained by a passage in The Tempest:—

“Do not infest your mind with beating on
 The strangeness of this business.”

Simp. At Berwick in the north, an't like your grace.

K. Hen. Poor soul! God's goodness hath been great to thee:

Let never day nor night unhallow'd pass,
But still remember what the Lord hath done.

Q. Mar. Tell me, good fellow, cam'st thou here by chance,

Or of devotion, to this holy shrine?

Simp. God knows, of pure devotion; being call'd
A hundred times, and oftener, in my sleep
By good Saint Alban; who said,—“Simpcox, come;
Come, offer at my shrine, and I will help thee.”

Wife. Most true, forsooth; and many time and oft Myself have heard a voice to call him so.

Car. What, art thou lame?

Simp. Ay, God Almighty help me!

Suf. How cam'st thou so?

Simp. A fall off of a tree.

Wife. A plum-tree, master.

Glo. How long hast thou been blind?

Simp. O, born so, master.

Glo. What, and wouldst climb a tree?

Simp. But that in all my life, when I was a youth.

Wife. Too true; and bought his climbing very dear.

Glo. 'Mass, thou lov'dst plums well, that wouldst venture so.

Simp. Alas, good master, my wife desir'd some damsons,
And made me climb, with danger of my life.

Glo. A subtle knave! but yet it shall not serve.—
Let me see thine eyes:—wink now; now open them:—
In my opinion yet thou seest not well.

Simp. Yes, master, clear as day; I thank God and Saint Alban.

Glo. Say'st thou me so? What colour is this cloak of?

Simp. Red, master; red as blood.

Glo. Why, that's well said: What colour is my gown of?

Simp. Black, forsooth; coal-black, as jet.

K. Hen. Why then thou know'st what colour jet is of?

Suf. And yet, I think, jet did he never see.

Glo. But cloaks and gowns, before this day, a many.

Wife. Never, before this day, in all his life.

Glo. Tell me, sirrah, what's my name?

Simp. Alas, master, I know not.

Glo. What's his name?

Simp. I know not.

Glo. Nor his?

Simp. No, indeed, master.

Glo. What's thine own name?

Simp. Saunder Simpcox, an if it please you, master.

Glo. Then, Saunder, sit there, the lyingest knave in Christendom. If thou hadst been born blind, thou might'st as well have known all our names, as thus to name the several colours we do wear. Sight may distinguish of colours; but suddenly to nominate them all, it is impossible.—My lords, Saint Alban here hath done a miracle; and would ye not think that cunning to be great that could restore this cripple to his legs again?<sup>1</sup>

Simp. O master, that you could!

Glo. My masters of Saint Alban's, have you not beadles in your town, and things called whips?

May. Yes, my lord, if it please your grace.

Glo. Then send for one presently.

May. Sirrah, go fetch the beadle hither straight.

[Exit an Attendant.]

Glo. Now fetch me a stool hither by and by. [A stool brought out.] Now, sirrah, if you mean to save yourself from whipping, leap me over this stool and run away.

Simp. Alas, master, I am not able to stand alone; you go about to torture me in vain.

Re-enter Attendant, with the Beadle.

Glo. Well, sir, we must have you find your legs. Sirrah beadle, whip him till he leap over that same stool.

Bead. I will, my lord.—Come on, sirrah; off with your doublet quickly.

Simp. Alas, master, what shall I do? I am not able to stand.

[After the Beadle hath hit him once, he leaps over the stool, and runs away; and the people follow, and cry, “A miracle!”]

K. Hen. O God, seest thou this, and bear'st so long?

Q. Mar. It made me laugh to see the villain run.

Glo. Follow the knave; and take this drab away.

Wife. Alas, sir, we did it for pure need.

Glo. Let them be whipped through every market town, till they come to Berwick, from whence they came.

[Exeunt Mayor, Beadle, Wife, &c.]

Car. Duke Humphrey has done a miracle to-day.

Suf. True; made the lame to leap, and fly away.

Glo. But you have done more miracles than I; You made in a day, my lord, whole towns to fly.

Enter BUCKINGHAM.

K. Hen. What tidings with our cousin Buckingham?

Buck. Such as my heart doth tremble to unfold.

A sort<sup>2</sup> of naughty persons, lewdly<sup>3</sup> bent,—
Under the countenance and confederacy
Of lady Eleanor, the protector's wife,
The ringleader and head of all this rout,—
Have practis'd dangerously against your state,
Dealing with witches, and with conjurers:
Whom we have apprehended in the fact;
Raising up wicked spirits from under ground,
Demanding of king Henry's life and death,
And other of your highness' privy council,
As more at large your grace shall understand.

Car. And so, my lord protector, by this means
Your lady is forthcoming yet at London.
This news, I think, hath turn'd your weapon's edge;
'Tis like, my lord, you will not keep your hour.

[Aside to GLOSTER.]

Glo. Ambitious churchman, leave to afflict my heart!
Sorrow and grief have vanquish'd all my powers;
And vanquish'd as I am I yield to thee,
Or to the meanest groom.

K. Hen. O God, what mischiefs work the wicked ones;
Heaping confusion on their own heads thereby!

Q. Mar. Gloster, see here the tainture of thy nest;
And look thyself be faultless, thou wert best.

Glo. Madam, for myself, to heaven I do appeal,
How I have lov'd my king and commonweal:
And for my wife, I know not how it stands;
Sorry I am to hear what I have heard;
Noble she is; but if she have forgot
Honour and virtue, and convers'd with such
As, like to pitch, defile nobility,
I banish her my bed and company;
And give her as a prey to law, and shame,
That hath dishonour'd Gloster's honest name.

K. Hen. Well, for this night we will repose us here:
To-morrow toward London, back again,
To look into this business thoroughly,
And call these foul offenders to their answers;
And poise the cause in justice' equal scales,
Whose beam stands sure, whose rightful cause prevails.

[Flourish. Exeunt.]

Sort—company.

<sup>3</sup> Lewdly—wickedly.

SCENE II.—London. The Duke of York's Garden.

Enter YORK, SALISBURY, and WARWICK.

York. Now, my good lords of Salisbury and Warwick,
Our simple supper ended, give me leave,
In this close walk, to satisfy myself,
In craving your opinion of my title,
Which is infallible, to England's crown.

Sal. My lord, I long to hear it at full.

War. Sweet York, begin: and if thy claim be good,
The Nevils are thy subjects to command.

York. Then thus—

Edward the Third, my lords, had seven sons:
The first, Edward the Black Prince, prince of Wales;
The second, William of Hatfield; and the third,
Lionel, duke of Clarence; next to whom
Was John of Gaunt, the duke of Lancaster;
The fifth was Edmund Langley, duke of York;
The sixth was Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloster;
William of Windsor was the seventh, and last.
Edward, the Black Prince, died before his father;
And left behind him Richard, his only son,
Who, after Edward the Third's death, reign'd as king;
Till Henry Bolingbroke, duke of Lancaster,
The eldest son and heir of John of Gaunt,
Crown'd by the name of Henry the Fourth,
Seiz'd on the realm; depos'd the rightful king;
Sent his poor queen to France from whence she came,
And him to Pomfret; where, as all you know,
Harmless Richard was murder'd traitorously.

War. Father, the duke hath told the truth;
Thus got the house of Lancaster the crown.

York. Which now they hold by force, and not by right;
For Richard, the first son's heir, being dead,
The issue of the next son should have reign'd.

Sal. But William of Hatfield died without an heir.

York. The third son, duke of Clarence, (from whose line
I claim the crown,) had issue—Philippe, a daughter,
Who married Edmund Mortimer, earl of March
Edmund had issue—Roger, earl of March:
Roger had issue—Edmund, Anne, and Eleanor.

Sal. This Edmund, in the reign of Bolingbroke,
As I have read, laid claim unto the crown;
And but for Owen Glendower had been king,
Who kept him in captivity till he died.
But, to the rest.

York. His eldest sister, Anne,
My mother, being heir unto the crown,
Married Richard earl of Cambridge; who was son
To Edmund Langley, Edward the Third's fifth son.
By her I claim the kingdom: she was heir
To Roger earl of March; who was the son
Of Edmund Mortimer; who married Philippe,
Sole daughter unto Lionel duke of Clarence:
So if the issue of the elder son
Succeed before the younger, I am king.

War. What plain proceedings are more plain than this?
Henry doth claim the crown from John of Gaunt,
The fourth son; York claims it from the third.
Till Lionel's issue fails, his should not reign:
It fails not yet; but flourishes in thee,
And in thy sons, fair slips of such a stock.
Then, father Salisbury, kneel we together;
And, in this private plot,<sup>1</sup> be we the first
That shall salute our rightful sovereign,
With honour of his birthright to the crown.

Both. Long live our sovereign Richard, England's king!

York. We thank you, lords. But I am not your king
Till I be crown'd; and that my sword be stain'd

With heart-blood of the house of Lancaster:
And that's not suddenly to be perform'd;
But with advice, and silent secrecy.
Do you, as I do, in these dangerous days,
Wink at the duke of Suffolk's insolence,
At Beaufort's pride, at Somerset's ambition,
At Buckingham, and all the crew of them,
Till they have snar'd the shepherd of the flock,
That virtuous prince, the good duke Humphrey:
'Tis that they seek; and they, in seeking that,
Shall find their deaths, if York can prophesy.

Sal. My lord, break we off; we know your mind at full.

War. My heart assures me that the earl of Warwick
Shall one day make the duke of York a king.

York. And, Nevil, this I do assure myself,— Richard shall live to make the earl of Warwick
The greatest man in England but the king. [Exit.

SCENE III.—The same. A Hall of Justice.

Trumpets sounded. Enter KING HENRY, QUEEN MARGARET, GLOSTER, YORK, SUFFOLK, and SALISBURY; the DUCHESS OF GLOSTER, MARGERY JOURDAIN, SOUTHWELL, HUME, and BOLINGBROKE, under guard.

K. Hen. Stand forth, dame Eleanor Cobham, Gloster's wife:

In sight of God, and us, your guilt is great;
Receive the sentence of the law, for sins
Such as by God's book are adjudg'd to death.
You four, from hence to prison back again;

[To JOURD., &c.]

From thence, unto the place of execution:
The witch in Smithfield shall be burn'd to ashes,
And you three shall be strangled on the gallows.
You, madam, for you are more nobly born,
Despoiled of your honour in your life,
Shall, after three days' open penance done,
Live in your country here in banishment,
With sir John Stanley, in the Isle of Man.

Duch. Welcome is banishment, welcome were my death.

Glo. Eleanor, the law, thou seest, hath judg'd thee;
I cannot justify whom the law condemns.—

[Exit the DUCHESS, and the other Prisoners guarded.]

Mine eyes are full of tears, my heart of grief.
Ah, Humphrey, this dishonour in thine age
Will bring thy head with sorrow to the ground!
I beseech your majesty give me leave to go;
Sorrow would solace, and mine age would ease.

K. Hen. Stay, Humphrey duke of Gloster: ere thou go
Give up thy staff; Henry will to himself
Protector be: and God shall be my hope,
My stay, my guide, and lantern to my feet;
And go in peace, Humphrey; no less belov'd
Than when thou wert protector to thy king.

Q. Mar. I see no reason why a king of years
Should be to be protected like a child.
God and king Henry govern England's helm:<sup>2</sup>
Give up your staff, sir, and the king his realm.

Glo. My staff?—here, noble Henry, is my staff:
As willingly do I the same resign,
As ere thy father Henry made it mine;
And even as willingly at thy feet I leave it,
As others would ambitiously receive it.
Farewell, good king: when I am dead and gone,
May honourable peace attend thy throne. [Exit.

Q. Mar. Why, now is Henry king, and Margaret queen;
And Humphrey duke of Gloster scarce himself,
That bears so shrewd a maim; two pulls at once,—

His lady banish'd, and a limb lopp'd off;
This staff of honour raught:<sup>1</sup>—There let it stand,
Where it best fits to be, in Henry's hand.

Suf. Thus droops this lofty pine and hangs his sprays;
Thus Eleanor's pride dies in her youngest days.

York. Lords, let him go:—Please it your majesty,
This is the day appointed for the combat;
And ready are the appellant and defendant,
The armourer and his man, to enter the lists,
So please your highness to behold the fight.

Q. Mar. Ay, good my lord; for purposely therefore Left I the court, to see this quarrel tried.

K. Hen. O' God's name, see the lists and all things fit;
Here let them end it, and God defend the right!

York. I never saw a fellow worse bested.
Or more afraid to fight, than is the appellant,
The servant of this armourer, my lords.

Enter, on one side, HORNER, and his neighbours, drinking to him so much that he is drunk; and he enters bearing his staff with a sand-bag fastened to it; a drum before him at the other side, PETER, with a drum and a similar staff accompanied by Prentices drinking to him.

1 Neigh. Here, neighbour Horner, I drink to you in a cup of sack. And fear not, neighbour, you shall do well enough.

2 Neigh. And here, neighbour, here's a cup of charneco.<sup>2</sup>

3 Neigh. And here's a pot of good double beer, neighbour: drink, and fear not your man.

Hor. Let it come, i' faith, and I'll pledge you all; and a mug for Peter!

1 Pren. Here, Peter, I drink to thee; and be not afraid.

2 Pren. Be merry, Peter, and fear not thy master: fight for credit of the prentices.

Peter. I thank you all: drink, and pray for me, I pray you; for I think I have taken my last draught in this world.—Here, Robin, an if I die I give thee my apron; and, Will, thou shalt have my hammer:—and here, Tom, take all the money that I have. O Lord, bless me, I pray God! for I am never able to deal with my master, he hath learnt so much fence already.

Sal. Come, leave your drinking, and fall to blows.—Sirrah, what's thy name?

Peter. Peter, forsooth.

Sal. Peter! what more?

Peter. Thump.

Sal. Thump! then see thou thump thy master well.

Hor. Masters, I am come hither, as it were, upon my man's instigation, to prove him a knave and myself an honest man: and touching the duke of York, I will take my death, I never meant him any ill, nor the king, nor the queen: And therefore, Peter, have at thee with a downright blow, [as Bevis of Southampton fell upon Ascapart.<sup>3a</sup>]

York. Despatch;—this knave's tongue begins to double. Sound trumpets alarum to the combatants.

[Alarum. They fight, and PETER strikes down his master.]

Hor. Hold, Peter, hold! I confess, I confess treason.

[Dies.]

York. Take away his weapon:—Fellow, thank God, and the good wine in thy master's way.

Peter. O God! have I overcome mine enemy in this presence? O Peter, thou hast prevailed in right!

K. Hen. Go, take hence that traitor from our sight;
For, by his death, we do perceive his guilt:

And God, in justice, hath reveal'd to us
The truth and innocence of this poor fellow,
Which he had thought to have murder'd wrongfully.
Come, fellow, follow us for thy reward. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The same. A Street.

Enter GLOSTER and Servants, in mourning cloaks.

Glo. Thus, sometimes, hath the brightest day a cloud;
And after summer ever more succeeds
Barren winter, with his wrathful nipping cold:
So cares and joys abound as seasons fleet.
Sirs, what's o'clock?

Serv. Ten, my lord.

Glo. Ten is the hour that was appointed me,
To watch the coming of my punish'd duchess;
Uneath<sup>4</sup> may she endure the flinty streets,
To tread them with her tender-feeling feet.
Sweet Nell, ill can thy noble mind abrook
The abject people, gazing on thy face,
With envious<sup>5</sup> looks still laughing at thy shame,
That erst did follow thy proud chariot wheels,
When thou didst ride in triumph through the streets.
But soft! I think she comes; and I'll prepare
My tear-stain'd eyes to see her miseries.

Enter the DUCHESS OF GLOSTER, in a white sheet, with papers pinned upon her back, her feet bare, and a taper burning in her hand; SIR JOHN STANLEY, a Sheriff, and Officers.

Serv. So please your grace, we'll take her from the sheriff.

Glo. No, stir not, for your lives; let her pass by.

Duch. Come you, my lord, to see my open shame?
Now thou dost penance too. Look, how they gaze!
See, how the giddy multitude do point,
And nod their heads, and throw their eyes on thee!
Ah, Gloster, hide thee from their hateful looks;
And in thy closet pent up rue my shame,
And ban thine enemies, both mine and thine.

Glo. Be patient, gentle Nell; forget this grief.

Duch. Ah, Gloster, teach me to forget myself:
For, whilst I think I am thy married wife,
And thou a prince, protector of this land,
Methinks I should not thus be led along,
Mail'd up in shame, with papers on my back;
And follow'd with a rabble, that rejoice
To see my tears, and hear my deep-fet<sup>6</sup> groans.
The ruthless flint doth cut my tender feet;
And when I start the envious people laugh,
And bid me be advised how I tread.
Ah, Humphrey, can I bear this shameful yoke?
Trow'st thou that e'er I'll look upon the world;
Or count them happy that enjoy the sun?
No; dark shall be my light, and night my day
To think upon my pomp shall be my hell.
Sometime I'll say, I am duke Humphrey's wife;
And he a prince, and ruler of the land:
Yet so he rul'd, and such a prince he was,
As he stood by, whilst I, his forlorn duchess,
Was made a wonder, and a pointing stock,
To every idle rascal follower.
But be thou mild, and blush not at my shame;
Nor stir at nothing, till the axe of death

<sup>1</sup> Raught. This is used by Chaucer and Spenser in the sense of reached; it certainly means here taken away, as in Peele's "Arraignment of Paris:"—

"How Pluto raught queen Ceres' daughter thence."

Charneco—the name of a wine.

of the Contention." The story of Bevis and Ascapart was a favourite legend. (See Illustrations of Act II.)

Hang over thee, as sure it shortly will.
For Suffolk,—he that can do all in all
With her, that hateth thee, and hates us all,—
And York, and impious Beaufort, that false priest,
Have all lim'd bushes to betray thy wings,
And, fly thou how thou canst, they'll tangle thee :
But fear not thou until thy foot be snar'd,
Nor never seek prevention of thy foes.

Glo. Ah, Nell, forbear ; thou aimest all awry ;
I must offend before I be attainted :
And had I twenty times so many foes,
And each of them had twenty times their power,
All these could not procure me any scath,<sup>1</sup>
So long as I am loyal, true, and crimeless.
Wouldst have me rescue thee from this reproach ?
Why, yet thy scandal were not wip'd away,
But I in danger for the breach of law.
Thy greatest help is quiet, gentle Nell :
I pray thee, sort thy heart to patience ;
These few days' wonder will be quickly worn.

Enter a Herald.

Her. I summon your grace to his majesty's parliament, holden at Bury the first of this next month.

Glo. And my consent ne'er ask'd herein before !
This is close dealing.—Well, I will be there.

[Exit Herald.]

My Nell, I take my leave :—and, master sheriff,
Let not her penance exceed the king's commission.

Sher. An't please your grace, here my commission stays :
And sir John Stanley is appointed now
To take her with him to the Isle of Man.

Glo. Must you, sir John, protect my lady here ?

Stan. So am I given in charge, may't please your grace.

Glo. Entreat her not the worse, in that I pray
You use her well :

The world may laugh again ; and I may live
To do you kindness, if you do it her.

And so, sir John, farewell.

Duch. What, gone, my lord ; and bid me not farewell ?

Glo. Witness my tears, I cannot stay to speak.

[Exeunt GLOSTER and Servants.]

Duch. Art thou gone too ? All comfort go with thee,
For none abides with me : my joy is—death ;
Death, at whose name I oft have been afeard,
Because I wish'd this world's eternity.—
Stanley, I prithee, go, and take me hence ;
I care not whither, for I beg no favour,
Only convey me where thou art commanded.

Stan. Why, madam, that is to the Isle of Man ;
There to be used according to your state.

Duch. That's bad enough, for I am but reproach :
And shall I then be used reproachfully ?

Stan. Like to a duchess, and duke Humphrey's lady,
According to that state you shall be used.

Duch. Sheriff, farewell, and better than I fare ;
Although thou hast been conduct of my shame !

Sher. It is my office ; and, madam, pardon me.

Duch. Ay, ay, farewell : thy office is discharg'd.
Come, Stanley, shall we go ?

Stan. Madam, your penance done, throw off this sheet,
And go we to attire you for our journey.

Duch. My shame will not be shifted with my sheet :
No, it will hang upon my richest robes,
And show itself, attire me how I can.

Go, lead the way ; I long to see my prison. [Exeunt.]

RECENT NEW READING.

Sc. III. p. 687.—“ Q. Mar. I see no reason why a king of years
Should be to be protected like a child.

<sup>1</sup> Scath—harm.

God and king Henry govern England's helm ;
Give up your staff, sir, and the king his realm.

Glo. My staff ?—here, noble Henry, is my staff :
As willingly do I the same resign.”

“ Q. Mar. I see no reason why a king of years
Should be protected, like a child, by peers.
God and king Henry govern England's helm ;
Give up your staff, sir, and the king his realm.

“ Glo. My staff ?—here, noble Henry, is my staff :
To think I fain would keep it makes me laugh.
As willingly,” &c.—Collier.

The broken-hearted protector has just seen his wife banished :—

“ Mine eyes are full of tears, my heart of grief.”

The king has demanded the staff, but with words of kindness. Margaret interposes—

“ I see no reason why a king of years
Should be to be protected like a child.”

The Corrector of Mr. Collier's folio, to obtain a rhyme, inserts by peers ; and, two lines onward, adds the new line. Is it exactly adapted to the situation where it is inserted ? Is this entirely consistent with what precedes and follows, in the bearing of this dishonoured man, bowing his head “ in sorrow to the ground ?”

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Abbey at Bury.

Enter to the Parliament, KING HENRY, QUEEN MARGARET, CARDINAL BEAUFORT, SUFFOLK, YORK, BUCKING-HAM, and others.

K. Hen. I muse,<sup>2</sup> my lord of Gloster is not come :
'Tis not his wont to be the hindmost man,
Whate'er occasion keeps him from us now.

Q. Mar. Can you not see ? or will you not observe
The strangeness of his alter'd countenance ?

With what a majesty he bears himself ;
How insolent of late he is become,
How proud, peremptory, and unlike himself ?
We know the time since he was mild and affable ;
And, if we did but glance a far-off look,
Immediately he was upon his knee,
That all the court admir'd him for submission ;
But meet him now, and, be it in the morn,
When every one will give the time of day,
He knits his brow, and shows an angry eye,
And passeth by with stiff unbowed knee,
Disdaining duty that to us belongs.

Small curs are not regarded when they grin ;
But great men tremble when the lion roars ;
And Humphrey is no little man in England.
First, note, that he is near you in descent ;
And should you fall, he is the next will mount.
Me seemeth then, it is no policy,—

Respecting what a rancorous mind he bears,
And his advantage following your decease,—
That he should come about your royal person,
Or be admitted to your highness' council.
By flattery hath he won the commons' heart ;
And, when he please to make commotion,
'Tis to be fear'd they all will follow him.

Now 'tis the spring, and weeds are shallow-rooted ;
Suffer them now, and they'll o'ergrow the garden,
And choke the herbs for want of husbandry.
The reverent care I bear unto my lord
Made me collect these dangers in the duke.
If it be fond, call it a woman's fear ;
Which fear, if better reasons can supplant,
I will subscribe and say—I wrong'd the duke.
My lord of Suffolk,—Buckingham,—and York,—
Reprove my allegation, if you can ;
Or else conclude my words effectual.

Suf. Well hath your highness seen into this duke ;
And had I first been put to speak my mind,

I think I should have told your grace's tale.
The duchess, by his subornation,
Upon my life, began her devilish practices :
Or, if he were not privy to those faults,
Yet, by reputed of his high descent,
(As next the king he was successive heir,)
And such high vaunts of his nobility,
Did instigate the bedlam brain-sick duchess,
By wicked means to frame our sovereign's fall.
Smooth runs the water where the brook is deep ;
And in his simple show he harbours treason.
The fox barks not when he would steal the lamb.
No, no, my sovereign ; Gloster is a man
Unsounded yet, and full of deep deceit.

Car. Did he not, contrary to form of law,
Devise strange deaths for small offences done ?

York. And did he not, in his protectorship,
Levy great sums of money through the realm,
For soldiers' pay in France, and never sent it ?
By means whereof the towns each day revolted.

Buck. Tut ! These are petty faults to faults unknown,
Which time will bring to light in smooth duke Humphrey.

K. Hen. My lords, at once. The care you have of us,
To mow down thorns that would annoy our foot,
Is worthy praise : But shall I speak my conscience
Our kinsman Gloster is as innocent
From meaning treason to our royal person,
As is the sucking lamb, or harmless dove :
The duke is virtuous, mild ; and too well given,
To dream on evil, or to work my downfall.

Q. Mar. Ah, what's more dangerous than this fond affiance !

Seems he a dove ? his feathers are but borrow'd,
For he's disposed as the hateful raven.
Is he a lamb ? his skin is surely lent him,
For he's inclin'd as is the ravenous wolf.<sup>1</sup>
Who cannot steal a shape that means deceit ?
Take heed, my lord ; the welfare of us all
Hangs on the cutting short that fraudulent man.

Enter SOMERSET.

Som. All health unto my gracious sovereign !

K. Hen. Welcome, lord Somerset. What news from France ?

Som. That all your interest in those territories
Is utterly bereft you ; all is lost.

K. Hen. Cold news, lord Somerset : But God's will be done !

York. Cold news for me ; for I had hope of France,
As firmly as I hope for fertile England.
Thus are my blossoms blasted in the bud,
And caterpillars eat my leaves away :
But I will remedy this gear ere long,
Or sell my title for a glorious grave.

[Aside.

Enter GLOSTER.

Glo. All happiness unto my lord the king !
Pardon, my liege, that I have stay'd so long.

Suf. Nay, Gloster, know that thou art come too soon,
Unless thou wert more loyal than thou art :
I do arrest thee of high treason here.

Glo. Well, Suffolk's duke,<sup>2</sup> thou shalt not see me blush,
Nor change my countenance for this arrest ;
A heart unspotted is not easily daunted.

The purest spring is not so free from mud
As I am clear from treason to my sovereign :
Who can accuse me ? wherein am I guilty ?

York. 'Tis thought, my lord, that you took bribes of France,

And, being protector, stay'd the soldiers' pay ;
By means whereof his highness hath lost France.

Glo. Is it but thought so ? What are they that think it ?

I never robb'd the soldiers of their pay,
Nor ever had one penny bribe from France.
So help me God, as I have watch'd the night,—
Ay, night by night,—in studying good for England !
That do it that e'er I wrested from the king,
Or any groat I hoarded to my use,
Be brought against me at my trial day !
No ! many a pound of mine own proper store,
Because I would not tax the needy commons,
Have I dis-pursed to the garrisons,
And never ask'd for restitution.

Car. It serves you well, my lord, to say so much.

Glo. I say no more than truth, so help me God !

York. In your protectorship, you did devise Strange tortures for offenders, never heard of,
That England was defam'd by tyranny.

Glo. Why, 'tis well known, that whiles I was protector
Pity was all the fault that was in me ;
For I should melt at an offender's tears,
And lowly words were ransom for their fault.
Unless it were a bloody murderer,
Or foul felonious thief, that fleec'd poor passengers,
I never gave them condign punishment :
Murder, indeed, that bloody sin, I tortur'd
Above the felon, or what trespass else.

Suf. My lord, these faults are easy,<sup>3</sup> quickly answer'd :
But mightier crimes are laid unto your charge,
Whereof you cannot easily purge yourself.
I do arrest you in his highness' name ;
And here commit you to my lord cardinal
To keep, until your further time of trial.

K. Hen. My lord of Gloster, 'tis my special hope,
That you will clear yourself from all suspects ;<sup>4</sup>
My conscience tells me you are innocent.

Glo. Ah, gracious lord, these days are dangerous.
Virtue is chok'd with foul ambition,
And charity chas'd hence by rancour's hand ;
Foul subornation is predominant,
And equity exil'd your highness' land.
I know their complot is to have my life ;
And, if my death might make this island happy,
And prove the period of their tyranny,
I would expend it with all willingness :
But mine is made the prologue to their play ;
For thousands more, that yet suspect no peril,
Will not conclude their plotted tragedy.
Beaufort's red sparkling eyes blab his heart's malice,
And Suffolk's cloudy brow his stormy hate ;
Sharp Buckingham unburdens with his tongue
The envious load that lies upon his heart ;
And dogged York, that reaches at the moon,
Whose overweening arm I have pluck'd back,
By false accuse doth level at my life :
And you, my sovereign lady, with the rest,
Causeless have laid disgraces on my head ;
And, with your best endeavour, have stirr'd up
My liefest<sup>5</sup> liege to be mine enemy :
Ay, all of you have laid your heads together.
Myself had notice of your conventicles,

“ Well, Suffolk, thou shalt not see me blush.”

In the second folio the defect of the metre is remedied by the addition of yet :

“ Well, Suffolk, yet,” &c. In “ The First Part of the Contention ” we have the line—

“ Why, Suffolk's duke, thou shalt not see me blush.”

And all to make away my guiltless life :
I shall not want false witness to condemn me,
Nor store of treasons to augment my guilt ;
The ancient proverb will be well effected,—
A staff is quickly found to beat a dog.

Car. My liege, his railing is intolerable :
If those that care to keep your royal person
From treason's secret knife, and traitors' rage,
Be thus upbraided, chid, and rated at,
And the offender granted scope of speech,
'Twill make them cool in zeal unto your grace.

Suf. Hath he not twit our sovereign lady here,
With ignominious words, though clerkly couch'd,
As if she had suborned some to swear
False allegations to o'erthrow his state ?

Q. Mar. But I can give the loser leave to chide.

Glo. Far truer spoke than meant : I lose, indeed ;—
Beshrew the winners, for they play'd me false !
And well such losers may have leave to speak.

Buck. He'll wrest the sense, and hold us here all day :
Lord cardinal, he is your prisoner.

Car. Sirs, take away the duke, and guard him sure.

Glo. Ah, thus king Henry throws away his crutch,
Before his legs be firm to bear his body :
Thus is the shepherd beaten from thy side,
And wolves are gnarling who shall gnaw thee first.
Ah, that my fear were false ! ah, that it were !
For, good king Henry, thy decay I fear.

[Exeunt Attendants, with GLOSTER.]

K. Hen. My lords, what to your wisdoms seemeth best,
Do, or undo, as if ourself were here.

Q. Mar. What, will your highness leave the parliament ?

K. Hen. Ay, Margaret ; my heart is drown'd with grief,
Whose flood begins to flow within mine eyes ;
My body round engirt with misery ;
For what's more miserable than discontent ?
Ah, uncle Humphrey ! in thy face I see
The map of honour, truth, and loyalty ;
And yet, good Humphrey, is the hour to come,
That e'er I prov'd thee false, or fear'd thy faith.
What low'ring star now envies thy estate,
That these great lords, and Margaret our queen,
Do seek subversion of thy harmless life ?
Thou never didst them wrong, nor no man wrong :
And as the butcher takes away the calf,
And binds the wretch, and beats it when it strays,
Bearing it to the bloody slaughter-house ;
Even so, remorseless, have they borne him hence.
And as the dam runs lowing up and down,
Looking the way her harmless young one went,
And can do naught but wail her darling's loss ;
Even so myself bewails good Gloster's case,
With sad unhelpful tears ; and with dimm'd eyes
Look after him, and cannot do him good ;
So mighty are his vowed enemies.

His fortunes I will weep ; and, 'twixt each groan,
Say—"Who's a traitor, Gloster he is none." [Exit.]

Q. Mar. Free lords, cold snow melts with the sun's hot beams.

Henry my lord is cold in great affairs,
Too full of foolish pity : and Gloster's show
Beguiles him, as the mournful crocodile
With sorrow snares relenting passengers ;
Or as the snake, roll'd in a flowering bank,
With shining checker'd slough, doth sting a child,
That, for the beauty, thinks it excellent.
Believe me, lords, were none more wise than I,
(And yet, herein I judge mine own wit good,)

This Gloster should be quickly rid the world,
To rid us from the fear we have of him.

Car. That he should die is worthy policy :
But yet we want a colour for his death :
'Tis meet he be condemn'd by course of law.

Suf. But, in my mind, that were no policy :
The king will labour still to save his life ;
The commons haply rise to save his life ;
And yet we have but trivial argument,
More than mistrust, that shows him worthy death.

York. So that by this you would not have him die.

Suf. Ah, York, no man alive so fain as I.

York. 'Tis York that hath more reason for his death.
But, my lord cardinal, and you, my lord of Suffolk,—
Say as you think, and speak it from your souls,— Were't not all one, an empty eagle were set
To guard the chicken from a hungry kite,
As place duke Humphrey for the king's protector ?

Q. Mar. So the poor chicken should be sure of death.

Suf. Madam, 'tis true : and were't not madness then,
To make the fox surveyor of the fold ?
Who being accus'd a crafty murderer,
His guilt should be but idly posted over,
Because his purpose is not executed.

No ; let him die, in that he is a fox,
By nature prov'd an enemy to the flock,
(Before his chaps be stain'd with crimson blood,)
As Humphrey, prov'd by reasons, to my liege.
And do not stand on quilllets, how to slay him :

Be it by gins, by snares, by subtilty,
Sleeping or waking, 'tis no matter how,
So he be dead ; for that is good deceit
Which mates<sup>1</sup> him first that first intends deceit.

Q. Mar. Thrice-noble Suffolk, 'tis resolutely spoke.

Suf. Not resolute, except so much were done ;
For things are often spoke, and seldom meant :
But, that my heart accordeth with my tongue,—
Seeing the deed is meritorious,
And to preserve my sovereign from his foe,—
Say but the word, and I will be his priest.

Car. But I would have him dead, my lord of Suffolk,
Ere you can take due orders for a priest :
Say, you consent, and censure well<sup>2</sup> the deed,
And I'll provide his executioner,
I tender so the safety of my liege.

Suf. Here is my hand, the deed is worthy doing.

Q. Mar. And so say I.

York. And I : and now we three have spoke it,
It skills not greatly who impugns our doom.

[Enter a Messenger.]

Mess. Great lords, from Ireland am I come amain,
To signify, that rebels there are up,
And put the Englishmen unto the sword :
Send succours, lords, and stop the rage betime,
Before the wound do grow incurable ;
For being green there is great hope of help.

Car. A breach that craves a quick expedient<sup>3</sup> stop !
What counsel give you in this weighty cause ?

York. That Somerset be sent as regent thither ;
'Tis meet that lucky ruler be employ'd ;
Witness the fortune he hath had in France.

Som. If York, with all his far-fet policy,
Had been the regent there instead of me,
He never would have stay'd in France so long.

York. No, not to lose it all as thou hast done :
I rather would have lost my life betimes,
Than bring a burden of dishonour home,

"His marches are expedient to this town."

By staying there so long, till all were lost.
Show me one scar character'd on thy skin :
Men's flesh preserv'd so whole, do seldom win.

Q. Mar. Nay then, this spark will prove a raging fire,
If wind and fuel be brought to feed it with :
No more, good York ;—sweet Somerset, be still ;
Thy fortune, York, hadst thou been regent there,
Might happily have prov'd far worse than his.

York. What, worse than naught ? nay, then a shame take all !

Som. And in the number, thee, that wishest shame !

Car. My lord of York, try what your fortune is.
The uncivil Kernes of Ireland are in arms,
And temper clay with blood of Englishmen :
To Ireland will you lead a band of men,
Collected choicely, from each county some,
And try your hap against the Irishmen ?

York. I will, my lord, so please his majesty.

Suf. Why, our authority is his consent ;
And what we do establish he confirms :
Then, noble York, take thou this task in hand.

York. I am content : Provide me soldiers, lords,
Whiles I take order for mine own affairs.

Suf. A charge, lord York, that I will see perform'd.
But now return we to the false duke Humphrey.

Car. No more of him ; for I will deal with him,
That henceforth he shall trouble us no more.
And so break off ; the day is almost spent :
Lord Suffolk, you and I must talk of that event.

York. My lord of Suffolk, within fourteen days,
At Bristol I expect my soldiers ;
For there I'll ship them all for Ireland.

Suf. I'll see it truly done, my lord of York.

[Exeunt all but YORK.]

York. Now, York, or never, steel thy fearful thoughts,
And change misdoubt to resolution :
Be that thou hop'st to be ; or what thou art
Resign to death, it is not worth the enjoying :
Let pale-fac'd fear keep with the mean-born man,
And find no harbour in a royal heart.
Faster than spring-time showers comes thought on thought ;
And not a thought but thinks on dignity.
My brain, more busy than the labouring spider,
Weaves tedious snares to trap mine enemies.
Well, nobles, well, 'tis politicly done,
To send me packing with an host of men :
I fear me you but warm the starved snake,
Who, cherish'd in your breasts, will sting your hearts.
'Twas men I lack'd, and you will give them me :
I take it kindly ; yet, be well assur'd
You put sharp weapons in a madman's hands.
Whiles I in Ireland nourish a mighty band,
I will stir up in England some black storm
Shall blow ten thousand souls to heaven or hell :
And this fell tempest shall not cease to rage
Until the golden circuit on my head,
Like to the glorious sun's transparent beams,
Do calm the fury of this mad-bred flaw.<sup>1</sup>
And, for a minister of my intent,
I have seduc'd a headstrong Kentishman,
John Cade of Ashford,
To make commotion, as full well he can,
Under the title of John Mortimer.
In Ireland have I seen this stubborn Cade
Oppose himself against a troop of Kernes ;
And fought so long, till that his thighs with darts
Were almost like a sharp-quill'd porcupine :
And, in the end being rescued, I have seen him
Caper upright like a wild Morisco,<sup>2</sup>
Shaking the bloody darts, as he his bells.

Full often, like a shag-hair'd crafty Kerne,
Hath he conversed with the enemy ;
And undiscover'd come to me again,
And given me notice of their villainies.
This devil here shall be my substitute ;
For that John Mortimer, which now is dead,
In face, in gait, in speech, he doth resemble ;
By this I shall perceive the commons' mind,
How they affect the house and claim of York.
Say, he be taken, rack'd, and tortur'd ;
I know no pain they can inflict upon him,
Will make him say—I mov'd him to those arms.
Say, that he thrive, (as 'tis great like he will,)
Why, then from Ireland come I with my strength,
And reap the harvest which that rascal sow'd :
For, Humphrey being dead, as he shall be,
And Henry put apart, the next for me. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Bury. A Room in the Palacc.

Enter certain Murderers, hastily.

1 Mur. Run to my lord of Suffolk ; let him know
We have despatch'd the duke, as he commanded.

2 Mur. O, that it were to do !—What have we done ?
Didst ever hear a man so penitent ?

Enter SUFFOLK.

1 Mur. Here comes my lord.

Suf. Now, sirs, have you despatch'd this thing ?

1 Mur. Ay, my good lord, he's dead.

Suf. Why that's well said. Go, get you to my house ;
I will reward you for this venturous deed.
The king and all the peers are here at hand :—
Have you laid fair the bed ? are all things well,
According as I gave directions ?

1 Mur. 'Tis, my good lord.

Suf. Away, be gone ! [Exit Murderers.]

*Enter KING HENRY, QUEEN MARGARET, CARDINAL
BEAUFORT, SOMERSET, Lords, and others.*

K. Hen. Go, call our uncle to our presence straight :
Say, we intend to try his grace to-day,
If he be guilty, as 'tis published.

Suf. I'll call him presently, my noble lord. [Exit.]

K. Hen. Lords, take your places :—And, I pray you all,
Proceed no straiter 'gainst our uncle Gloster,
Than from true evidence, of good esteem,
He be approv'd in practice culpable.

Q. Mar. God forbid any malice should prevail,
That faultless may condemn a nobleman !
Pray God he may acquit him of suspicion !

K. Hen. I thank thee, Margaret ; these words content me much.—

Re-enter SUFFOLK.

How now ? why look'st thou pale ? why tremblest thou ?
Where is our uncle ? what's the matter, Suffolk ?

Suf. Dead 'in his bed, my lord ; Gloster is dead.

Q. Mar. Marry, God forefend !

Car. God's secret judgment :—I did dream to-night
The duke was dumb, and could not speak a word.

[The KING swoons.]

Q. Mar. How fares my lord ?—Help, lords ! the king is dead.

Som. Rear up his body ; wring him by the nose.

Morisco. This term probably points at the Moorish origin of the morris-dance.

Q. Mar. Run, go, help, help!—O Henry, ope thine eyes!

Suf. He doth revive again:—Madam, be patient.

K. Hen. O heavenly God!

Q. Mar. How fares my gracious lord?

Suf. Comfort, my sovereign! gracious Henry, comfort!

K. Hen. What, doth my lord of Suffolk comfort me?

Came he right now to sing a raven's note,
Whose dismal tune bereft my vital powers;
And thinks he that the chirping of a wren,
By crying comfort from a hollow breast,
Can chase away the first-conceived sound?
Hide not thy poison with such sugar'd words:
Lay not thy hands on me; forbear, I say;
Their touch affrights me as a serpent's sting.
Thou baleful messenger, out of my sight!
Upon thy eyeballs murderous tyranny
Sits in grim majesty, to fright the world.
Look not upon me, for thine eyes are wounding:
Yet do not go away:—Come, basilisk,
And kill the innocent gazer with thy sight:
For in the shade of death I shall find joy;
In life but double death, now Gloster's dead.

Q. Mar. Why do you rate my lord of Suffolk thus?

Although the duke was enemy to him,
Yet he, most Christian-like, laments his death:
And for myself, foe as he was to me,
Might liquid tears, or heart-offending groans,
Or blood-consuming sighs recall his life,
I would be blind with weeping, sick with groans,
Look pale as primrose with blood-drinking sighs,
And all to have the noble duke alive.
What know I how the world may deem of me?
For it is known we were but hollow friends;
It may be judg'd I made the duke away:
So shall my name with slander's tongue be wounded,
And princes' courts be fill'd with my reproach.
This get I by his death: Ah me, unhappy!
To be a queen, and crown'd with infamy!

K. Hen. Ah, woe is me for Gloster, wretched man!

Q. Mar. Be woe for me, more wretched than he is.

What, dost thou turn away, and hide thy face?
I am no loathsome leper, look on me.
What, art thou like the adder waxen deaf?
Be poisonous too, and kill thy forlorn queen.
Is all thy comfort shut in Gloster's tomb?
Why, then dame Margaret was ne'er thy joy:
Erect his statua then, and worship it,
And make my image but an alehouse sign.
Was I for this nigh wrack'd upon the sea;
And twice by awkward<sup>1</sup> wind from England's bank
Drove back again unto my native clime?
What boded this, but well-forewarning wind
Did seem to say,—Seek not a scorpion's nest,
Nor set no footing on this unkind shore?
What did I then, but curs'd the gentle gusts,
And he that loos'd them forth their brazen caves;
And bid them blow towards England's blessed shore,
Or turn our stern upon a dreadful rock?
Yet Æolus would not be a murderer,
But left that hateful office unto thee:
The pretty vaulting sea refus'd to drown me;
Knowing that thou wouldst have me drown'd on shore,
With tears as salt as sea through thy unkindness:
The splitting rocks cower'd in the sinking sands,
And would not dash me with their ragged sides;
Because thy flinty heart, more hard than they,
Might in thy palace perish<sup>2</sup> Margaret.

As far as I could ken thy chalky cliffs,
When from thy shore the tempest beat us back,
I stood upon the hatches in the storm:
And when the dusky sky began to rob
My earnest-gaping sight of thy land's view,
I took a costly jewel from my neck,—
A heart it was, bound in with diamonds,—
And threw it towards thy land;—the sea receiv'd it;
And so I wish'd thy body might my heart:
And even with this I lost fair England's view,
And bid mine eyes be packing with my heart;
And call'd them blind and dusky spectacles,
For losing ken of Albion's wished coast.
How often have I tempted Suffolk's tongue
(The agent of thy foul inconstancy,
To sit and witch me, as Ascanius did,
When he to madding Dido would unfold
His father's acts, commenc'd in burning Troy!
Am I not witch'd like her? or thou not false like him?
Ah me, I can no more! Die, Margaret!
For Henry weeps that thou dost live so long.

Noise within. Enter WARWICK and SALISBURY. The Commons press to the door.

War. It is reported, mighty sovereign,
That good duke Humphrey traitorously is murder'd
By Suffolk and the cardinal Beaufort's means.
The commons, like an angry hive of bees,
That want their leader, scatter up and down,
And care not who they sting in his revenge.
Myself have calm'd their spleenful mutiny,
Until they hear the order of his death.

K. Hen. That he is dead, good Warwick, 'tis too true;
But how he died, God knows, not Henry:
Enter his chamber, view his breathless corpse,
And comment then upon his sudden death.

War. That shall I do, my liege:—Stay, Salisbury,
With the rude multitude, till I return.

[WARWICK goes into an inner room, and SALISBURY retires.]

K. Hen. O thou that judgest all things, stay my thoughts;
My thoughts, that labour to persuade my soul
Some violent hands were laid on Humphrey's life!
If my suspect be false, forgive me, God;
For judgment only doth belong to thee!
Fain would I go to chafe his paly lips
With twenty thousand kisses, and to drain
Upon his face an ocean of salt tears;
To tell my love unto his dumb deaf trunk,
And with my fingers feel his hand unfeeling:
But all in vain are these mean obsequies;
And to survey his dead and earthy image,
What were it but to make my sorrow greater?

The folding doors of an inner chamber are thrown open, and GLOSTER is discovered dead in his bed: WARWICK and others standing by it.<sup>3</sup>

War. Come hither, gracious sovereign, view this body.

K. Hen. That is, to see how deep my grave is made:
For with his soul fled all my worldly solace:
For seeing him, I see my life in death.

War. As surely as my soul intends to live
With that dread King, that took our state upon him
To free us from his Father's wrathful curse,

<sup>3</sup> This direction is modern. There can be no doubt that, as the play was originally acted, the secondary stage (which we shall describe in Othello) was employed. In "The First Part of the Contention" the murder itself takes place before the audience, as indicated by the following singular direction:—"Then the curtains being drawn, Duke Humphrey is discovered in his bed, and two men lying on his breast, and smothering him in his bed." At the present scene the direction in the folio is, "A bed with Gloster's body put forth."

I do believe that violent hands were laid
Upon the life of this thrice-famed duke.

Suf. A dreadful oath, sworn with a solemn tongue!

What instance gives lord Warwick for his vow?

War. See, how the blood is settled in his face!

Oft have I seen a timely-parted ghost,<sup>1</sup>

Of ashy semblance, meagre, pale, and bloodless,

Being all descended to the labouring heart;<sup>2</sup>

Who, in the conflict that it holds with death,

Attracts the same for aidance 'gainst the enemy;

Which with the heart there cools, and ne'er returneth

To blush and beautify the cheek again.

But see, his face is black, and full of blood;

His eyeballs further out than when he liv'd,

Staring full ghostly like a strangled man:

His hair uprear'd, his nostrils stretch'd with struggling;

His hands abroad display'd, as one that grasp'd

And tugg'd for life, and was by strength subdued.

Look on the sheets, his hair, you see, is sticking;

His well-proportion'd beard made rough and rugged,

Like to the summer's corn by tempest lodg'd.

It cannot be but he was murder'd here;

The least of all these signs were probable.

Suf. Why, Warwick, who should do the duke to death?

Myself and Beaufort had him in protection;

And we, I hope, sir, are no murderers.

War. But both of you were vow'd duke Humphrey's foes;

And you, forsooth, had the good duke to keep:

'Tis like you would not feast him like a friend;

And 'tis well seen he found an enemy.

Q. Mar. Then you, belike, suspect these noblemen
As guilty of duke Humphrey's timeless death.

War. Who finds the heifer dead, and bleeding fresh,

And sees fast by a butcher with an axe,

But will suspect 'twas he that made the slaughter?

Who finds the partridge in the puttock's nest,

But may imagine how the bird was dead,

Although the kite soar with unbloodied beak?

Even so suspicious is this tragedy.

Q. Mar. Are you the butcher, Suffolk; where's your knife?

Is Beaufort term'd a kite; where are his talons?

Suf. I wear no knife to slaughter sleeping men;

But here's a vengeful sword, rusted with ease,

That shall be scoured in his rancorous heart

That slanders me with murder's crimson badge:

Say, if thou dar'st, proud lord of Warwickshire,

That I am faulty in duke Humphrey's death.

[Exeunt CARDINAL, SOM., and others.]

War. What dares not Warwick, if false Suffolk dare him?

Q. Mar. He dares not calm his contumelious spirit,

Nor cease to be an arrogant controller,

Though Suffolk dare him twenty thousand times.

War. Madam, be still, with reverence may I say;

For every word you speak in his behalf

Is slander to your royal dignity.

Suf. Blunt-witted lord, ignoble in demeanour!

If ever lady wrong'd her lord so much,

Thy mother took into her blameful bed

Some stern untutor'd churl, and noble stock

Was graft with crab-tree slip; whose fruit thou art,

And never of the Nevils' noble race.

War. But that the guilt of murder bucklers thee,

And I should rob the deathsman of his fee,

Quitting thee thereby of ten thousand shames,

And that my sovereign's presence makes me mild,

I would, false murderous coward, on thy knee

Make thee beg pardon for thy passed speech,
And say—It was thy mother that thou meant'st,
That thou thyself was born in bastardy:

And, after all this fearful homage done,

Give thee thy hire, and send thy soul to hell,

Pernicious bloodsucker of sleeping men!

Suf. Thou shalt be waking while I shed thy blood,

If from this presence thou dar'st go with me.

War. Away even now, or I will drag thee hence:

Unworthy though thou art, I'll cope with thee,

And do some service to duke Humphrey's ghost.

[Exeunt SUFFOLK and WARWICK.]

K. Hen. What stronger breastplate than a heart untainted?

Thrice is he arm'd that hath his quarrel just;

And he but naked, though lock'd up in steel,

Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted.

[A noise within.]

Q. Mar. What noise is this?

Re-enter SUFFOLK and WARWICK, with their weapons drawn.

K. Hen. Why, how now, lords? your wrathful weapons drawn

Here in our presence? dare you be so bold?—

Why, what tumultuous clamour have we here?

Suf. The traitorous Warwick, with the men of Bury,
Set all upon me, mighty sovereign.

Noise of a crowd within. Re-enter SALISBURY.

Sal. Sirs, stand apart; the king shall know your mind.—

[Speaking to those within.]

Dread lord, the commons send you word by me,

Unless lord Suffolk straight be done to death,

Or banished fair England's territories,

They will by violence tear him from your palace,

And torture him with grievous ling'ring death.

They say, by him the good duke Humphrey died;

They say, in him they fear your highness' death;

And mere instinct of love, and loyalty,—

Free from a stubborn opposite intent,

As being thought to contradict your liking,—

Makes them thus forward in his banishment.

They say, in care of your most royal person,

That, if your highness should intend to sleep,

And charge that no man should disturb your rest,

In pain of your dislike, or pain of death;

Yet, notwithstanding such a strait edict,

Were there a serpent seen, with forked tongue,

That slyly glided towards your majesty,

It were but necessary you were wak'd;

Lest, being suffer'd in that harmful slumber,

The mortal worm might make the sleep eternal:

And therefore do they cry, though you forbid,

That they will guard you whe'r you will or no,

From such fell serpents as false Suffolk is;

With whose envenomed and fatal sting,

Your loving uncle, twenty times his worth,

They say, is shamefully bereft of life.

Commons. [Within.] An answer from the king, my lord of Salisbury.

Suf. 'Tis like, the commons, rude unpolish'd hinds,

Could send such message to their sovereign:

But you, my lord, were glad to be employ'd,

To show how quaint an orator you are:

But all the honour Salisbury hath won,

<sup>2</sup> The adjective bloodless, by a license of construction, includes the substantive —the blood "being all descended," &c.

Is, that he was the lord ambassador,
Sent from a sort of tinkers to the king.

Commons. [Within.] An answer from the king, or we will all break in.

K. Hen. Go, Salisbury, and tell them all from me,
I thank them for their tender loving care;
And had I not been 'cited so by them,
Yet did I purpose as they do entreat;
For sure, my thoughts do hourly prophesy
Mischance unto my state by Suffolk's means.
And therefore, by His majesty I swear,
Whose far unworthy deputy I am,
He shall not breathe infection in this air
But three days longer, on the pain of death.

[Exit SALISBURY.]

Q. Mar. O Henry, let me plead for gentle Suffolk!

K. Hen. Ungentle queen, to call him gentle Suffolk.
No more, I say; if thou dost plead for him
Thou wilt but add increase unto my wrath.
Had I but said, I would have kept my word;
But when I swear, it is irrevocable:
If, after three days' space, thou here be'st found
On any ground that I am ruler of,
The world shall not be ransom for thy life.
Come, Warwick, come good Warwick, go with me:
I have great matters to impart to thee.

[Exeunt KING HENRY, WARWICK, Lords, &c.]

Q. Mar. Mischance and sorrow go along with you!
Heart's discontent, and sour affliction,
Be playfellows to keep you company!
There's two of you; the devil make a third!
And threefold vengeance tend upon your steps!

Suf. Cease, gentle queen, these execrations,
And let thy Suffolk take his heavy leave.

Q. Mar. Fie, coward woman, and soft-hearted wretch!
Hast thou not spirit to curse thine enemies?

Suf. A plague upon them! wherefore should I curse them?

Would curses kill, as doth the mandrake's groan,
I would invent as bitter searching terms,
As curst, as harsh, and horrible to hear,
Deliver'd strongly through my fixed teeth,
With full as many signs of deadly hate,
As lean-fac'd Envy in her loathsome cave:
My tongue should stumble in mine earnest words;
Mine eyes should sparkle like the beaten flint;
My hair be fix'd on end, as one distract;
Ay, every joint should seem to curse and ban:
And even now my burden'd heart would break,
Should I not curse them. Poison be their drink!
Gall, worse than gall, the daintiest that they taste!
Their sweetest shade a grove of cypress trees!
Their chiefest prospect murdering basilisks!
Their softest touch as smart as lizards' stings!
Their music frightful as the serpents' hiss;
And boding screech-owls make the concert full!
All the foul terrors in dark-seated hell——

Q. Mar. Enough, sweet Suffolk; thou torment'st thyself;
And these dread curses, like the sun 'gainst glass,
Or like an overcharged gun, recoil,
And turn the force of them upon thyself.

Suf. You bade me ban, and will you bid me leave?
Now, by the ground that I am banish'd from,
Well could I curse away a winter's night,
Though standing naked on a mountain top,
Where biting cold would never let grass grow,
And think it but a minute spent in sport.

Q. Mar. O, let me entreat thee, cease! Give me thy hand,
That I may dew it with my mournful tears;

Nor let the rain of heaven wet this place,
To wash away my woeful monuments.
O, could this kiss be printed in thy hand, [Kisses his hand.
That thou might'st think upon these by the seal,
Through whom a thousand sighs are breath'd for thee!
So, get thee gone, that I may know my grief;
'Tis but surmis'd whilst thou art standing by,
As one that surfeits thinking on a want.
I will repeal thee, or, be well assur'd,
Adventure to be banished myself:
And banished I am, if but from thee.
Go, speak not to me; even now be gone.—
O, go not yet!—Even thus two friends condemn'd
Embrace, and kiss, and take ten thousand leaves,
Loather a hundred times to part than die.
Yet now farewell; and farewell life with thee!

Suf. Thus is poor Suffolk ten times banished,
Once by the king, and three times thrice by thee.
'Tis not the land I care for, wert thou hence;
A wilderness is populous enough,
So Suffolk had thy heavenly company:
For where thou art, there is the world itself,
With every several pleasure in the world;
And where thou art not, desolation.
I can no more:—Live thou to joy thy life;
Myself no joy in naught, but that thou liv'st.

[Enter VAUX.]

Q. Mar. Whither goes Vaux so fast? what news, I prithee?

Vaux. To signify unto his majesty
That cardinal Beaufort is at point of death:
For suddenly a grievous sickness took him,
That makes him gasp, and stare, and catch the air
Blaspheming God, and cursing men on earth.
Sometime, he talks as if duke Humphrey's ghost
Were by his side; sometime, he calls the king,
And whispers to his pillow, as to him,
The secrets of his overcharged soul:
And I am sent to tell his majesty,
That even now he cries aloud for him.

Q. Mar. Go tell this heavy message to the king.

[Exit VAUX.]

Ah me! what is this world? what news are these?
But wherefore grieve I at an hour's poor loss,
Omitting Suffolk's exile, my soul's treasure?
Why only, Suffolk, mourn I not for thee,
And with the southern clouds contend in tears;
Theirs for the earth's increase, mine for my sorrows?
Now, get thee hence: The king, thou know'st, is coming!
If thou be found by me, thou art but dead.

Suf. If I depart from thee I cannot live:
And in thy sight to die, what were it else,
But like a pleasant slumber in thy lap?
Here could I breathe my soul into the air,
As mild and gentle as the cradle-babe,
Dying with mother's dug between its lips:
Where,<sup>1</sup> from thy sight, I should be raging mad,
And cry out for thee to close up mine eyes,
To have thee with thy lips to stop my mouth;
So shouldst thou either turn my flying soul,
Or I should breathe it so into thy body,
And then it liv'd in sweet Elysium.
To die by thee were but to die in jest;
From thee to die were torture more than death:
O, let me stay, befall what may befall.

Q. Mar. Away! though parting be a fretful corsive,<sup>2</sup>
It is applied to a deathful wound.
To France, sweet Suffolk: Let me hear from thee;

695

For wheresoe'er thou art in this world's globe,
I'll have an Iris that shall find thee out.

Suf. I go.

Q. Mar. And take my heart with thee.

Suf. A jewel, lock'd into the woeful'st cask
That ever did contain a thing of worth.
Even as a splitted bark, so sunder we;
This way fall I to death.

Q. Mar. This way for me. [Exeunt severally.]

SCENE III.—London. Cardinal Beaufort's Bedchamber.

Enter KING HENRY, SALISBURY, WARWICK, and others.
The CARDINAL in bed; Attendants with him.

K. Hen. How fares my lord? speak, Beaufort, to thy sovereign.

Car. If thou be'st death, I'll give thee England's treasure,

Enough to purchase such another island,
So thou wilt let me live, and feel no pain.

K. Hen. Ah, what a sign it is of evil life,
Where death's approach is seen so terrible!

War. Beaufort, it is thy sovereign speaks to thee.

Car. Bring me unto my trial when you will.

Died he not in his bed? where should he die?

Can I make men live, wh'er they will or no?—

O! torture me no more, I will confess.—

Alive again? then show me where he is;

I'll give a thousand pound to look upon him.—

He hath no eyes, the dust hath blinded them.—

Comb down his hair; look! look! it stands upright,

Like lime-twigs set to catch my winged soul!—

Give me some drink; and bid the apothecary

Bring the strong poison that I bought of him.

K. Hen. O thou eternal Mover of the heavens,
Look with a gentle eye upon this wretch!

O, beat away the busy meddling fiend

That lays strong siege unto this wretch's soul,

And from his bosom purge this black despair!

War. See, how the pangs of death do make him grin.

Sal. Disturb him not, let him pass peaceably.

K. Hen. Peace to his soul, if God's good pleasure be!

Lord cardinal, if thou think'st on heaven's bliss,

Hold up thy hand, make signal of thy hope.—

He dies, and makes no sign; O God, forgive him!

War. So bad a death argues a monstrous life.

K. Hen. Forbear to judge, for we are sinners all.—

Close up his eyes, and draw the curtain close;

And let us all to meditation. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Kent. The Sea-shore, near Dover.

Firing heard at sea. Then enter from a boat, a Captain, a Master, a Master's Mate, WALTER WHITMORE, and others; with them SUFFOLK, and other Gentlemen, prisoners.

Cap. The gaudy, blabbing, and remorseful day<sup>1</sup>
Is crept into the bosom of the sea;

<sup>1</sup> These epithets are beautifully chosen. Milton has copied one of them in "Comus":—

"Ere the blabbing eastern scout,
The nice morn, on th' Indian steep,
From her cabin'd loop-hole peep."

<sup>2</sup> The jades with flagging wings are the "night's swift dragons" of A Midsummer Night's Dream:—

"For night's swift dragons cut the clouds full fast."

<sup>3</sup> We follow the reading of the folio. Malone has corrected the passage as follows:—

"The lives of those which we have lost in fight Cannot be counterpois'd with such a petty sum."

And now loud-howling wolves arouse the jades
That drag the tragic melancholy night;<sup>2</sup>
Who with their drowsy, slow, and flagging wings
Clip dead men's graves, and from their misty jaws
Breathe foul contagious darkness in the air.

Therefore, bring forth the soldiers of our prize;

For, whilst our pinnace anchors in the Downs,

Here shall they make their ransom on the sand,

Or with their blood stain this discolour'd shore.

Master, this prisoner freely give I thee;—

And thou that art his mate, make boot of this;—

The other, [pointing to SUFFOLK] Walter Whitmore, is thy share.

<sup>1</sup> Gent. What is my ransom, master? let me know.

Mast. A thousand crowns, or else lay down your head.

Mate. And so much shall you give, or off goes yours.

Cap. What, think you much to pay two thousand crowns,

And bear the name and port of gentlemen?—

Cut both the villains' throats,—for die you shall.—

The lives of those which we have lost in fight

Be counterpois'd with such a petty sum?<sup>3</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Gent. And so will I, and write home for it straight.

Whit. I lost mine eye in laying the prize aboard,

And therefore to revenge it shalt thou die; [To Suf.]

And so should these, if I might have my will.

Cap. Be not so rash; take ransom, let him live.

Suf. Look on my George, I am a gentleman;
Rate me at what thou wilt thou shalt be paid.

Whit. And so am I; my name is Walter Whitmore.

How now? why start'st thou? what, doth death affright?

Suf. Thy name affrights me, in whose sound is death.

A cunning man did calculate my birth,

And told me that by Water<sup>4</sup> I should die.

Yet let not this make thee be bloody minded;

Thy name is Gualtier, being rightly sounded.

Whit. Gualtier, or Walter, which it is I care not;

Never yet did base dishonour blur our name,

But with our sword we wip'd away the blot;

Therefore, when merchant-like I sell revenge,

Broke be my sword, my arms torn and defac'd,

And I proclaim'd a coward through the world!

[Lays hold on SUFFOLK.]

Suf. Stay, Whitmore; for thy prisoner is a prince,
The duke of Suffolk, William de la Pole.

Whit. The duke of Suffolk, muffled up in rags!

Suf. Ay, but these rags are no part of the duke;

[Jove sometimes went disguis'd, and why not I?<sup>5</sup>]

Cap. But Jove was never slain, as thou shalt be.

Suf. Obscure and lowly swain, king Henry's blood,

The honourable blood of Lancaster,

Must not be shed by such a jaded groom.

Hast thou not kiss'd thy hand, and held my stirrup?

Bare-headed plodded by my foot-cloth mule,

And thought thee happy when I shook my head?

How often hast thou waited at my cup,

Fed from my trencher, kneel'd down at the board,

When I have feasted with queen Margaret?

Remember it, and let it make thee crest-fall'n;

Ay, and allay this thy abortive pride:

How in our voiding lobby hast thou stood,

And duly waited for my coming forth?

It appears to us that this emendation greatly weakens the force of the passage. Upon the hesitation to pay ransom the captain exclaims, "What, think you much," &c. He then, parenthetically, threatens death; and continues his half-interrogative sentence, "What, "The lives of those which we have lost in fight be counterpois'd," &c.

<sup>4</sup> In the incantation scene in Act I. we have this prophecy:—

"What fates await the duke of Suffolk?
By water shall he die, and take his end."

It appears from this passage that Walter was commonly pronounced Water.

<sup>5</sup> This line, which is necessary for the understanding of what follows, is not found in the folio. It is introduced from "The First Part of the Contention," &c.

This hand of mine hath writ in thy behalf,
And therefore shall it charm thy riotous tongue.

Whit. Speak, captain, shall I stab the forlorn swain?

Cap. First let my words stab him, as he hath me.

Suf. Base slave! thy words are blunt, and so art thou.

Cap. Convey him hence, and on our long-boat's side
Strike off his head.

Suf. Thou dar'st not for thy own.

[Cap. Yes, Poole.

Suf. Poole!<sup>1</sup>]

Cap. Poole! Sir Poole! lord!

Ay, kennel, puddle, sink; whose filth and dirt
Troubles the silver spring where England drinks.
Now will I dam up this thy yawning mouth,
For swallowing the treasure of the realm:
Thy lips, that kiss'd the queen, shall sweep the ground:
And thou, that smil'dst at good duke Humphrey's death,
Against the senseless winds shall grin in vain,
Who, in contempt, shall hiss at thee again:
And wedded be thou to the hags of hell,
For daring to affy<sup>2</sup> a mighty lord
Unto the daughter of a worthless king,
Having neither subject, wealth, nor diadem.
By devilish policy art thou grown great,
And, like ambitious Sylla, overgorg'd
With gobbets of thy mother's bleeding heart,
By thee Anjou and Maine were sold to France:
The false revolting Normans, thorough thee,
Disdain to call us lord; and Picardy
Hath slain their governors, surpris'd our forts,
And sent the ragged soldiers wounded home.
The princely Warwick, and the Nevils all,
Whose dreadful swords were never drawn in vain,
As hating thee, are rising up in arms:
And now the house of York—thrust from the crown,
By shameful murder of a guiltless king,
And lofty proud encroaching tyranny,—
Burns with revenging fire; whose hopeful colours
Advance our half-fac'd sun, striving to shine,
Under the which is writ Invitis nubibus.<sup>3</sup>
The commons here in Kent are up in arms:
And, to conclude, reproach, and beggary,
Is crept into the palace of our king,
And all by thee:—Away! convey him hence.

Suf. O that I were a god, to shoot forth thunder
Upon these paltry, servile, abject drudges!
Small things make base men proud: this villain here,
Being captain of a pinnace, threatens more
Than Bargulus the strong Illyrian pirate.<sup>4</sup>
Drones suck not eagles' blood, but rob bee-hives.
It is impossible that I should die
By such a lowly vassal as thyself.
Thy words move rage, and not remorse, in me:
I go of message from the queen to France;
I charge thee waft me safely cross the channel.

Cap. Walter,—

Whit. Come, Suffolk, I must waft thee to thy death.

Suf. Penè gelidus timor occupat artus:—'tis thee I fear.

Whit. Thou shalt have cause to fear before I leave thee.
What, are ye daunted now? now will ye stoop?

Suf. Suffolk's imperial tongue is stern and rough,
Used to command, untaught to plead for favour.
Far be it we should honour such as these

With humble suit: no, rather let my head
Stoop to the block than these knees bow to any,
Save to the God of heaven, and to my king;
And sooner dance upon a bloody pole
Than stand uncover'd to the vulgar groom.
True nobility is exempt from fear:—
More can I bear than you dare execute.

Cap. Hale him away, and let him talk no more.

Suf. Come, soldiers, show what cruelty ye can,
That this my death may never be forgot!—
Great men oft die by vile bezonians:<sup>5</sup>
A Roman sworder and banditto slave
Murder'd sweet Tully; Brutus' bastard hand
Stabb'd Julius Cæsar; savage islanders,
Pompey the Great: and Suffolk dies by pirates.

[Exit Suf., with Whit. and others.]

Cap. And as for these whose ransom we have set,
It is our pleasure one of them depart:—
Therefore come you with us, and let him go.

[Exeunt all but the first Gentleman.]

Re-enter WHITMORE, with SUFFOLK'S body.

Whit. There let his head and lifeless body lie,
Until the queen his mistress bury it.

[Exit.]

<sup>1</sup> Gent. O barbarous and bloody spectacle!
His body will I bear unto the king:
If he revenge it not, yet will his friends;
So will the queen, that living held him dear.

[Exit, with the body.]

SCENE II.—Blackheath.

Enter GEORGE BEVIS and JOHN HOLLAND.

Geo. Come, and get thee a sword, though made of a lath;
they have been up these two days.

John. They have the more need to sleep now then.

Geo. I tell thee, Jack Cade the clothier means to dress the commonwealth, and turn it, and set a new nap upon it.

John. So he had need, for 'tis threadbare. Well, I say it was never merry world in England since gentlemen came up.

Geo. O miserable age! Virtue is not regarded in handicrafts-men.

John. The nobility think scorn to go in leather apron.

Geo. Nay more, the king's council are no good workmen.

John. True. And yet it is said, Labour in thy vocation: which is as much to say as, let the magistrates be labouring men; and therefore should we be magistrates.

Geo. Thou hast hit it: for there's no better sign of a brave mind than a hard hand.

John. I see them! I see them! There's Best's son, the tanner of Wingham;—

Geo. He shall have the skins of our enemies, to make dog's leather of.

John. And Dick the butcher,—

Geo. Then is sin struck down like an ox, and iniquity's throat cut like a calf.

John. And Smith the weaver.

Geo. Argo, their thread of life is spun.

John. Come, come, let's fall in with them.

"Suf. Thou dar'st not for thy own.

Cap. Yes, Poole.

Suf. Poole?

Cap. Ay, Poole; puddle, kennel, sink, and dirt."

<sup>5</sup> Bezonian was a term of contempt, of somewhat uncertain derivation. Pistol uses it insultingly in Henry IV., Part II. :—

"Under which king, Bezonian? speak or die."

Drum. Enter CADE, DICK the butcher, SMITH the weaver, and others in great number.

Cade. We John Cade, so termed of our supposed father,—

Dick. Or rather, of stealing a cade of herrings.<sup>1</sup> [Aside.

Cade. —for our enemies shall fall before us, inspired with the spirit of putting down kings and princes.—Command silence.

Dick. Silence!

Cade. My father was a Mortimer,—

Dick. He was an honest man, and a good bricklayer. [Aside.

Cade. My mother a Plantagenet,—

Dick. I knew her well, she was a midwife. [Aside.

Cade. My wife descended of the Lacies,—

Dick. She was, indeed, a pedlar's daughter, and sold many laces. [Aside.

Smith. But, now of late, not able to travel with her furred pack, she washes bucks here at home. [Aside.

Cade. Therefore am I of an honourable house.

Dick. Ay, by my faith, the field is honourable; and there was he born, under a hedge; for his father had never a house but the cage. [Aside.

Cade. Valiant I am.

Smith. 'A must needs; for beggary is valiant. [Aside.

Cade. I am able to endure much.

Dick. No question of that; for I have seen him whipped three market days together. [Aside.

Cade. I fear neither sword nor fire.

Smith. He need not fear the sword, for his coat is of proof. [Aside.

Dick. But methinks he should stand in fear of fire, being burnt i' the hand for stealing of sheep. [Aside.

Cade. Be brave then; for your captain is brave, and vows reformation. There shall be, in England, seven half-penny loaves sold for a penny: the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops; and I will make it felony to drink small beer: all the realm shall be in common, and in Cheapside shall my palfrey go to grass. And when I am king, (as king I will be)—

All. God save your majesty!

Cade. I thank you, good people:—there shall be no money; all shall eat and drink on my score; and I will apparel them all in one livery, that they may agree like brothers, and worship me their lord.

Dick. The first thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers.

Cade. Nay, that I mean to do. Is not this a lamentable thing, that of the skin of an innocent lamb should be made parchment? that parchment, being scribbled o'er, should undo a man? Some say the bee stings: but I say 'tis the bee's wax, for I did but seal once to a thing, and I was never mine own man since. How now? who's there?

Enter some, bringing in the Clerk of Chatham.

Smith. The clerk of Chatham: he can write and read, and cast accompt.

Cade. O monstrous!

Smith. We took him setting of boys' copies.

Cade. Here's a villain!

Smith. H' as a book in his pocket with red letters in 't.

Cade. Nay, then he is a conjurer.

Dick. Nay, he can make obligations, and write court-hand.

Cade. I am sorry for 't: the man is a proper man, of mine honour; unless I find him guilty he shall not die.—Come hither, sirrah, I must examine thee: What is thy name?

Clerk. Emmanuel.

Dick. They use to write it on the top of letters;—'Twill go hard with you.

Cade. Let me alone:—Dost thou use to write thy name? or hast thou a mark to thyself, like an honest plain-dealing man?

Clerk. Sir, I thank God I have been so well brought up that I can write my name.

All. He hath confessed: away with him; he's a villain and a traitor.

Cade. Away with him, I say: hang him with his pen and inkhorn about his neck. [Exeunt some with the Clerk.

Enter MICHAEL.

Mich. Where's our general?

Cade. Here I am, thou particular fellow.

Mich. Fly, fly, fly! sir Humphrey Stafford and his brother are hard by, with the king's forces.

Cade. Stand, villain, stand, or I'll fell thee down: He shall be encountered with a man as good as himself: He is but a knight, is 'a?

Mich. No.

Cade. To equal him, I will make myself a knight presently: Rise up sir John Mortimer. Now have at him.

Enter SIR HUMPHREY STAFFORD, and WILLIAM, his Brother, with drum and Forces.

Staf. Rebellious hinds, the filth and scum of Kent, Mark'd for the gallows, lay your weapons down, Home to your cottages, forsake this groom; The king is merciful, if you revolt.

W. Staf. But angry, wrathful, and inclin'd to blood, If you go forward: Therefore yield, or die.

Cade. As for these silken-coated slaves, I pass not; It is to you, good people, that I speak, Over whom, in time to come, I hope to reign; For I am rightful heir unto the crown.

Staf. Villain, thy father was a plasterer; And thou thyself a shearman, art thou not?

Cade. And Adam was a gardener.

W. Staf. And what of that?

Cade. Marry, this:—Edmund Mortimer, earl of March, Married the duke of Clarence' daughter:—Did he not?

Staf. Ay, sir.

Cade. By her he had two children at one birth.

W. Staf. That's false.

Cade. Ay, there's the question; but, I say, 'tis true: The elder of them, being put to nurse, Was by a beggar-woman stolen away; And, ignorant of his birth and parentage, Became a bricklayer when he came to age: His son am I; deny it if you can.

Dick. Nay, 'tis too true; therefore he shall be king.

Smith. Sir, he made a chimney in my father's house, and the bricks are alive at this day to testify it; therefore, deny it not.

Staf. And will you credit this base drudge's words, That speaks he knows not what?

All. Ay, marry, will we; therefore get ye gone.

W. Staf. Jack Cade, the duke of York hath taught you this.

Cade. He lies, for I invented it myself. [Aside.—Go to, sirrah: Tell the king from me, that, for his father's sake, Henry the Fifth, in whose time boys went to span-counter for French crowns, I am content he shall reign; but I'll be protector over him.

Dick. And, furthermore, we'll have the lord Say's head, for selling the dukedom of Maine.

Cade. And good reason, for thereby is England maimed,<sup>2</sup> and fain to go with a staff, but that my puissance holds it up. Fellow kings, I tell you, that that lord Say hath gelded the commonwealth, and made it an eunuch: and more than that, he can speak French, and therefore he is a traitor.

Staf. O gross and miserable ignorance!

Cade. Nay, answer, if you can: The Frenchmen are our enemies: go to then. I ask but this,—can he that speaks with the tongue of an enemy be a good counsellor, or no?

All. No, no; and therefore we'll have his head.

W. Staf. Well, seeing gentle words will not prevail, Assail them with the army of the king.

Staf. Herald, away: and, throughout every town, Proclaim them traitors that are up with Cade; That those which fly before the battle ends May, even in their wives' and children's sight, Be hang'd up for example at their doors: And you that be the king's friends follow me.

[Exeunt the two STAFFORDS, and Forces.]

Cade. And you that love the commons follow me. Now show yourselves men, 'tis for liberty. We will not leave one lord, one gentleman: Spare none, but such as go in clouted shoon; For they are thrifty honest men, and such As would (but that they dare not) take our parts.

Dick. They are all in order, and march toward us.

Cade. But then are we in order, when we are most out of order. Come, march forward. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Another part of Blackheath.

Alarum. The two parties enter and fight, and both the STAFFORDS are slain.

Cade. Where's Dick the butcher of Ashford?

Dick. Here, sir.

Cade. They fell before thee like sheep and oxen, and thou behavedst thyself as if thou hadst been in thine own slaughter-house: therefore thus will I reward thee,—The Lent shall be as long again as it is; and thou shalt have a licence to kill for a hundred lacking one.<sup>1</sup>

Dick. I desire no more.

Cade. And, to speak truth, thou deservest no less. This monument of the victory will I bear;<sup>2</sup> and the bodies shall be dragged at my horse' heels, till I do come to London, where we will have the mayor's sword borne before us.

Dick. If we mean to thrive and do good, break open the gaols, and let out the prisoners.

Cade. Fear not that, I warrant thee. Come, let's march towards London. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—London. A Room in the Palace.

Enter KING HENRY, reading a supplication; the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, and LORD SAY, with him at a distance, QUEEN MARGARET, mourning over SUFFOLK'S head.

Q. Mar. Oft have I heard that grief softens the mind, And makes it fearful and degenerate; Think therefore on revenge, and cease to weep. But who can cease to weep, and look on this? Here may his head lie on my throbbing breast; But where's the body that I should embrace?

Buck. What answer makes your grace to the rebels' supplication?

K. Hen. I'll send some holy bishop to entreat: For God forbid, so many simple souls Should perish by the sword! And I myself, Rather than bloody war shall cut them short, Will parley with Jack Cade their general. But stay, I'll read it over once again.

Q. Mar. Ah, barbarous villains! hath this lovely face Rul'd, like a wandering planet, over me: And could it not enforce them to relent, That were unworthy to behold the same?

K. Hen. Lord Say, Jack Cade hath sworn to have thy head.

Say. Ay, but I hope your highness shall have his.

K. Hen. How now, madam? Still lamenting, and mourning for Suffolk's death? I fear me, love,<sup>3</sup> if that I had been dead, Thou wouldest not have mourn'd so much for me.

Q. Mar. No, my love, I should not mourn, but die for thee.

Enter a Messenger.

K. Hen. How now! what news! why com'st thou in such haste?

Mess. The rebels are in Southwark. Fly, my lord! Jack Cade proclaims himself lord Mortimer, Descended from the duke of Clarence' house; And calls your grace usurper, openly, And vows to crown himself in Westminster. His army is a ragged multitude Of hinds and peasants, rude and merciless: Sir Humphrey Stafford and his brother's death Hath given them heart and courage to proceed; All scholars, lawyers, courtiers, gentlemen, They call false caterpillars, and intend their death.

K. Hen. O graceless men! they know not what they do.

Buck. My gracious lord, retire to Killingworth,<sup>4</sup> Until a power be rais'd to put them down.

Q. Mar. Ah! were the duke of Suffolk now alive, These Kentish rebels would be soon appeas'd.

K. Hen. Lord Say, the traitors hate thee, Therefore away with us to Killingworth.

Say. So might your grace's person be in danger: The sight of me is odious in their eyes; And therefore in this city will I stay, And live alone as secret as I may.

Enter another Messenger.

2 Mess. Jack Cade hath gotten London-bridge; The citizens fly and forsake their houses; The rascal people, thirsting after prey, Join with the traitor; and they jointly swear To spoil the city and your royal court.

Buck. Then linger not, my lord; away, take horse.

K. Hen. Come, Margaret; God, our hope, will succour us.

Q. Mar. My hope is gone, now Suffolk is deceas'd.

K. Hen. Farewell, my lord; [to LORD SAY.] trust not the Kentish rebels.

Buck. Trust nobody, for fear you be betray'd.

Say. The trust I have is in mine innocence, And therefore am I bold and resolute. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—The same. The Tower.

Enter LORD SCALES, and others, on the walls. Then enter certain Citizens, below.

Scales. How now! is Jack Cade slain?

1 Cit. No, my lord, nor likely to be slain; for they have

the Staffords, apparelled himself in sir Humphrey's brigandine, set full of gilt nails."

<sup>3</sup> I fear me, love. So the folio. This had been usually printed, I fear, my love.

<sup>4</sup> Killingworth. This is the old orthography of Kenilworth, and is still the local pronunciation.

won the bridge, killing all those that withstand them :
The lord mayor craves aid of your honour from the Tower,
to defend the city from the rebels.

Scales. Such aid as I can spare you shall command ;
But I am troubled here with them myself :
The rebels have assay'd to win the Tower.
But get you to Smithfield, and gather head,
And thither I will send you Matthew Gough :
Fight for your king, your country, and your lives ;
And so farewell, for I must hence again. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—The same. Cannon-street.

Enter JACK CADE, and his Followers. He strikes his staff on London-stone.

Cade. Now is Mortimer lord of this city. And here, sitting upon London-stone, I charge and command, that, of the city's cost, the pissing-conduit run nothing but claret wine this first year of our reign. And now, henceforward, it shall be treason for any that calls me other than lord Mortimer.

Enter a Soldier running.

Sold. Jack Cade! Jack Cade!

Cade. Knock him down there. [They kill him.]

Smith. If this fellow be wise, he'll never call you Jack Cade more : I think he hath a very fair warning.

Dick. My lord, there's an army gathered together in Smithfield.

Cade. Come then, let's go fight with them : But, first, go and set London-bridge on fire : and, if you can, burn down the Tower too. Come, let's away. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.—The same. Smithfield.

Alarum. Enter, on one side, CADE and his Company; on the other, Citizens, and the KING'S Forces, headed by MATTHEW GOUGH. They fight; the Citizens are routed, and MATTHEW GOUGH is slain.

Cade. So, sirs :—Now go some and pull down the Savoy ; others to the inns of court ; down with them all.

Dick. I have a suit unto your lordship.

Cade. Be it a lordship, thou shalt have it for that word.

Dick. Only, that the laws of England may come out of your mouth.

John. Mass, 'twill be sore law then ; for he was thrust in the mouth with a spear, and 'tis not whole yet. [Aside.]

Smith. Nay, John, it will be stinking law ; for his breath stinks with eating toasted cheese. [Aside.]

Cade. I have thought upon it, it shall be so. Away, burn all the records of the realm ; my mouth shall be the parliament of England.

John. Then we are like to have biting statutes, unless his teeth be pull'd out. [Aside.]

Cade. And henceforward, all things shall be in common.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My lord, a prize, a prize! here's the lord Say, which sold the towns in France ; he that made us pay one and twenty fifteens, and one shilling to the pound, the last subsidy.

Enter GEORGE BEVIS, with the LORD SAY.

Cade. Well, he shall be beheaded for it ten times.—Ah, thou say, thou serge, nay, thou buckram lord! now art thou within point blank of our jurisdiction regal. What canst thou answer to my majesty, for giving up of Normandy unto monsieur Basimecu, the dauphin of France?
Be it known unto thee, by these presence, even the presence of lord Mortimer, that I am the besom that must sweep the court clean of such filth as thou art. Thou hast most traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm, in erecting a grammar-school and whereas, before, our forefathers had no other books but the score and the tally, thou hast caused printing to be used ; and, contrary to the king, his crown and dignity, thou hast built a paper-mill.
It will be proved to thy face, that thou hast men about thee that usually talk of a noun, and a verb ; and such abominable words as no Christian ear can endure to hear.
Thou hast appointed justices of peace, to call poor men before them about matters they were not able to answer.
Moreover, thou hast put them in prison ; and because they could not read thou hast hanged them ; when, indeed, only for that cause they have been most worthy to live. Thou dost ride on a foot-cloth, dost thou not ?

Say. What of that ?

Cade. Marry, thou oughtest not to let thy horse wear a cloak, when honest men than thou go in their hose and doublets.

Dick. And work in their shirt too ; as myself, for example, that am a butcher.

Say. You men of Kent,—

Dick. What say you of Kent ?

Say. Nothing but this ; 'Tis bona terra, mala gens.

Cade. Away with him, away with him! he speaks Latin.

Say. Hear me but speak, and bear me where you will.

Kent, in the Commentaries Cæsar writ,
Is term'd the civil'st place of all this isle :
Sweet is the country, because full of riches ;
The people liberal, valiant, active, wealthy ;
Which makes me hope you are not void of pity.

I sold not Maine, I lost not Normandy ;
Yet, to recover them, would lose my life.
Justice with favour have I always done ;
Prayers and tears have mov'd me, gifts could never.

When have I aught exacted at your hands ?
Kent to maintain, the king, the realm, and you,<sup>1</sup>

Large gifts have I bestow'd on learned clerks,
Because my book preferr'd me to the king,
And seeing ignorance is the curse of God,
Knowledge the wing wherewith we fly to heaven.<sup>2</sup>

Unless you be possess'd with devilish spirits,
You cannot but forbear to murder me.

This tongue hath parley'd unto foreign kings
For your behoof,—

Cade. Tut! when struck'st one blow in the field ?

Say. Great men have reaching hands : oft have I struck
Those that I never saw, and struck them dead.

Geo. O monstrous coward! what, to come behind folks ?

Say. These cheeks are pale for watching<sup>3</sup> for your good.

Cade. Give him a box o' the ear, and that will make 'em red again.

Say. Long sitting to determine poor men's causes
Hath made me full of sickness and diseases.

<sup>1</sup> We follow the original punctuation in making Say unconditionally ask—
“When have I aught exacted at your hands?”

He then goes on to say that, for the good of all, he has encouraged learned men.
Instead of “Kent to main'ain,” Johnson proposes to read “But to maintain,” which has been recently adopted without a sufficient regard, we think, to the context. “Kent to maintain” is Say's answer to “What say you of Kent?”

<sup>2</sup> This is usually pointed so as to close the sentence at “preferr'd me to the king.” He not only bestowed gifts on learned clerks because his own book had preferred him, but from a general conviction that ignorance is the curse of God, &c. This declaration has little connection with the exhortation not to murder him.

Cade. Ye shall have a hempen caudle then, and the pap of hatchet.<sup>1</sup>

Dick. Why dost thou quiver, man?

Say. The palsy, and not fear, provokes me.

Cade. Nay, he nods at us; as who should say, I'll be even with you. I'll see if his head will stand steadier on a pole, or no: Take him away, and behead him.

Say. Tell me, wherein have I offended most?

Have I affected wealth, or honour; speak?

Are my chests fill'd up with extorted gold?

Is my apparel sumptuous to behold?

Whom have I injur'd, that ye seek my death?

These hands are free from guiltless blood-shedding,<sup>2</sup>

This breast from harbouring foul deceitful thoughts.

O, let me live!

Cade. I feel remorse in myself with his words: but I'll bridle it; he shall die, an it be but for pleading so well for his life. Away with him! he has a familiar under his tongue; he speaks not o' God's name. Go, take him away, I say, and strike off his head presently; and then break into his son-in-law's house, sir James Cromer, and strike off his head, and bring them both upon two poles hither.

All. It shall be done.

Say. Ah, countrymen! if when you make your prayers, God should be so obdurate as yourselves, How would it fare with your departed souls? And therefore yet relent, and save my life.

Cade. Away with him, and do as I command ye. [Exeunt some with LORD SAY.] The proudest peer in the realm shall not wear a head on his shoulders, unless he pay me tribute; there shall not a maid be married, but she shall pay to me her maidenhead ere they have it: Men shall hold of me in capite; and we charge and command that their wives be as free as heart can wish, or tongue can tell.

Dick. My lord, when shall we go to Cheapside, and take up commodities upon our bills?<sup>3</sup>

Cade. Marry, presently.

All. O brave!

Re-enter Rebels, with the heads of LORD SAY and his Son-in-law.

Cade. But is not this braver?—Let them kiss one another, for they loved well when they were alive. Now part them again, lest they consult about the giving up of some more towns in France. Soldiers, defer the spoil of the city until night: for with these borne before us, instead of maces, will we ride through the streets; and, at every corner, have them kiss.—Away! [Exeunt.]

SCENE VIII.—Southwark.

Alarum. Enter CADE, and all his Rabblement.

Cade. Up Fish street! down Saint Magnus' corner! kill and knock down! throw them into Thames!—[A parley sounded, then a retreat.] What noise is this I hear? Dare any be so bold to sound retreat or parley, when I command them kill?

Enter BUCKINGHAM, and Old CLIFFORD, with Forces.

Buck. Ay, here they be that dare and will disturb thee: Know, Cade, we come ambassadors from the king Unto the commons, whom thou hast misled; And here pronounce free pardon to them all That will forsake thee, and go home in peace.

<sup>1</sup> This is "help of hatchet" in the original text. In Steevens's edition we first read, upon the suggestion of Farmer, "the pap of a hatchet." There is every reason to think that the correction is right. "Caudle of hemp" and "pap of hatchet" were to cure Say's "sickness and diseases," according to Cade's prescription. We have no authority for the phrase "hempen caudle;" but there is no doubt that "pap of hatchet" was a common cant phrase. Lyly's pamphlet, so celebrated in the history of controversy, bears this title: "Pap with an hatchet; alias, a fig for my godson; or, crack me this nut; or, a country cuff; that is, a sound box of the ear, et cætera."

Clif. What say ye, countrymen? will ye relent, And yield to mercy, whilst 'tis offer'd you;

Or let a rabble lead you to your deaths?

Who loves the king, and will embrace his pardon,

Fling up his cap, and say—God save his majesty!

Who hateth him, and honours not his father,

Henry the Fifth, that made all France to quake,

Shake he his weapon at us, and pass by.

All. God save the king! God save the king!

Cade. What, Buckingham and Clifford, are ye so brave?

—And you, base peasants, do ye believe him? will you needs be hanged with your pardons about your necks?

Hath my sword therefore broke through London gates, that you should leave me at the White Hart in Southwark? I thought ye would never have given out these arms, till you had recovered your ancient freedom: but you are all recreants and dastards; and delight to live in slavery to the nobility. Let them break your backs with burdens, take your houses over your heads, ravish your wives and daughters before your faces: For me,—I will make shift for one; and so—God's curse light upon you all!

All. We'll follow Cade, we'll follow Cade.

Clif. Is Cade the son of Henry the Fifth,

That thus you do exclaim you'll go with him?

Will he conduct you through the heart of France,

And make the meanest of you earls and dukes?

Alas, he hath no home, no place to fly to;

Nor knows he how to live but by the spoil,

Unless by robbing of your friends, and us.

Were't not a shame that whilst you live at jar,

The fearful French, whom you late vanquished,

Should make a start o'er seas, and vanquish you?

Methinks, already, in this civil broil,

I see them lording it in London streets,

Crying—Viliaco!<sup>4</sup> unto all they meet.

Better ten thousand base-born Cades miscarry,

Than you should stoop unto a Frenchman's mercy.

To France, to France, and get what you have lost;

Spare England, for it is your native coast;

Henry hath money, you are strong and manly;

God on our side, doubt not of victory.

All. A Clifford! a Clifford! we'll follow the king and Clifford.

Cade. Was ever feather so lightly blown to and fro as this multitude? The name of Henry the Fifth hales them to a hundred mischiefs, and makes them leave me desolate. I see them lay their heads together to surprise me: my sword make way for me, for here is no staying.—In despite of the devils and hell, have through the very midst of you! and heavens and honour be witness, that no want of resolution in me, but only my followers' base and ignominious treasons, makes me betake me to my heels. [Exit.]

Buck. What, is he fled? go some, and follow him;

And he that brings his head unto the king

Shall have a thousand crowns for his reward.—

Follow me, soldiers; we'll devise a mean

To reconcile you all unto the king. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IX.—Killingworth Castle.

Enter KING HENRY, QUEEN MARGARET, and SOMERSET, on the terrace of the Castle.

K. Hen. Was ever king that joy'd an earthly throne, And could command no more content than I?

<sup>3</sup> Upon our bills. This is an équivoque. The bills of Cade were not bills of debt (as bonds for the payment of money, executed in the simplest form, were anciently called), but the brown bills of the rabble soldiery.

<sup>4</sup> Viliaco. The folio has Villiago. Florio interprets the Italian word as a rascal, &c.

No sooner was I crept out of my cradle,
But I was made a king, at nine months old:
Was never subject long'd to be a king,
As I do long and wish to be a subject.

Enter BUCKINGHAM and CLIFFORD.

Buck. Health and glad tidings to your majesty!

K. Hen. Why, Buckingham, is the traitor Cade surpris'd?
Or is he but retir'd to make him strong?

Enter, below, a great number of CADE'S Followers, with halters about their necks.

Clif. He's fled, my lord, and all his powers do yield;
And humbly thus, with halters on their necks,
Expect your highness' doom, of life or death.

K. Hen. Then, heaven, set ope thy everlasting gates,
To entertain my vows of thanks and praise!—
Soldiers, this day have you redeem'd your lives,
And show'd how well you love your prince and country:
Continue still in this so good a mind,
And Henry, though he be infortunate,
Assure yourselves, will never be unkind;
And so, with thanks, and pardon to you all,
I do dismiss you to your several countries.

All. God save the king! God save the king!

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Please it your grace to be advertised,
The duke of York is newly come from Ireland:
And with a puissant and a mighty power,
Of Gallowglasses, and stout Kernes,<sup>1</sup>
Is marching hitherward in proud array;
And still proclaimeth, as he comes along,
His arms are only to remove from thee
The duke of Somerset, whom he terms a traitor.

K. Hen. Thus stands my state, 'twixt Cade and York distress'd;
Like to a ship, that, having scap'd a tempest,
Is straightway calm'd and boarded with a pirate:
But now<sup>2</sup> is Cade driven back, his men dispers'd;
And now is York in arms to second him.
I pray thee, Buckingham, go forth and meet him;
And ask him, what's the reason of these arms.
Tell him, I'll send duke Edmund to the Tower;—
And, Somerset, we will commit thee thither,
Until his army be dismiss'd from him.

Som. My lord,
I'll yield myself to prison willingly,
Or unto death, to do my country good.

K. Hen. In any case, be not too rough in terms;
For he is fierce, and cannot brook hard language.

Buck. I will, my lord; and doubt not so to deal
As all things shall redound unto your good.

K. Hen. Come, wife, let's in, and learn to govern better;
For yet may England curse my wretched reign. [Exeunt.]

SCENE X.—Kent. Iden's Garden.

Enter CADE.

Cade. Fie on ambition! fie on myself, that have a sword, and yet am ready to famish! These five days have I hid me in these woods; and durst not peep out, for all the country is laid for me. But now am I so hungry that if I might have a lease of my life for a thousand years, I could stay no longer. Wherefore, on a brick-wall have I climbed into this garden; to see if I can eat grass, or pick a sallet another while, which is not amiss to cool a man's stomach this hot weather. And I think this word sallet was born to do me good: for, many a time, but for a sallet<sup>3</sup> my brain-pan had been cleft with a brown bill; and, many a time, when I have been dry, and bravely marching, it hath served me instead of a quart-pot to drink in: And now the word sallet<sup>4</sup> must serve me to feed on.

Enter IDEN, with Servants.

Iden. Lord, who would live turmoiled in the court,
And may enjoy such quiet walks as these?
This small inheritance my father left me
Contenteth me, and 's worth a monarchy.
I seek not to wax great by others' waning;
Or gather wealth I care not with what envy;
Sufficeth that I have maintains my state,
And sends the poor well pleased from my gate.

Cade. Here's the lord of the soil come to seize me for a stray, for entering his fee simple without leave. Ah, villain, thou wilt betray me, and get a thousand crowns of the king by carrying my head to him; but I'll make thee eat iron like an ostrich, and swallow my sword like a great pin, ere thou and I part.

Iden. Why, rude companion, whatso'er thou be,
I know thee not: Why then should I betray thee?
Is 't not enough to break into my garden,
And, like a thief, to come to rob my grounds,
Climbing my walls in spite of me the owner,
But thou wilt brave me with these saucy terms?

Cade. Brave thee? ay, by the best blood that ever was broach'd, and beard thee too. Look on me well: I have eat no meat these five days: yet, come thou and thy five men, and if I do not leave you all as dead as a door nail, I pray God I may never eat grass more.

Iden. Nay, it shall ne'er be said, while England stands,
That Alexander Iden, an esquire of Kent,
Took odds to combat a poor famish'd man.
Oppose thy steadfast gazing eyes on mine,
See if thou canst outface me with thy looks.
Set limb to limb, and thou art far the lesser;
Thy hand is but a finger to my fist;
Thy leg a stick, compared with this truncheon;
My foot shall fight with all the strength thou hast;
And if mine arm be heaved in the air,
Thy grave is digg'd already in the earth.
As for words, whose greatness answers words,
Let this my sword report what speech forbears.

Cade. By my valour, the most complete champion that ever I heard.—Steel, if thou turn the edge, or cut not out the burly-boned clown in chines of beef ere thou sleep in thy sheath, I beseech Jove on my knees thou mayest be turned to hobnails. [They fight. CADE falls.] O, I am slain! famine, and no other, hath slain me: let ten thousand devils come against me, and give me but the ten meals I have lost, and I'd defy them all. Wither, garden; and be henceforth a burying-place to all that do dwell in this house, because the unconquered soul of Cade is fled.

Iden. Is 't Cade that I have slain, that monstrous traitor?
Sword, I will hallow thee for this thy deed,
And hang thee o'er my tomb, when I am dead:
Ne'er shall this blood be wiped from thy point;
But thou shalt wear it as a herald's coat,
To emblaze the honour that thy master got.

But now—just now.

<sup>3</sup> Sallet, or sallad, a helmet; from the Spanish celada, so called, according to Du Cange, because the soldier who wears it celetur. Chaucer used the word.

<sup>1</sup> The mention of these soldiery occurs again in Macbeth (Act I. Sc. II.). In "The Mirror for Magistrates" they are described as giving no quarter:—

"The Gallowglas, the Kerne, Yield or not yield, whom so they take they slay."

Cade. Iden, farewell; and be proud of thy victory: Tell Kent from me she hath lost her best man, and exhort all the world to be cowards; for I, that never feared any, am vanquished by famine, not by valour. [Dies.]

Iden. How much thou wrong'st me, heaven be my judge. Die, damned wretch, the curse of her that bare thee! And as I thrust thy body in with my sword, So wish I, I might thrust thy soul to hell. Hence will I drag thee headlong by the heels Unto a dunghill, which shall be thy grave, And there cut off thy most ungracious head; Which I will bear in triumph to the king, Leaving thy trunk for crows to feed upon. [Exit, dragging out the body.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The same. Fields between Dartford and Blackheath.

The KING'S Camp on one side. On the other, enter YORK attended, with drum and colours his Forces at some distance.

York. From Ireland thus comes York, to claim his right, And pluck the crown from feeble Henry's head: Ring, bells, aloud; burn, bonfires, clear and bright; To entertain great England's lawful king. Ah, sancta majestas! who would not buy thee dear? Let them obey that know not how to rule; This hand was made to handle naught but gold: I cannot give due action to my words, Except a sword or sceptre balance it. A sceptre shall it have, have I a soul,<sup>1</sup> On which I'll toss the fleur-de-luce of France.

Enter BUCKINGHAM.

Whom have we here? Buckingham, to disturb me? The king hath sent him, sure: I must dissemble.

Buck. York, if thou meanest well, I greet thee well.

York. Humphrey of Buckingham, I accept thy greeting. Art thou a messenger, or come of pleasure?

Buck. A messenger from Henry, our dread liege, To know the reason of these arms in peace; Or why thou, being a subject as I am, Against thy oath and true allegiance sworn, Shouldst raise so great a power without his leave, Or dare to bring thy force so near the court.

York. Scarce can I speak, my choler is so great. O, I could hew up rocks, and fight with flint, I am so angry at these abject terms; And now, like Ajax Telamonius, On sheep or oxen could I spend my fury! I am far better born than is the king; More like a king, more kingly in my thoughts: But I must make fair weather yet awhile, Till Henry be more weak, and I more strong.—

[All the preceding is spoken aside.]

Buckingham, I prithee pardon me, That I have given no answer all this while; My mind was troubled with deep melancholy. The cause why I have brought this army hither, Is, to remove proud Somerset from the king, Seditious to his grace, and to the state.

Buck. That is too much presumption on thy part: But if thy arms be to no other end, The king hath yielded unto thy demand; The duke of Somerset is in the Tower.

York. Upon thine honour, is he prisoner?

Buck. Upon mine honour, he is prisoner.

York. Then, Buckingham, I do dismiss my powers. Soldiers, I thank you all; disperse yourselves; Meet me to-morrow in Saint George's field, You shall have pay, and everything you wish. And let my sovereign, virtuous Henry, Command my eldest son, nay, all my sons, As pledges of my fealty and love, I'll send them all as willing as I live; Lands, goods, horse, armour, anything I have Is his to use, so Somerset may die.

Buck. York, I commend this kind submission: We twain will go into his highness' tent.

Enter KING HENRY, attended.

K. Hen. Buckingham, doth York intend no harm to us, That thus he marcheth with thee arm in arm?

York. In all submission and humility, York doth present himself unto your highness.

K. Hen. Then what intend these forces thou dost bring?

York. To heave the traitor Somerset from hence; And fight against that monstrous rebel, Cade, Who since I heard to be discomfited.

Enter IDEN, with CADE'S head.

Iden. If one so rude, and of so mean condition, May pass into the presence of a king, Lo, I present your grace a traitor's head, The head of Cade, whom I in combat slew.

K. Hen. The head of Cade?—Great God, how just art thou!—

O, let me view his visage being dead, That living wrought me such exceeding trouble. Tell me, my friend, art thou the man that slew him?

Iden. I was, an't like your majesty.

K. Hen. How art thou call'd? and what is thy degree?

Iden. Alexander Iden, that's my name; A poor esquire of Kent, that loves his king.

Buck. So please it you, my lord, 'twere not amiss He were created knight for his good service.

K. Hen. Iden, kneel down: [He kneels.] Rise up a knight.

We give thee for reward a thousand marks; And will that thou henceforth attend on us.

Iden. May Iden live to merit such a bounty, And never live but true unto his liege!

K. Hen. See, Buckingham! Somerset comes with the queen; Go, bid her hide him quickly from the duke.

Enter QUEEN MARGARET and SOMERSET.

Q. Mar. For thousand Yorks he shall not hide his head, But boldly stand, and front him to his face.

York. How now! Is Somerset at liberty? Then, York, unloose thy long-imprison'd thoughts, And let thy tongue be equal with thy heart. Shall I endure the sight of Somerset?— False king! why hast thou broken faith with me, Knowing how hardly I can brook abuse? King did I call thee? no, thou art not king; Not fit to govern and rule multitudes,

<sup>1</sup> Some editors make a difficulty here, and would read—
"A sceptre shall it have, have I a sword."

The meaning is very obvious by reading "have I a soul" parenthetically; that is, if I have a soul.

Which dar'st not, no, nor canst not rule a traitor.
That head of thine doth not become a crown;
Thy hand is made to grasp a palmer's staff,
And not to grace an awful princely sceptre.
That gold must round engirt these brows of mine;
Whose smile and frown, like to Achilles' spear,
Is able with the change to kill and cure.

Here is a hand to hold a sceptre up,
And with the same to act controlling laws.
Give place; by heaven, thou shalt rule no more
O'er him whom heaven created for thy ruler.

Som. O monstrous traitor!—I arrest thee, York,
Of capital treason 'gainst the king and crown:
Obey, audacious traitor; kneel for grace.

York. Wouldst have me kneel? first let me ask of these,<sup>1</sup>
If they can brook I bow a knee to man.
Sirrah, call in my sons to be my bail;

[Exit an Attendant.]

I know, ere they will have me go to ward,
They'll pawn their swords for my enfranchisement.

Q. Mar. Call hither Clifford; bid him come amain,

[Exit BUCKINGHAM.]

To say, if that the bastard boys of York
Shall be the surety for their traitor father.

York. O blood-bespotted Neapolitan,
Outcast of Naples, England's bloody scourge!
The sons of York, thy betters in their birth,
Shall be their father's bail; and bane to those
That for my surety will refuse the boys.

Enter EDWARD and RICHARD PLANTAGENET, with Forces, at one side; at the other, with Forces also, Old CLIFFORD and his Son.

See, where they come; I'll warrant they'll make it good.

Q. Mar. And here comes Clifford, to deny their bail.

Clif. Health and all happiness to my lord the king!

[Kneels.]

York. I thank thee, Clifford: Say, what news with thee?
Nay, do not fright us with an angry look:
We are thy sovereign, Clifford, kneel again;
For thy mistaking so we pardon thee.

Clif. This is my king, York, I do not mistake;
But thou mistak'st me much to think I do:—
To Bedlam with him! is the man grown mad?

K. Hen. Ay, Clifford; a bedlam and ambitious humour
Makes him oppose himself against his king.

Clif. He is a traitor; let him to the Tower,
And chop away that factious pate of his.

Q. Mar. He is arrested, but will not obey;
His sons, he says, shall give their words for him.

York. Will you not, sons?

Edw. Ay, noble father, if our words will serve.

Rich. And if words will not, then our weapons shall.

Clif. Why, what a brood of traitors have we here!

York. Look in a glass, and call thy image so;
I am thy king, and thou a false heart traitor.
Call hither to the stake my two brave bears,<sup>2</sup>
That, with the very shaking of their chains,
They may astonish these fell lurking curs;
Bid Salisbury and Warwick come to me.

Drums. Enter WARWICK and SALISBURY, with Forces.

Clif. Are these thy bears? we'll bait thy bears to death,
And manacle the bear-ward in their chains,
If thou dar'st bring them to the baiting place.

Rich. Oft have I seen a hot o'erweening cur
Run back and bite, because he was withheld;
Who, being suffer'd with the bear's fell paw,
Hath clapp'd his tail between his legs, and cried:
And such a piece of service will you do,
If you oppose yourselves to match lord Warwick.

Clif. Hence, heap of wrath, foul indigested lump,
As crooked in thy manners as thy shape!

York. Nay, we shall heat you thoroughly anon.

Clif. Take heed, lest by your heat you burn yourselves.

K. Hen. Why, Warwick, hath thy knee forgot to bow?
Old Salisbury,—shame to thy silver hair,
Thou mad misleader of thy brain-sick son!—
What, wilt thou on thy death-bed play the ruffian,
And seek for sorrow with thy spectacles?

O, where is faith? O, where is loyalty?
If it be banish'd from the frosty head,
Where shall it find a harbour in the earth?—
Wilt thou go dig a grave to find out war,
And shame thine honourable age with blood?
Why art thou old and want'st experience?
Or wherefore dost abuse it if thou hast it?
For shame! in duty bend thy knee to me,
That bows unto the grave with mickle age.

Sal. My lord, I have consider'd with myself
The title of this most renowned duke;
And in my conscience do repute his grace
The rightful heir to England's royal seat.

K. Hen. Hast thou not sworn allegiance unto me?

Sal. I have.

K. Hen. Canst thou dispense with heaven for such an oath?

Sal. It is great sin, to swear unto a sin;
But greater sin, to keep a sinful oath.
Who can be bound by any solemn vow
To do a murderous deed, to rob a man,
To force a spotless virgin's chastity,
To reave the orphan of his patrimony,
To wring the widow from her custom'd right;
And have no other reason for this wrong
But that he was bound by a solemn oath?

Q. Mar. A subtle traitor needs no sophister.

K. Hen. Call Buckingham, and bid him arm himself.

York. Call Buckingham, and all the friends thou hast,
I am resolv'd for death, or dignity.

Clif. The first I warrant thee, if dreams prove true.

War. You were best to go to bed, and dream again,
To keep thee from the tempest of the field.

Clif. I am resolv'd to bear a greater storm
Than any thou canst conjure up to-day;
And that I'll write upon thy burgonet,
Might I but know thee by thy household badge.

War. Now, by my father's badge, old Nevil's crest,
The rampant bear chain'd to the ragged staff,
This day I'll wear aloft my burgonet,
(As on a mountain-top the cedar shows,
That keeps his leaves in spite of any storm,
Even to affright thee with the view thereof.)

Clif. And from thy burgonet I'll rend thy bear,
And tread it under foot with all contempt,
Despite the bear-ward that protects the bear.

Y. Clif. And so to arms, victorious father,
To quell the rebels, and their 'complices.

Rich. Fie! charity, for shame! speak not in spite,
For you shall sup with Jesu Christ to-night.

Y. Clif. Foul stigmatick,<sup>3</sup> that's more than thou canst tell.

Rich. If not in heaven, you'll surely sup in hell.

[Exeunt severally.]

<sup>3</sup> Stigmatick. This was the appellation of an offender who had been branded—upon whom a stigma had been set. Young Clifford insults Richard with the natural stigma of his deformity.

SCENE II.—Saint Alban's.

Alarums Excursions. Enter WARWICK.

War. Clifford of Cumberland, 'tis Warwick calls!
And if thou dost not hide thee from the bear,
Now, when the angry trumpet sounds alarum,
And dead men's cries do fill the empty air,
Clifford, I say, come forth and fight with me:
Proud northern lord, Clifford of Cumberland,
Warwick is hoarse with calling thee to arms.

Enter YORK.

How now, my noble lord? what, all a-foot?

York. The deadly-handed Clifford slew my steed;
But match to match I have encounter'd him,
And made a prey for carrion kites and crows
Even of the bonny beast he lov'd so well.

Enter CLIFFORD.

War. Of one or both of us the time is come.

York. Hold, Warwick, seek thee out some other chase,
For I myself must hunt this deer to death.

War. Then, nobly, York; 'tis for a crown thou fight'st.
As I intend, Clifford, to thrive to-day,
It grieves my soul to leave thee unassail'd. [Exit.]

Clif. What seest thou in me, York? why dost thou pause?

York. With thy brave bearing should I be in love,
But that thou art so fast mine enemy.

Clif. Nor should thy prowess want praise and esteem,
But that 'tis shown ignobly, and in treason.

York. So let it help me now against thy sword,
As I in justice and true right express it!

Clif. My soul and body on the action both!—

York. A dreadful lay!—address thee instantly.

[They fight, and CLIFFORD falls.]

Clif. La fin couronne les œuvres. [Dies.]

York. Thus war hath given thee peace, for thou art still.
Peace with his soul, heaven, if it be thy will. [Exit.]

Enter Young CLIFFORD.

Y. Clif. Shame and confusion! all is on the rout;
Fear frames disorder, and disorder wounds
Where it should guard. O war, thou son of hell,
Whom angry heavens do make their minister,
Throw in the frozen bosoms of our part
Hot coals of vengeance!—Let no soldier fly:
He that is truly dedicate to war
Hath no self-love; nor he that loves himself
Hath not essentially, but by circumstance,
The name of valour.—O, let the vile world end,

[Seeing his dead father.]

And the premised flames of the last day
Knit earth and heaven together!
Now let the general trumpet blow his blast,
Particularities and petty sounds
To cease!<sup>1</sup> Wast thou ordain'd, dear father,
To lose thy youth in peace, and to achieve
The silver livery of advised age,
And in thy reverence, and thy chair-days, thus
To die in ruffian battle?—Even at this sight
My heart is turn'd to stone: and, while 'tis mine,
It shall be stony. York not our old men spares;
No more will I their babes: tears virginal
Shall be to me even as the dew to fire;

<sup>1</sup> To cease—actively—to stop.<sup>2</sup> See the prediction in Act I.,—

"Let him shun castles."

And beauty, that the tyrant oft reclaims,
Shall to my flaming wrath be oil and flax.
Henceforth I will not have to do with pity:
Meet I an infant of the house of York,
Into as many gobbets will I cut it,
As wild Medea young Absyrtus did:
In cruelty will I seek out my fame.
Come, thou new ruin of old Clifford's house;
[Taking up the body.]

As did Æneas old Anchises bear,
So bear I thee upon my manly shoulders;
But then Æneas bare a living load,
Nothing so heavy as these woes of mine. [Exit.]

Enter RICHARD PLANTAGENET and SOMERSET, fighting, and SOMERSET is killed.

Rich. So, lie thou there;—
For, underneath an alehouse' paltry sign,
The Castle in Saint Alban's, Somerset
Hath made the wizard famous in his death.<sup>2</sup>
Sword, hold thy temper: heart, be wrathful still:
Priests pray for enemies, but princes kill. [Exit.]

Alarums Excursions. Enter KING HENRY, QUEEN MARGARET, and others, retreating.

Q. Mar. Away, my lord! you are slow; for shame,
away!

K. Hen. Can we outrun the heavens? good Margaret, stay.

Q. Mar. What are you made of? you'll not fight, nor fly:
Now is it manhood, wisdom, and defence,
To give the enemy way; and to secure us
By what we can, which can no more but fly.

[Alarum afar off.]

If you be ta'en, we then should see the bottom
Of all our fortunes: but if we haply scape,
(As well we may, if not through your neglect,)
We shall to London get, where you are lov'd;
And where this breach, now in our fortunes made,
May readily be stopp'd.

Enter Young CLIFFORD.

Y. Clif. But that my heart's on future mischief set,
I would speak blasphemy ere bid you fly;
But fly you must; uncurable discomfit
Reigns in the hearts of all our present parts.<sup>3</sup>
Away, for your relief! and we will live
To see their day, and them our fortune give:
Away, my lord, away! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Fields near Saint Alban's.

Alarum Retreat. Flourish; then enter YORK, RICHARD PLANTAGENET, WARWICK, and Soldiers, with drum and colours.

York. Of Salisbury, who can report of him:—
That winter lion, who in rage forgets
Aged contusions and all brush of time;
And, like a gallant in the brow of youth,
Repairs him with occasion? This happy day
Is not itself, nor have we won one foot,
If Salisbury be lost.

Rich. My noble father,
Three times to-day I help him to his horse,

<sup>3</sup> Parts—parties, party.
8 R

KING HENRY VI.—PART II.

Three times bestrid him, thrice I led him off,
Persuaded him from any further act :
But still where danger was still there I met him ;
And like rich hangings in a homely house,
So was his will in his old feeble body.
But, noble as he is, look where he comes.

Enter SALISBURY.

Sal. Now, by my sword, well hast thou fought to-day ;
By the mass, so did we all.—I thank you, Richard :
God knows how long it is I have to live ;
And it hath pleas'd him, that three times to-day
You have defended me from imminent death.

Well, lords, we have not got that which we have :
'Tis not enough our foes are this time fled,
Being opposites of such repairing nature.

York. I know our safety is to follow them ;
For, as I hear, the king is fled to London,
To call a present court of parliament.

Let us pursue him, ere the writs go forth :
What says lord Warwick ? shall we after them ?

War. After them ! nay, before them, if we can.

Now, by my hand, lords, 'twas a glorious day :
Saint Alban's battle, won by famous York,
Shall be eterniz'd in all age to come.

Sound, drum and trumpets :—and to London all :

And more such days as these to us befall ! [Exeunt.

ILLUSTRATION TO KING HENRY VI.—PART II.

ACT II.

<sup>a</sup> SCENE III.—“As Bevis of Southampton fell upon Ascabart.”

WE have been unwilling to part with these words, although they are wanting in the text as revised by Shakspeare. The allusions in our old poets to the older romances form a chain of traditionary literature of which it is not pleasant to lose a single link. We have no doubt that our greatest poet was a diligent student of those ancient legends, upon which one who in many respects greatly resembled him chiefly formed himself. Scott has done more than any man of our own generation to send us back to these well-heads of poesy. His lines in the “Lady of the Lake” illustrate the passage before us :—

“My sire's tall form might grace the part
Of Ferragus, or Ascabart.”

Sir Bevis has had monuments of stone (as the Bar-Gate at Southampton), and more enduring monuments of literature. He earned these honours, as the legend says, by the conquest of the mightiest of giants, who yet stands by his side, in the sculptured record, as a person of very reasonable dimensions. But the romance (we give the modernised version of Ellis) tells us something different :—

“This giant was mighty and strong,
And full thirty feet was long.
He was bristled like a sow ;
A foot he had between each brow ;
His lips were great and hung aside ;
His eyes were hollow, his mouth was wide ;
Lothly he was to look on than,
And liker a devil than a man :
His staff was a young oak,—
Hard and heavy was his stroke.”

ACT I.

THE connection between the last scene of the First Part of Henry VI. and the first scene of the Second Part is as perfect as if they each belonged to one play. The concluding words of that last scene show us Suffolk departing for France for the accomplishment of the anxious wish of Henry—

“That lady Margaret do vouchsafe to come
To cross the seas to England.”

In the first lines of the Second Part we find Suffolk returned from his mission, the purpose of which, as expressed in the last scene of the First Part, he here recapitulates. The passage of the poet is almost exactly copied from the historians, Holinshed being in this case a literal transcriber from Hall :—“The Marquis of Suffolk, as procurator to King Henry, espoused the said lady in the church of St. Martin's. At the which marriage were present the father and mother of the bride ; the French king himself, which was uncle to the husband ; and the French queen also, which was aunt to the wife. There were also the Dukes of Orleans, of Calaber, of Alanson, and of Britaine, seven earls, twelve barons, twenty bishops, besides knights and gentlemen.”

The displeasure of the Duke of Gloster at this marriage is indicated by the poet in the last scene of the First Part. There Henry says—

“Agree to any covenants.”

The announcement of the surrender of Anjou and Maine is reserved by the dramatist for the scene before us. This surrender is the chief cause of the Duke of Gloster's indignation, as expressed in the celebrated speech—“Brave peers of England, pillars of the state,” &c.

The poet makes the duke intimate no dislike of the queen's person ; and Henry, indeed, expressly thanks him

“for this great favour done,
In entertainment to my princely queen.”

The poet here follows Holinshed, who copies Fabyan :—“On the eighteenth of May she came to London, all the lords of England in most sumptuous sort meeting and receiving her upon the way, and specially the Duke of Gloster, with such honour as stood with the dignity of his person.” Of this circumstance Hall has no mention.

Margaret of Anjou arrived in England in 1445. Her impatience under the authority of the Protector Gloster, and her intrigues to procure his disgrace, are set forth very graphically by Hall :—“This woman, perceiving that her husband did not frankly rule as he would, but did all things by the advice and counsel of Humphrey Duke of Gloster, and that he passed not much on the authority and governance of the realm, determined with herself to take upon her the rule and regiment both of the king and his kingdom, and to deprive and evict out of all rule and authority the said duke, then called the lord protector of the realm: lest men should say and report that she had neither wit nor stomach, which would permit and suffer her husband, being of perfect age and man's estate, like a young scholar or innocent pupil to be governed by the disposition of another man." But the hatred of Queen Margaret to "duke Humphrey's wife" is purely an invention of the poet. The disgrace of Eleanor Cobham took place three years before the arrival of Margaret in England. It is insinuated, however, by the chroniclers, that the accusation of the duchess upon a charge of sorcery and treason was prompted by the enemies of the protector. The following is Hall's account of this tragedy, in which "horror and absurdity are mingled in about equal portions:"*—

"But venom will once break out, and inward grudge will soon appear, which was this year to all men apparent: for divers secret attempts were advanced forward this season against the noble duke Humphrey of Gloster, afar off, which in conclusion came so near that they bereft him both of life and land, as you shall hereafter more manifestly perceive. For first this year, dame Eleanor Cobham, wife to the said duke, was accused of treason, for that she, by sorcery and enchantment, intended to destroy the king, to the intent to advance and to promote her husband to the crown: upon this she was examined in Saint Stephen's chapel, before the bishop of Canterbury, and there by examination convict and judged to do open penance in three open places within the city of London, and after that adjudged to perpetual prison in the Isle of Man, under the keeping of Sir John Stanley, knight. At the same season were arrested, as aiders and counsellors to the said duchess, Thomas Southwel, priest and canon of Saint Stephen's in Westminster; John Hum, priest; Roger Bolingbroke, a cunning necromancer; and Margery Jourdain, surnamed the witch of Eye: to whose charge it was laid, that they, at the request of the duchess, had devised an image of wax representing the king, which by their sorcery a little and little consumed, intending thereby in conclusion to waste and destroy the king's person, and so to bring him death; for the which treason they were adjudged to die: and so Margery Jourdain was burnt in Smithfield, and Roger Bolingbroke was drawn and quartered at Tyburn, taking upon his death that there was never no such thing by them imagined. John Hum had his pardon, and Southwel died in the Tower before execution. The Duke of Gloster took all these things patiently, and said little."

In the third scene, the charges which Beaufort, and Somerset, and Buckingham insultingly heap upon the protector are supported by this passage of Hall:—"Divers articles, both heinous and odious, were laid to his charge in open council; and in especial, one that he had caused men adjudged to die to be put to other execution than the law of the land had ordered or assigned." This is the charge of Buckingham:—

"Thy cruelty in execution,
Upon offenders, hath exceeded law,
And left thee to the mercy of the law."

ACT II.

The miracle scene at St. Alban's is founded upon a real occurrence. Sir Thomas More tells the story as related to him by his father. The poet probably found it in More's works, which were printed in 1557; but this ludicrous episode in a tragic history is also thus told by Grafton in his Chronicle:—

"In the time of King Henry VI., as he rode in progress, there came to the town of Saint Alban's a certain beggar, with his wife, and there was walking about the town, begging, five or six days before the king's coming, saying that he was born blind, and never saw in all his life; and was warned in his dream that he should come out of Berwick, where he said that he had ever dwelled, to seek Saint Alban. When the king was come, and the town full of people, suddenly this blind man, at Saint Alban's shrine, had his sight; and the same was solemnly rung for a miracle, and Te Deum songen: so that nothing was talked of in all the town but this miracle. So happened it then that Duke Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, a man no less wise than also well learned, called the poor man up to him, and looked well upon his eyen, and asked whether he could never see anything at all in all his life before? and when as well his wife as himself affirmed fastly, No; then he looked advisedly upon his eyen again, and said, I believe you may well, for me thinketh that ye cannot see well yet. Yes, sir, quoth he: I thank God and his holy martyr, I can see now as well as any man. Ye can, quoth the duke; what colour is this gown? Then anon the beggar told him. What colour, quoth he, is this man's gown? He told him also, without staying or stumbling, and told the names of all the colours that could be showed him. And when the duke saw that, he made him be set openly in the stocks."

The poet found the picturesque story of the trial of battle between the armourer and his servant thus briefly told in Holinshed:—

"In the same year also a certain armourer was appeached of treason by a servant of his own. For proof thereof a day was given them to fight in Smithfield, insomuch that in conflict the said armourer was overcome and slain; but yet by misgoverning of himself: for, on the morrow, when he should come to the field fresh and fasting, his neighbours came to him, and gave him wine and strong drink in such excessive sort that he was therewith distempered, and reeled as he went, and so was slain without guilt. As for the false servant, he lived not long unpunished; for, being convict of felony in court of assize, he was judged to be hanged, and so was, at Tyburn."

The event is dramatically connected by the poet with the main plot, by his exact description of the treason of which "a certain armourer was appeached:—

"His words were these;—that Richard, duke of York,
Was rightful heir unto the English crown;
And that your majesty was an usurper."

The poetical variations of the incident told by Holinshed greatly heighten the dramatic effect. The scene, in all probability, presents an accurate representation of the forms which attended a trial of battle. In this remarkable case of the battle between the armourer and his servant, some very curious particulars, not detailed by the chroniclers, have been found in the original precept to the sheriffs, and the return of expenses on the occasion, both of which are preserved in the Exchequer. The names of the combatants were John Daveys and William Catour. The barriers, it appears, were brought to Smithfield from Westminster; a large quantity of sand and gravel was laid down, and the place of battle was strewed with rushes. The return of expenses contains the following item:—"Also paid to officers for watchyng of ye ded man in Smyth felde ye same day and ye nyghte aftyr yt ye bataill was doon, and for hors hyre for ye officers at ye execution doying, and for ye hangman's labor, xjs. vi<sup>d</sup>." The "hangman's labor" was subsequent to the battle. All the historians agree that the armourer was slain by his servant; but the ceremonies attending the punishment of a traitor were gone through with the dead body. (See Douce, "Illustrations.") It is remarkable that the trial of battle was only abolished by law as recently as 1819, and that in the previous year there was every probability that a somewhat similar scene to that here dramatized would have been acted by the authority of the law, in the celebrated case of Ashford and Thornton.

ACT III.

We have already noticed the charges which were made by his enemies against the Duke of Gloster. Hall, whom Holinshed copies, thus proceeds to describe his death:—

"Although the duke (not without great laud and praise) sufficiently answered to all things to him objected, yet because his death was determined, his wisdom little helped, nor his truth smally availed: but of this unquietness of mind he delivered himself, because he thought neither of death, nor of condemnation to die: such affianced had he in his strong truth, and such confidence had he in indifferent justice. But his capital enemies and mortal foes, fearing that some tumult or commotion might arise if a prince so well beloved of the people should be openly executed and put to death, determined to trap and undo him, or he thereof should have knowledge or warning. So, for the furtherance of their purpose, a parliament was summoned to be kept at Bury, whither resorted all the peers of the realm, and amongst them the Duke of Gloster, which, on the second day of the session, was by the Lord Beaumont, then high constable of England, accompanied by the Duke of Buckingham and other, arrested, apprehended, and put in ward, and all his servants sequestered from him, and xxxii of the chief of his retinue were sent to divers prisons, to the great admiration of the common people. The duke, the night after his imprisonment, was found dead in his bed, and his body showed to the lords and commons as though he had died of a palsy or empostom; but all indifferent persons well knew that he died of no natural death, but of some violent force."

The conspiracy which the poet has exhibited in the first scene of this act, of the queen, the cardinal, Suffolk, and York against the life of Gloster, is not borne out by any relation of the chroniclers. Indeed, it is by no means clear that the duke actually did die by violence. The people, no doubt, firmly believed that he came to his end by foul practices; and they would naturally associate this belief with the suspicion of his avowed enemies. Hence, probably, the general tone of the chroniclers. The participation of the queen in the supposed crime is distinctly stated by Hall; and he suggests, also, the motive by which York might have been prompted to remove so able and popular a branch of the house of Lancaster as the Duke Humphrey. The following passage bears upon both points:—

"There is an old said saw, that a man intending to avoid the smoke falleth into the fire: so here the queen, minding to preserve her husband in honour and herself in authority, procured and consented to the death of this noble man, whose only death brought to pass that thing which she would most fain have eschewed, and took from her that jewel which she most desired: for if this duke had lived, the Duke of York durst not have made title to the crown: if this duke had lived, the nobles had not conspired against the king, nor yet the commons had not rebelled: if this duke had lived, the house of Lancaster had not been defaced and destroyed; which things happened all contrary by the destruction of this good man."

The banishment of Suffolk took place in 1450, three years after the death of Gloster. In the articles against him "proponed by the commons" there were many accusations of "treason, misprision, and evil demeanour;" but the murder of the Duke of Gloster was not therein imputed to him. Hall, indeed, says that the commonalty affirmed him to "be the chief procurer of the death of the good Duke of Gloster." The protection of the queen, "which entirely loved the duke," was for some time his safeguard; but he was finally banished by the king, according to Hall, "as the abhorred toad and common nuisance of the whole realm, for the term of five years." The poet has brought events which were separated by considerable intervals of time into a dramatic unity; and he has connected the guilt which was popularly attributed to Suffolk with the punishment which was demanded by the public hatred of him.

The death of Cardinal Beaufort is one of those scenes of the Shaksperian drama which stand in the place of real history, and almost supersede its authority. Shakspeare, however, found the meagre outline of this great scene in a passage of Hall:—

"During these doings, Henry Beauford Bishop of Winchester, and called the rich cardinal, departed out of this world, and was buried at Winchester. This man was son to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, descended of an honourable lineage, but born in baste, more noble of blood than notable in learning, haut in stomach and high in countenance, rich above measure of all men, and to few liberal; disdainful to his kin and dreadful to his lovers, preferring money before friendship, many things beginning and nothing performing. His covetous insaciableness, and hope of long life, made him both to forget God, his prince, and himself, in his latter days; for Doctor John Baker, his privy counsellor and his chaplain, wrote that he, lying on his death-bed, said these words: 'Why should I die, having so much riches? If the whole realm would save my life, I am able either by policy to get it, or by riches to buy it. Fie! will not death be hired, nor will money do nothing? When my nephew of Bedford died, I thought myself half up the wheel; but when I saw my other nephew of Gloster deceased, then I thought myself able to be equal with kings, and so thought to increase my treasure in hope to have worn a triple crown. But I see now the world faileth me, and so I am deceived: praying you all to pray for me.'"

ACT IV.

The extraordinary circumstances attending the execution, or more properly murder, of the Duke of Suffolk are very briefly given by the chroniclers. Holinshed, in the following passage, copies Hall with little variation:—

"But God's justice would not that so ungracious a person should so escape; for when he shipped in Suffolk, intending to transport himself over into France, he was encountered with a ship of war appertaining to the Duke of Excester, constable of the Tower of London, called the Nicholas of the Tower. The captain of that bark with small fight entered into the duke's ship, and, perceiving his person present, brought him to Dover Road, and there on one side of a cock-boat caused his head to be stricken off, and left his body with the head lying there on the sands; which corpse, being there found by a chaplain of his, was conveyed to Wingfield College, in Suffolk, and there buried. This end had William de la Poole Duke of Suffolk, as men judge by God's providence, for that he had procured the death of that good duke of Gloster, as before is partly touched."

The most circumstantial account of this event is to be found in the Paston Correspondence, in one of the letters in that most curious and interesting collection, dated the 5th of May, 1450, and written immediately after the occurrence:—

"Right worshipful Sir,—I recommend me to you, and am right sorry of that I shall say, and have so washed this little bill with sorrowful tears, that scarcely ye shall read it. As on Monday next after May-day (4th May) there came tidings to London that on Thursday before (30th April) the Duke of Suffolk came unto the coasts of Kent full near Dover, with his two ships and a little spinner; the which spinner he sent with certain letters by certain of his trusted men unto Calais-ward to know how he should be received, and with him met a ship called Nicholas of the Tower, with other ships waiting on him, and by them that were in the spinner the master of the Nicholas had knowledge of the duke's coming. When he espied the duke's ships he sent full his boat to weet what they were, and the duke himself spoke to them, and said he was, by the king's commandment, sent to Calais-ward, &c.; and they said he must speak with their master; and so he, with two or three of his men, went forth with them in their boat to the Nicholas; and when he came the master bid him Welcome, traitor, as men say. And further, the master desired to weet if the shipmen would hold with the duke, and they sent word they would not in no wise; and so he was in the Nicholas till Saturday next following. Some say he wrote much things to be delivered to the king, but that is not verily known; some say he had his confessor with him, &c.; and some say he was arraigned in the ship in their manner, upon the impeachments, and found guilty, &c."

"Also he asked the name of the ship, and when he knew it he remembered Stacy, that said, if he might escape the danger of the Tower he would be safe; and then his heart failed him, for he thought he was deceived. And in the sight of all his men he was drawn out of the great ship into the boat, and there was an axe and a stock; and one of the lewdest of the ship bade him lay down his head, and he should be fairly ferd (dealt) with, and die on a sword; and took a rusty sword and smote off his head within half-a-dozen strokes, and took away his gown of russet, and his doublet of velvet mailed, and laid his body on the sands of Dover, and some say his head was set on a pole by it, and his men set on the land, by great circumstance and prey. And the sheriff of Kent doth watch the body, and sent his under-sheriff to the judges to weet what to do; and also to the king, what shall be done. Further I wot not; but thus far is it, if the process be erroneous let his counsel reverse it," &c.

The other scenes of this act are almost wholly occupied with the insurrection of Cade. In the principal events the poet has pretty exactly followed the chroniclers; but the vigorous delineation of character is entirely his own. The narrative of Holinshed is copied almost literally from that of Hall, with the introduction, however, of several state papers not given by the elder chronicler. The story is told by Hall with great spirit; and we give it entire to show with what wonderful power Shakspeare seized upon these materials to work them up into a representation, universally and permanently true, of the folly and injustice which invariably attend every attempt to redress public grievances by popular violence:—

“A certain young man of a goodly stature and pregnant wit was enticed to take upon him the name of John Mortimer, although his name was John Cade, and not for a small policy, thinking that by that surname the line and lineage of the assistant house of the Earl of March, which were no small number, should be to him both adherent and favourable. This captain, not only suborned by teachers, but also enforced by privy schoolmasters, assembled together a great company of tall personages; assuring them that their attempt was both honourable to God and the king, and also profitable to the commonwealth, promising them, that if either by force or policy they might once take the king, the queen, and other their counsellors, into their hands and governance, that they would honourably entreat the king, and so sharply handle his counsellors, that neither fifteens should hereafter be demanded, nor once any impositions or tax should be spoken of. These persuasions, with many other fair promises of liberty (which the common people more affect and desire, rather than reasonable obedience and due conformity), so animated the Kentish people, that they, with their captain above named, in good order of battle (not in great number) came to the plain of Blackheath, between Eldham and Greenwich. And to the intent that the cause of this glorious captain's coming thither might be shadowed from the king and his counsel, he sent to him an humble supplication, with loving words but with malicious intent, affirming his coming not to be against him, but against divers of his counsel, lovers of themselves and oppressors of the poor commonalty, flatterers to the king and enemies to his honour, suckers of his purse and robbers of his subjects, partial to their friends and extreme to their enemies, for rewards corrupted and for indifferency nothing doing. This proud bill was both of the king and his counsel disdainfully taken, and thereupon great consultation had, and after long debating it was concluded that such proud rebels should rather be suppressed and tamed with violence and force than with fair words or amicable answer: whereupon the king assembled a great army and marched toward them, which had lyen on Blackheath by the space of vii days. The subtil captain, named Jack Cade, intending to bring the king farther within the compass of his net, brake up his camp, and retired backward to the town of Sevenoaks, in Kent, and there, expecting his prey, encamped himself and made his abode. The queen, which bare the rule, being of his retreat well advertised, sent Sir Humphrey Stafford, knight, and William his brother, with many other gentlemen, to follow the chase of the Kentishmen, thinking that they had fled; but verily they were deceived; for at the first skirmish both the Staffords were slain, and all their company shamefully discomfited. The king's army, being at this time come to Blackheath, hearing of this discomfiture, began to grudge and murmur amongst themselves; some wishing the Duke of York at home to aid the captain his cousin; some desiring the overthrow of the king and his counsel; other openly crying out on the queen and her complices. This rumour, openly spoken and commonly published, caused the king, and certain of his counsel, not led by favour nor corrupted by rewards (to the intent to appease the furious rage of the inconstant multitude), to commit the Lord Say, Treasurer of England, to the Tower of London; and if other, against whom like displeasure was borne, had been present, they had likewise been served: but it was necessary that one should suffer rather than all the nobility then should perish. When the Kentish captain, or the covetous Cade, had thus obtained victory and slain the two valiant Staffords, he apparelled himself in their rich armour, and so with pomp and glory returned again toward London; in which retreat, divers idle and vagabond persons resorted to him from Sussex and Surrey, and from other parts, to a great number. Thus this glorious captain, compassed about and environed with a multitude of evil, rude, and rustic persons, came again to the plain of Blackheath, and there strongly encamped himself: to whom were sent by the king the Archbishop of Canterbury and Humphrey Duke of Buckingham, to commune with him of his griefs and requests. These lords found him sober in communication, wise in disputing, arrogant in heart, and stiff in his opinion, and by no ways possible to be persuaded to dissolve his army, except the king in person would come to him and assent to all things which he would require. These lords, perceiving the wilful pertinacy and manifest contumacy of this rebellious Javelin, departed to the king, declaring to him his temerarious and rash words and presumptuous requests. The king, somewhat hearing and more marking the sayings of this outrageous losel, and having daily report of the concourse and access of people which continually resorted to him, doubting as much his familiar servants as his unknown subjects (which spared not to speak that the captain's cause was profitable for the commonwealth), departed in all haste to the castle of Killingworth, in Warwickshire, leaving only behind him the Lord Scales, to keep the Tower of London. The captain, being advertised of the king's absence, came first into Southwark, and there lodged at the White Hart, prohibiting to all men murder, rape, or robbery; by which colour he allured to him the hearts of the common people. But after that he entered into London, and cut the ropes of the drawbridge, striking his sword on London stone, saying, ‘Now is Mortimer lord of this city,’ and rode in every street like a lordly captain. And after a flattering declaration made to the mayor of the city of his thither coming, he departed again into Southwark. And upon the third day of July he caused Sir James Fines, Lord Say, and Treasurer of England, to be brought to the Guildhall of London, and there to be arraigned; which, being before the king's justices put to answer, desired to be tried by his peers, for the longer delay of his life. The captain, perceiving his dilatory plea, by force took him from the officers and brought him to the standard in Cheap, and there, before his confession ended, caused his head to be cut off, and pitched it on a high pole, which was openly borne before him through the streets. And this cruel tyrant, not content with the murder of the Lord Say, went to Mile-end, and there apprehended Sir James Cromer, then Sheriff of Kent, and son-in-law to the said Lord Say, and him, without confession or excuse heard, caused there likewise to be beheaded, and his head fixed on a pole, and with these two heads this bloody butcher entered into the city again, and in despite caused them in every street kiss together, to the great detestation of all the beholders.

“After this shameful murder succeeded open rapine and manifest robbery in divers houses within the city, and in especial in the house of Philip Malpas, alderman of London, and divers other: over and beside ransoming and fining of divers notable merchants, for the tuition and security of their lives and goods; as Robert Horne, alderman, which paid v C marks, and yet neither he or no other person was either of life or substance in a surety or safeguard. He also put to execution in Southwark divers persons, some for infringing his rules and precepts, because he would be seen indifferent; other he tormented of his old acquaintance, lest they should blase and declare his base birth and low lineage, disparaging him from his usurped name of Mortimer; for the which he thought, and doubted not, both to have friends and fautors both in London, Kent, and Essex. The wise mayor and sage magistrates of the city of London, perceiving themselves neither to be sure of goods nor of life well warranted, determined with fear to repell and expulse this mischievous head and his ungracious company. And because the Lord Scales was ordained keeper of the Tower of London, with Matthew Gough, the often-named captain in Normandy (as you have heard before), they purposed to make them privy both of their intent and enterprise. The Lord Scales promised them his aid, with shooting of ordinance; and Matthew Gough was by him appointed to assist the mayor and the Londoners, because he was both of manhood and experience greatly renowned and noised. So the captains of the city appointed took upon them in the night to keep the bridge of London, prohibiting the Kentishmen either to pass or approach. The rebels, which never soundly slept for fear of sudden chances, hearing the bridge to be kept and manned, ran with great haste to open their passage, where between both parties was a fierce and cruel encounter. Matthew Gough, more expert in martial feats than the other chieftains of the city, perceiving the Kentishmen better to stand to their tackling than his imagination expected, advised his company no further to proceed toward Southwark till the day appeared; to the intent that the citizens, hearing where the place of the jeopardy rested, might occur their enemies and relieve their friends and companions. But this counsel came to small effect, for the multitude of the rebels drove the citizens from the stouls at the bridge foot to the drawbridge, and began to set fire in divers houses. Alas! what sorrow it was to behold that miserable chance; for some, desiring to eschew the fire, leapt on his enemy's weapon, and so died: fearful women, with children in their arms, amazed and appalled, leapt into the river; other, doubting how to save themselves between fire, water, and sword, were in their houses suffocated and smouldered. Yet the captains, nothing regarding these chances, fought on the drawbridge all the night valiantly; but, in conclusion, the rebels got the drawbridge, and drowned many, and slew John Sutton, alderman, and Robert Heysand, a hardy citizen, with many other, beside Matthew Gough, a man of great wit, much experience in feats of chivalry, the which in continual wars had valiantly served the king and his father in the part beyond the sea (as before ye have heard). But it is often seen that he which many times had vanquished his enemies in strange countries, and returned again as a conqueror, hath of his own nation afterward been shamefully murdered and brought to confusion. This hard and sore conflict endured on the bridge till ix of the clock in the morning, in doubtful chance and fortune's balance. For some time the Londoners were beat back to the stoupls at Saint Magnes corner, and suddenly again the rebels were repulsed and driven back to the stoupls in Southwark; so that both parties, being faint, weary, and fatigued, agreed to desist from fight, and to leave battle till the next day, upon condition that neither Londoners should pass into Southwark nor the Kentishmen into London.

"After this abstinence of war agreed, the lusty Kentish captain, hoping on more friends, brake up the gaols of the King's Bench and Marshalsea, and set at liberty a swarm of galants, both meet for his service and apt for his enterprise. The Archbishop of Canterbury, being then Chancellor of England, and for his surety lying in the Tower of London, called to him the Bishop of Winchester, which also for fear lurked at Halywell. These two prelates, seeing the fury of the Kentish people, by reason of their beating back, to be mitigated and minished, passed the river of Thames from the Tower into Southwark, bringing with them, under the king's seal, a general pardon unto all the offenders; which they caused to be openly proclaimed and published. Lord! how glad the poor people were of this pardon (yea, more than of the great Jubilee of Rome), and how they accepted the same, in so much that the whole multitude, without bidding farewell to their captain, retired the same night, every man to his own home, as men amazed and stricken with fear. But John Cade, desperate of succours, which by the friends of the Duke of York were to him promised, and seeing his company thus without his knowledge suddenly depart, mistrusting the sequel of the matter, departed secretly, in habit disguised, into Sussex; but all his metamorphosis and transfiguration little prevailed, for after a proclamation made that whosoever could apprehend the said Jack Cade should have for his pain a M marks, many sought for him but few espied him, till one Alexander Iden, esquire of Kent, found him in a garden, and there, in his defence, manfully slew the caitiff Cade, and brought his dead body to London, whose head was set on London bridge."

We may add that the following curious entry is found in the Issue Roll, 29th Henry VI. :—

"To Alexander EDEN, Sheriff of Kent, and to divers other persons of the same county. In money paid to them, viz., by the hands of Gervase Clifton, 100*l.* and by John Seynder, 166*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, in part payment of 1000 marks, which the Lord the King commanded to be paid to the same Alexander and others, as well for taking JOHN CADE, an Irishman, calling himself John Mortymer, a great rebel, enemy, and traitor to the King, as also for conducting the person of John Cade to the Council of the King, after proclamation thereof made in London, to be had of his gift for their pains in the matter aforesaid.

"By writ of privy seal amongst the mandates of this term (Easter), 266*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*"

ACT V.

The persecution of the Duke of Gloster, the banishment and death of Suffolk, the insurrection of Cade, were events that had long distracted and agitated the people, and prepared the way for the open claim of the house of York to the crown. The return of the Duke of York from Ireland, his demand for the removal of Somerset, and the subsequent dismissal of his forces upon learning that Somerset was a prisoner, are detailed by the chroniclers. The indignation of York upon finding Somerset at liberty is also related by them. The poet leaps over the subsequent committal of York as prisoner to the Tower, and his release under the terror which was produced by the approach of his son Edward towards London with a great army. The duke, previous to his release, solemnly submitted under oath to the king. The poet has preserved the unity of action by destroying the intervals between one event and the other, and bringing causes and consequences into closer union. It is scarcely necessary for us to trace the real course of events, but we transcribe Hall's narrative of the first battle of St. Alban's :—

"The king, being credibly informed of the great army coming towards him, assembled an host, intending to meet with the duke in the north part, because he had too many friends about the city of London; and for that cause, with great speed and small luck, he, being accompanied with the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, the Earls of Stafford, Northumberland, and Wiltshire, with the Lord Clifford and divers other barons, departed out of Westminster, the xx day of May, toward the town of S. Albans: of whose doings the Duke of York being advertised by his espials, with all his power coasted the country, and came to the same town the third day next ensuing. The king, hearing of their approaching, sent to him messengers, straitly charging and commanding him, as an obedient subject, to keep the peace, and not, as an enemy to his natural country, to murder and slay his own countrymen and proper nation. While King Henry, more desirous of peace than of war, was sending forth his orators at the one end of the town, the Earl of Warwick, with the Marchmen, entered at the other gate of the town, and fiercely set on the king's foreward, and them shortly discomfited. Then came the Duke of Somerset and all the other lords with the king's power, which fought a sore and cruel battle, in the which many a tall man lost his life: but the Duke of York sent ever fresh men to succour the weary, and put new men in the places of the hurt persons, by which policy the king's army was profligate and dispersed, and all the chieftains of the field almost slain and brought to confusion. For there died, under the sign of the Castle, Edmund Duke of Somerset, who long before was warned to eschew all castles; and beside him lay Henry the second Earl of Northumberland, Humphrey Earl of Stafford, son to the Duke of Buckingham, John Lord Clifford, and viii M men and more. Humphrey Duke of Buckingham, being wounded, and James Butler Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond, seeing fortune's lowering chance, left the king post alone, and with a great number fled away. This was the end of the first battle at S. Albans, which was fought on the Thursday before the feast of Pentecost, being the xxiii day of May. In this xxxiii year of the king's reign, the bodies of the noble men were buried in the monastery, and the mean people in other places."

* Holinshed suggests this is an error for 800. The Paston Letters say "some six score" were slain.

THE FIRST PART OF THE CONTENTION

OF THE TWO FAMOUS HOUSES OF

YORK AND LANCASTER,

WITH THE

DEATH OF THE GOOD DUKE HUMPHREY.

(ACT I.)

(SCENE I.)

Enter at one door, KING HENRY THE SIXTH, and HUMPHREY, Duke of Gloster, the DUKE OF SOMERSET, the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, CARDINAL BEAUFORT, and others.

Enter at the other door, the DUKE OF YORK, and the MARQUESS OF SUFFOLK, and QUEEN MARGARET, and the EARLS OF SALISBURY and WARWICK.

Suf. As by your high imperial majesty's command,
I had in charge at my depart for France,
As procurator for your excellence,
To marry princess Margaret for your grace;
So in the ancient famous city Tours,
In presence of the kings of France and Sicil,
The dukes of Orleans, Calaber, Bretagne, and Alençon,
Seven earls, twelve barons, and twenty reverend bishops,
I did perform my task, and was espous'd:
And now, most humbly on my bended knees,
In sight of England and her royal peers,
Deliver up my title in the queen
Unto your gracious excellence, that are the substance
Of that great shadow I did represent:
The happiest gift that ever marquess gave,
The fairest queen that ever king possess'd.

King. Suffolk arise,
Welcome queen Margaret to English Henry's court:
The greatest show of kindness yet we can bestow
Is this kind kiss: O gracious God of heaven,
Lend me a heart replete with thankfulness,
For in this beauteous face thou hast bestow'd
A world of pleasures to my perplex'd soul.

Queen. Th' excessive love I bear unto your grace
Forbids me to be lavish of my tongue,
Lest I should speak more than beseems a woman:
Let this suffice, my bliss is in your liking;
And nothing can make poor Margaret miserable,
Unless the frown of mighty England's king.

King. Her looks did wound, but now her speech doth pierce.
Lovely queen Margaret, sit down by my side:
And uncle Gloster, and you lordly peers,
With one voice welcome my beloved queen.

All. Long live queen Margaret, England's happiness.

Queen. We thank you all.

[Sound trumpets.]

Suf. My lord protector, so it please your grace,
Here are the articles confirm'd, of peace
Between our sovereign and the French king Charles,
Till term of eighteen months be full expir'd.

Hum. Imprimis, It is agreed between the French king, Charles, and William de la Pole, marquess of Suffolk, ambassador for Henry king of England, that the said Henry shall wed and espouse the lady Margaret, daughter to Reignier king of Naples, Sicil, and Jerusalem, and crown her queen of England, ere the thirtieth day of the next month.

Item, It is further agreed between them, that the duchies of Anjou and of Maine shall be released and delivered over to the king her fa—

[Duke Humphrey lets it fall.]

King. How now uncle, what's the matter that you stay so suddenly?

Hum. Pardon my lord, a sudden qualm came o'er my heart,
Which dims mine eyes that I can read no more.
My lord of York, I pray do you read on.

York. Item, It is further agreed between them, that the duchies of Anjou and of Maine shall be released and delivered over to the king her father, and she sent over of the king of England's own proper cost and charges, without dowry.

King. They please us well, lord marquess kneel down:
We here create thee first duke of Suffolk,
And girt thee with the sword. Cousin of York,
We here discharge your grace from being regent
In the parts of France, till term of eighteen months
Be full expir'd. Thanks uncle Winchester,
Gloster, York, and Buckingham, Somerset,
Salisbury, and Warwick.
We thank you for all this great favour done,
In entertainment to my princely queen.
Come let us in, and with all speed provide
To see her coronation be perform'd.

[Exeunt KING, QUEEN, and SUFFOLK, and DUKE HUMPHREY stays all the rest.]

Hum. Brave peers of England, pillars of the state,
To you duke Humphrey must unfold his grief;
What, did my brother Henry toil himself,
And waste his subjects for to conquer France?
And did my brother Bedford spend his time,
To keep in awe that stout unruly realm?
And have not I and mine uncle Beaufort here
Done all we could to keep that land in peace?
And are all our labours then spent quite in vain?
For Suffolk he, the new-made duke that rules the roast,
Hath given away for our king Henry's queen,
The duchies of Anjou and Maine unto her father.
Ah lords, fatal is this marriage, cancelling our states,
Reversing monuments of conquer'd France,
Undoing all, as none had ne'er been done.

Card. Why, how now, cousin Gloster! what needs this;
As if our king were bound unto your will,
And might not do his will without your leave?
Proud protector, envy in thine eyes I see,
The big swoll'n venom of thy hateful heart,
That dares presume 'gainst that thy sovereign likes.

Hum. Nay, my lord, 'tis not my words that trouble you,
But my presence, proud prelate as thou art:
But I'll be gone, and give thee leave to speak.
Farewell my lords, and say, when I am gone,
I prophesied France would be lost ere long.

[Exit DUKE HUMPHREY.]

Card. There goes our protector in a rage.
My lords, you know he's my great enemy,
And though he be protector of the land,
And thereby covers his deceitful thoughts.
For you well see, if he but walk the streets,
The common people swarm about him straight,
Crying, Jesus bless your royal excellence,
With God preserve the good duke Humphrey,
And many things besides that are not known,
Which time will bring to light in smooth duke Humphrey.
But I will after him, and if I can,
I'll lay a plot to heave him from his seat.

[Exit CARDINAL.]

Buck. But let us watch this haughty cardinal.
Cousin of Somerset, be ruled by me,
We'll watch duke Humphrey and the cardinal too,
And put them from the mark they fain would hit.

Som. Thanks, cousin Buckingham, join thou with me,
And both of us with the duke of Suffolk,
We'll quickly heave duke Humphrey from his seat.

Buck. Content: come then, let us about it straight,
For either thou or I will be protector. [Exeunt BUCKINGHAM and SOMERSET.]

Sal. Pride went before, ambition follows after.
Whilst these do seek their own preferments thus,
My lords, let us seek for our country's good:
Oft have I seen this haughty cardinal

Swear, and forswear himself, and brave it out,
More like a ruffian than a man of the church.
Cousin York, the victories thou hast won,
In Ireland, Normandy, and in France,
Hath won thee immortal praise in England :
And thou, brave Warwick, my thrice valiant son,
Thy simple plainness and thy house-keeping
Hath won thee credit amongst the common sort :
The reverence of mine age, and Nevil's name,
Is of no little force if I command.
Then let us join all three in one for this,
That good duke Humphrey may his state possess.
But wherefore weeps Warwick, my noble son ?

War. For grief that all is lost that Warwick won.

Sons. Anjou and Maine, both given away at once, why, Warwick did win them ! and must that then which we won with our swords, be given away with words ?

York. As I have read, our kings of England were wont to have large dowries with their wives, but our king Henry gives away his own.

Sal. Come sons, away, and look unto the main.

War. Unto the Main ! O father, Maine is lost,
Which Warwick by main force did win from France :
Main chance, father, you meant, but I meant Maine,
Which I will win from France, or else be slain.

[Exeunt SALISBURY and WARWICK.]

York. Anjou and Maine both given unto the French !
Cold news for me, for I had hope of France,
Even as I have of fertile England.
A day will come when York shall claim his own,
And therefore I will take the Nevils' parts,
And make a show of love to proud duke Humphrey
And, when I spy advantage, claim the crown,
For that's the golden mark I seek to hit ;
Nor shall proud Lancaster usurp my right,
Nor hold the sceptre in his childish fist,
Nor wear the diadem upon his head,
Whose church-like humours fit not for a crown.
Then, York, be still awhile till time do serve :
Watch thou, and wake, when others be asleep,
To pry into the secrets of the state ;
Till Henry, surfeiting in joys of love,
With his new bride and England's dear-bought queen,
And Humphrey with the peers be fall'n at jars.
Then will I raise aloft the milk-white rose,
With whose sweet smell the air shall be perfum'd,
And in my standard bear the arms of York,
To grapple with the house of Lancaster :
And, force perforce, I'll make him yield the crown,
Whose bookish rule hath pull'd fair England down.

(SCENE II.)

Enter DUKE HUMPHREY, and DAME ELEANOR COBHAM, his wife.

Eleanor. Why droops my lord, like over-ripen'd corn,
Hanging the head at Ceres' plenteous load ?
What, seest thou, duke Humphrey, king Henry's crown ?
Reach at it, and if thine arm be too short,
Mine shall lengthen it. Art thou not a prince ?
Uncle to the king ? and his protector ?
Then what shouldst thou lack that might content thy mind ?

Hum. My lovely Nell, far be it from my heart
To think of treasons 'gainst my sovereign lord ;
But I was troubled with a dream to-night,
And God I pray it do betide none ill.

Eleanor. What dreamt my lord ? Good Humphrey tell it me,
And I'll interpret it : and when that's done,
I'll tell thee then what I did dream to-night.

Hum. This night, when I was laid in bed, I dreamt
That this my staff, mine office-badge in court,
Was broke in twain ; by whom I cannot guess ;
But, as I think, by the cardinal. What it bodes
God knows ; and on the ends were placed
The heads of Edmund duke of Somerset,
And William de la Pole first duke of Suffolk.

Eleanor. Tush my lord ! this signifies naught but this, —
That he that breaks a stick of Gloster's grove
Shall for the offence make forfeit of his head.
But now, my lord, I'll tell you what I dreamt :
Methought I was in the cathedral church
At Westminster, and seated in the chair
Where kings and queens are crown'd, and at my feet
Henry and Margaret with a crown of gold
Stood ready to set it on my princely head.

Hum. Fie, Nell. Ambitious woman as thou art,
Art thou not second woman in this land,
And the protector's wife ? belov'd of him ?
And wilt thou still be hammering treason thus ?
Away, I say, and let me hear no more.

Eleanor. How now, my lord ! what angry with your Nell

712

For telling but her dream ? The next I have I'll keep it to myself, and not be rated thus.

Hum. Nay, Nell, I'll give no credit to a dream,
But I would have thee to think on no such things.

Enter a Messengcr.

Mess. An it please your grace, the king and queen to-morrow morning will ride a hawking to Saint Alban's, and crave your company along with them.

Hum. With all my heart ; I will attend his grace.

Come, Nell, thou wilt go with us I am sure.

[Exit HUMPHREY.]

Eleanor. I'll come after you, for I cannot go before,
As long as Gloster bears this base and humble mind :
Were I a man, and protector as he is,
I'd reach to th' crown, or make some hop headles
And being but a woman, I'll not behind
For playing of my part, in spite of all that seek to cross me thus :
Who is within there ?

Enter SIR JOHN HUME.

What, sir John Hume, what news with you ?

Sir John. Jesus preserve your majesty.

Eleanor. My majesty ? why, man, I am but grace.

Sir John. Ay, but by the grace of God, and Hume's advice,
Your grace's state shall be advanc'd ere long.

Eleanor. What, hast thou conferred with Margery Jourdain the cunning witch of Eye, with Roger Bolingbroke, and the rest ? and will they undertake to do me good ?

Sir John. I have, madam ; and they have promised me to raise a spirit from depth of under ground, that shall tell your grace all questions you demand.

Eleanor. Thanks, good sir John.
Some two days hence I guess will fit our time,
Then see that they be here :
For now the king is riding to Saint Alban's,
And all the dukes and earls along with him.
When they be gone, then safely may they come,
And on the back side of my orchard here,
There cast their spells in silence of the night,
And so resolve us of the thing we wish ;
Till when, drink that for my sake, and so farewell.

[Exit ELEANOR.]

Sir John. Now, sir John Hume, no words but mum.
Seal up your lips, for you must silent be :
These gifts ere long will make me mighty rich.
The duchess she thinks now that all is well,
But I have gold comes from another place,
From one that hired me to set her on,
To plot these treasons 'gainst the king and peers ;
And that is the mighty duke of Suffolk.
For he it is, but I must not say so,
That by my means must work the duchess' fall,
Who now by conjurations thinks to rise.
But wist, sir John, no more of that I trow,
For fear you lose your head before you go.

(SCENE III.)

Enter two Petitioners, and PETER the Armourer's man.

1 Pet. Come, sirs, let's linger hereabout awhile,
Until my lord protector come this way,
That we may show his grace our several causes.

2 Pet. I pray God save the good duke Humphrey's life,
For but for him a many were undone,
They cannot get no succour in the court.
But see where he comes with the queen.

Enter the DUKE OF SUFFOLK with the QUEEN, and they take him for DUKE HUMPHREY, and give him their writings.

1 Pet. Oh, we are undone, this is the duke of Suffolk.
Queen. Now good fellows, whom would you speak withal ?
2 Pet. If it please your majesty, with my lord protector's grace.
Queen. Are your suits to his grace ? Let us see them first.
Look on them, my lord of Suffolk.

Suf. A complaint against the cardinal's man.
What hath he done ?

2 Pet. Marry, my lord, he hath stole away my wife, and they are gone together, and I know not where to find them.

Suf. Hath he stole thy wife ? that's some injury indeed. But what say you ?

Peter. Marry, sir, I come to tell you, that my master said that the duke of York was true heir to the crown, and that the king was an usurper.

Queen. An usurper thou wouldst say.

Peter. Ay, forsooth, an usurper.

Queen. Didst thou say the king was an usurper ?

Peter. No, forsooth, I said my master said so, th' other day when we wer scouring the duke of York's armour in our garret.

Suf. Ay, marry, this is something like,
Who's within there ?

Enter One or Two.

Sirrah, take in this fellow, and keep him close,
And send out a pursuivant for his master straight,
We'll hear more of this thing before the king.

[Exeunt, with the Armourer's man.]

Now, sir, what's yours? Let me see it,
What's here?

A complaint against the duke of Suffolk, for enclosing the commons of Long Melford.

How now, sir knave?

1 Pet. I beseech your grace to pardon me, I am but a messenger for the whole township. [He tears the papers.]

Suf. So now show your petitions to duke Humphrey.

Villains, get you gone, and come not near the court.

Dare these peasants write against me thus?

[Exeunt Petitioners.]

Queen. My lord of Suffolk, you may see by this

The commons' loves unto that haughty duke,

That seek to him more than to king Henry:

Whose eyes are always poring on his book,

And ne'er regards the honour of his name,

But still must be protected like a child,

And governed by that ambitious duke,

That scarce will move his cap to speak to us;

And his proud wife, high-minded Eleanor,

That ruffles it with such a troop of ladies,

As strangers in the court take her for queen:

She bears a duke's whole revenues on her back.

The other day she vaunted to her maids

That the very train of her worst gown

Was worth more wealth than all my father's lands.

Can any grief of mind be like to this?

I tell thee Pole, when thou didst run at tilt,

And stol'st away our ladies' hearts in France,

I thought king Henry had been like to thee,

Or else thou hadst not brought me out of France.

Suf. Madam, content yourself a little while:

As I was cause of your coming into England,

So will I in England work your full content:

And as for proud duke Humphrey and his wife,

I have set lime-twigs that will entangle them,

As that your grace ere long shall understand.

But stay, madam, here comes the king.

Enter KING HENRY, and the DUKE OF YORK and the DUKE OF SOMERSET on both sides of the KING, whispering with him: Then entereth DUKE HUMPHREY, DAME ELEANOR, the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, the EARL OF SALISBURY, the EARL OF WARWICK, and the CARDINAL OF WINCHESTER.

King. My lords, I care not who be regent in France,
Or York or Somerset, all's one to me.

York. My lord, if York have ill demean'd himself,

Let Somerset enjoy his place, and go to France.

Som. Then whom your grace thinks worthy, let him go,

And there be made the regent over the French.

War. Whomsoever you account worthy,

York is the worthiest.

Card. Peace, Warwick, give thy betters leave to speak.

War. The cardinal's not my better in the field.

Buck. All in this place are thy betters far.

War. And Warwick may live to be best of all.

Queen. My lord in mine opinion, it were best

That Somerset were regent over France.

Hum. Madam, our king is old enough himself,

To give his answer without your consent.

Queen. If he be old enough, what needs your grace

To be protector over him so long?

Hum. Madam, I am but protector o'er the land,

And when it please his grace, I will resign my charge.

Suf. Resign it then, for since thou wast a king

(As who is king but thee?) the common state

Doth as we see, all wholly go to wrack,

And millions of treasure hath been spent.

And as for the regentship of France,

I say Somerset is more worthy than York.

York. I'll tell thee, Suffolk, why I am not worthy,

Because I cannot flatter as thou canst.

War. And yet the worthy deeds that York hath done

Should make him worthy to be honour'd here.

Suf. Peace, headstrong Warwick.

War. Image of pride, wherefore should I peace?

Suf. Because here is a man accus'd of treason;

Pray God the duke of York do clear himself.

Ho, bring hither the armourer and his man.

Enter the Armourer and his man.

If it please your grace, this fellow here hath accused his master of high treason, and his words were these: That the duke of York was lawful heir unto the crown, and that your grace was an usurper.

York. I beseech your grace let him have what punishment the law will afford for his villainy.

King. Come hither, fellow; didst thou speak these words?

Arm. An't shall please your worship, I never said any such matter, God is my witness; I am falsely accused by this villain here.

Peter. 'Tis no matter for that, you did say so.

York. I beseech your grace let him have the law.

Arm. Alas, master, hang me if ever I spake the words. My accuser is my prentice, and when I did correct him for his fault the other day, he did vow upon his knees that he would be even with me: I have good witness of this, and therefore I beseech your worship do not cast away an honest man for a villain's accusation.

King. Uncle Gloster, what do you think of this?

Hum. The law, my lord, is this (because it rests suspicious),

That a day of combat be appointed,

And there to try each other's right or wrong,

With ebon staves and sandbags combating

In Smithfield, before your royal majesty.

[Exit HUMPHREY.]

Arm. And I accept the combat willingly.

Peter. Alas, my lord, I am not able for to fight.

Suf. You must either fight, sirrah, or else be hang'd:

Go take them hence again to prison.

[Exeunt with them.]

[The QUEEN lets fall her glove, and hits the DUCHESS OF GLOSTER a box on the ear.]

Queen. Give me my glove. Why, minion, can you not see? [She strikes her.]

I cry you mercy, madam, I did mistake;

I did not think it had been you.

Eleanor. Did you not, proud Frenchwoman?

Could I come near your dainty visage with my nails,

I'd set my ten commandments in your face.

King. Be patient, gentle aunt;

It was against her will.

Eleanor. Against her will! Good king, she'll dandle thee,

If thou wilt always thus be rul'd by her.

But let it rest: as sure as I do live,

She shall not strike dame Eleanor unreveng'd.

[Exit ELEANOR.]

King. Believe me, my love, thou wert much to blame:

I would not for a thousand pounds of gold,

My noble uncle had been here in place.

Enter DUKE HUMPHREY.

But see where he comes: I am glad he met her not.

Uncle Gloster, what answer makes your grace

Concerning our regent for the realm of France,

Whom thinks your grace is meetest for to send?

Hum. My gracious lord, then this is my resolve:

For that these words the armourer should speak

Doth breed suspicion on the part of York,

Let Somerset be regent o'er the French,

Till trial's made, and York may clear himself.

King. Then be it so: my lord of Somerset,

We make your grace regent over the French,

And to defend our right 'gainst foreign foes,

And so do good unto the realm of France.

Make haste, my lord, 'tis time that you were gone,

The time of truce is I think full expir'd.

Som. I humbly thank your royal majesty,

And take my leave to post with speed to France.

[Exit SOMERSET.]

King. Come, uncle Gloster, now let's have our horse,

For we will to Saint Alban's presently.

Madam, your hawk, they say, is swift of flight,

And we will try how she will fly to-day.

Exeunt omnes.

(SCENE IV.)

Enter ELEANOR, with SIR JOHN HUME, ROGER BOLINGBROKE, a Conjuror, and MARGERY JOURDAIN a Witch.

Eleanor. Here, sir John, take this scroll of paper here,

Wherein is writ the questions you shall ask,

And I will stand upon this tower here,

And hear the spirit what it says to you,

And to my questions write the answers down.

[She goes up to the tower.]

Sir John. Now, sirs, begin, and cast your spells about,

And charm the fiends for to obey your wills,

And tell dame Eleanor of the thing she asks.

Witch. Then, Roger Bolingbroke, about thy task,

And frame a circle here upon the earth,

Whilst I thereon all prostrate on my face

Do talk and whisper with the devils below,

And conjure them for to obey my will.

[She lies down upon her face. BOLINGBROKE makes a circle.]

Boling. Dark night, dread night, the silence of the night,

Wherein the furies mask in hellish troops,

Send up, I charge you, from Cocytus' lake

The spirit Ascalon to come to me,

To pierce the bowels of this centric earth,

And hither come in twinkling of an eye:

Ascaſton, ascend, ascend.

[It thunders and lightens, and then the Spirit riseth up.]

Spirit. Now, Bolingbroke, what wouldst thou have me do?

Boling. First, of the king, what shall become of him?

Spirit. The duke yet lives that Henry shall depose,
But him outlive, and die a violent death.

Boling. What fate awaits the duke of Suffolk?

Spirit. By water shall he die, and take his end.

Boling. What shall betide the duke of Somerset?

Spirit. Let him shun castles:

Safer shall he be upon the sandy plains,
Than where castles mounted stand:

Now question me no more, for I must hence again. [He sinks down again.]

Boling. Then down, I say, unto the damned pool

Where Pluto in his fiery waggon sits,

Riding amidst the sing'd and parched smokes,

The road of Ditis by the river Styx:

There howl and burn for ever in those flames.

Rise, Jourdain, rise, and stay thy charming spells.

Zounds, we are betray'd!

Enter the DUKE OF YORK, and the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, and others.

York. Come, sirs, lay hands on them, and bind them sure.

This time was well watch'd. What, madam, are you there?

This will be great credit for your husband,

That you are plotting treason thus with conjurers;

The king shall have notice of this thing. [Exit ELEANOR above.]

Buck. See here, my lord, what the devil hath writ.

York. Give it me, my lord, I'll show it to the king:

Go, sirs, see them fast lock'd in prison. [Exit with them.]

Buck. My lord, I pray you let me go post unto the king,

Unto Saint Alban's, to tell this news.

York. Content. Away then, about it straight.

Buck. Farewell my lord. [Exit BUCKINGHAM.]

York. Who's within there?

Enter One.

One. My lord.

York. Sirrah, go will the earls of Salisbury and Warwick

To sup with me to-night.

[Exit YORK.]

One. I will my lord. [Exit.]

(ACT II.)

(SCENE I.)

Enter the KING and QUEEN with her hawk on her fist, and DUKE HUMPHREY and SUFFOLK, and the CARDINAL, as if they came from hawking.

Queen. My lord, how did your grace like this last flight?

But as I cast her off the wind did rise,

And 'twas ten to one old Joan had not gone out.

King. How wonderful the Lord's works are on earth,

Even in these silly creatures of his hands!

Uncle Gloster, how high your hawk did soar,

And on a sudden sous'd the partridge down.

Suf. No marvel, if it please your majesty,

My lord protector's hawks do tower so well;

They know their master soars a falcon's pitch.

Hum. Faith, my lord, it's but a base mind,

That soars no higher than a bird can soar.

Card. I thought your grace would be above the clouds.

Hum. Ay, my lord cardinal, were it not good

Your grace could fly to heaven?

Card. Thy heaven is on earth, thy words and thoughts

Beat on a crown, proud protector, dangerous peer,

To smooth it thus with king and commonwealth.

Hum. How now, my lord, why this is more than needs!

Churchmen so hot? Good uncle, can you do 't?

Suf. Why not, having so good a quarrel,

And so bad a cause?

Hum. As how, my lord?

Suf. As you, my lord, an 't like your lordly lord's protectorship.

Hum. Why Suffolk, England knows thy insolence.

Queen. And thy ambition, Gloster.

King. Cease, gentle queen,

And whet not on these furious lords to wrath,

For blessed are the peace-makers on earth.

Card. Let me be blessed for the peace I make,

Against this proud protector with my sword.

Hum. Faith, holy uncle, I would it were come to that.

Card. Even when thou dar'st.

Hum. Dare? I tell thee priest,

Plantagenets could never brook the dare.

Card. I am Plantagenet as well as thou,

And son to John of Gaunt.

Hum. In bastardy.

Card. I scorn thy words.

Hum. Make up no factious numbers,

But even in thine own person meet me at the east end of the grove.

Card. Here's my hand, I will.

King. Why, how now, lords?

Card. Faith, cousin Gloster,

Had not your man cast off so soon, we had had

More sport to-day. Come with thy sword and buckler.

Hum. God's mother, priest, I'll shave your crown.

Card. Protector, protect thyself well.

King. The wind grows high, so doth your choler, lords.

Enter One crying "A miracle! a miracle!"

How now? Now, sirrah, what miracle is it?

One. An it please your grace, there is a man that came blind to Saint Alban's, and hath received his sight at the shrine.

King. Go fetch him hither, that we may glorify the Lord with him.

Enter the Mayor of Saint Alban's, and his brethren, with music, bearing the man that had been blind between Two in a chair.

King. Thou happy man, give God eternal praise,

For he it is that thus hath helped thee:

Where wast thou born?

Poor Man. At Berwick, please your majesty, in the north.

Hum. At Berwick, and come thus far for help?

P. Man. Ay, sir, it was told me in my sleep,

That sweet Saint Alban should give me my sight again.

Hum. What, art lame too?

P. Man. Ay, indeed, sir, God help me.

Hum. How cam'st thou lame?

P. Man. With falling off a plum-tree.

Hum. Wert thou blind and would climb plum-trees?

P. Man. Never but once, sir, in all my life.

My wife did long for plums.

Hum. But tell me, wert thou born blind?

P. Man. Ay, truly, sir.

Woman. Ay, indeed, sir, he was born blind.

Hum. What, art thou his mother?

Woman. His wife, sir.

Hum. Hadst thou been his mother,

Thou couldst have better told.

Why, let me see, I think thou canst not see yet.

P. Man. Yes, truly, master, as clear as day.

Hum. Say'st thou so? what colour's his cloak?

P. Man. Red, master, as red as blood.

Hum. And his cloak?

P. Man. Why, that's green.

Hum. And what colour's his hose?

P. Man. Yellow, master, yellow as gold.

Hum. And what colour's my gown?

P. Man. Black, sir, as black as jet.

King. Then belike he knows what colour jet is on.

Suf. And yet I think jet did he never see.

Hum. But cloaks and gowns ere this day many a one.

But tell me, sirrah, what's my name?

P. Man. Alas, master, I know not.

Hum. What's his name?

P. Man. I know not.

Hum. Nor his?

P. Man. No, truly, sir.

Hum. Nor his name?

P. Man. No, indeed, master.

Hum. What's thine own name?

P. Man. Sander, an it please you, master.

Hum. Then, Sander, sit there, the lyingest knave in Christendom. If thou hadst been born blind, thou might'st as well have known all our names as thus to name the several colours we do wear. Sight may distinguish of colours, but suddenly to nominate them all it is impossible. My lords, Saint Alban here hath done a miracle, and would you not think his cunning to be great, that could restore this cripple to his legs again?

P. Man. O, master, I would you could.

Hum. My masters of Saint Alban's, have you not beadles in your town, and things called whips?

Mayor. Yes, my lord, if it please your grace.

Hum. Then send for one presently.

Mayor. Sirrah, go fetch the beadle hither strait. [Exit One.]

Hum. Now fetch me a stool hither by and by. Now, sirrah, if you mean to save yourself from whipping, leap me over this stool, and run away.

Enter a Beadle.

P. Man. Alas, master, I am not able to stand alone; you go about to torture me in vain.

Hum. Well, sir, we must have you find your legs. Sirrah beadle, whip him till he leap over that same stool.

Beadle. I will, my lord: come on, sirrah, off with your doublet quickly.

P. Man. Alas, master, what shall I do? I am not able to stand.

[After the Beadle hath hit him one jerk, he leaps over the stool, and runs away, and they run after him, crying "A miracle! a miracle!"

Hum. A miracle, a miracle! Let him be taken again, and whipped through every market-town till he comes at Berwick where he was born.

Mayor. It shall be done, my lord. [Exit Mayor.]

Suf. My lord protector hath done wonders to-day,
He hath made the blind to see, and halt to go.

Hum. Ay, but you did greater wonders, when you made whole dukedoms fly in a day.

Witness France.

King. Have done, I say, and let me hear no more of that.

Enter the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

What news brings duke Humphrey of Buckingham?

Buck. Ill news for some, my lord, and this it is,—
That proud dame Eleanor our protector's wife,
Hath plotted treasons 'gainst the king and peers,
By witchcrafts, sorceries, and conjurings,
Who by such means did raise a spirit up,
To tell her what hap should betide the state;
But ere they had finished their devilish drift,
By York and myself they were all surpris'd;
And here's the answer the devil did make to them.

King. First, of the king, what shall become of him?

[Reads.] The duke yet lives, that Henry shall depose,
Yet him outlive, and die a violent death.
God's will be done in all.

What fate awaits the duke of Suffolk?

By water shall he die, and take his end.

Suf. By water must the duke of Suffolk die?
It must be so, or else the devil doth lie.

King. Let Somerset shun castles,
For safer shall he be upon the sandy plains,
Than where castles mounted stand.

Card. Here's good stuff, how now my lord protector?
This news I think hath turn'd your weapon's point;
I am in doubt you'll scarcely keep your promise.

Hum. Forbear, ambitious prelate, to urge my grief,
And pardon me my gracious sovereign,
For here I swear unto your majesty,
That I am guiltless of these heinous crimes
Which my ambitious wife hath falsely done;
And for she would betray her sovereign lord,
I here renounce her from my bed and board,
And leave her open for the law to judge,
Unless she clear herself of this foul deed.

King. Come, my lords, this night we'll lodge in Saint Alban's,
And to-morrow we will ride to London,
And try the utmost of these treasons forth.
Come, uncle Gloster, along with us,
My mind doth tell me thou art innocent.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE II.)

Enter the DUKE OF YORK, and the EARLS OF SALISBURY and WARWICK.

York. My lords, our simple supper ended thus,
Let me reveal unto your honours here
The right and title of the house of York
To England's crown by lineal descent.

War. Then, York, begin; and if thy claim be good,
The Nevils are thy subjects to command.

York. Then thus, my lords:
Edward the Third had seven sons;
The first was Edward the Black Prince, prince of Wales.
The second was William of Hatfield, who died young.
The third was Lionel, duke of Clarence.
The fourth was John of Gaunt, the duke of Lancaster.
The fifth was Edmund of Langley, duke of York.
The sixth was William of Windsor, who died young.
The seventh and last was sir Thomas of Woodstock,
Duke of Gloster.

Now Edward the Black Prince died before his father, leaving behind him two sons, Edward born at Angoulême, who died young, and Richard, that was after crowned king by the name of Richard the Second, who died without an heir. Lionel duke of Clarence died, and left him one only daughter, named Philippe, who was married to Edmund Mortimer, earl of March and Ulster; and so by her I claim the crown, as the true heir to Lionel duke of Clarence, third son to Edward the Third. Now, sir, in time of Richard's reign, Henry of Bolingbroke, son and heir to John of Gaunt, the duke of Lancaster, fourth son to Edward the Third, he claimed the crown, deposed the mirthful king, and as both you know, in Pomfret castle harmless Richard was shamefully murdered, and so by Richard's death came the house of Lancaster unto the crown.

Sal. Saving your tale, my lord, as I have heard, in the reign of Bolingbroke the duke of York did claim the crown, and but for Owen Glendower had been king.

York. True: but so it fortun'd then, by means of that monstrous rebel Glendower, the noble duke of York was put to death, and so ever since the heirs of John of Gaunt have possessed the crown. But if the issue of the elder should succeed before the issue of the younger, then am I lawful heir unto the kingdom.

War. What proceedings can be more plain? He claims it from Lionel duke of Clarence, the third son to Edward the Third, and Henry from John of Gaunt the fourth son. So that till Lionel's issue fails, his should not reign.

It fails not yet, but flourisheth in thee,
And in thy sons, brave slips of such a stock.
Then, noble father, kneel we both together,
And in this private place, be we the first
To honour him with birthright to the crown.

Both. Long live Richard, England's royal king!

York. I thank you both. But, lords, I am not your king, until this sword be sheathed even in the heart blood of the house of Lancaster.

War. Then, York, advise thyself, and take thy time:

Claim thou the crown, and set thy standard up,
And in the same advance the milk-white rose,
And then to guard it, will I rouse the bear,
Environ'd with ten thousand ragged staves,
To aid and help thee for to win thy right,
Maugre the proudest lord of Henry's blood
That dares deny the right and claim of York.
For why, my mind presageth I shall live
To see the noble duke of York to be a king.

York. Thanks, noble Warwick; and York doth hope to see the earl of Warwick live to be the greatest man in England but the king. Come, let's go.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE III.)

Enter KING HENRY and the QUEEN, DUKE HUMPHREY, the DUKE OF SUFFOLK, and the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, the CARDINAL, and DAME ELEANOR COBHAM led with the officers, and then enter to them the DUKE OF YORK, and the EARLS OF SALISBURY and WARWICK.

King. Stand forth, dame Eleanor Cobham, duchess of Gloster, and hear the sentence pronounced against thee for these treasons that thou hast committed against us, our state, and peers. First, for thy heinous crime, thou shalt two days in London do penance barefoot in the streets, with a white sheet about thy body, and a wax taper burning in thy hand. That done, thou shalt be banished for ever into the Isle of Man, there to end thy wretched days; and this is our sentence irrevocable. Away with her.

Eleanor. Even to my death, for I have lived too long.

[Exeunt some with ELEANOR.]

King. Grieve not, noble uncle, but be thou glad,
In that these treasons thus are come to light,
Lest God had pour'd his vengeance on thy head
For her offences that thou held'st so dear.

Hum. Oh, gracious Henry, give me leave awhile
To leave your grace, and to depart away;
For sorrow's tears hath gripp'd my aged heart,
And makes the fountains of mine eyes to swell,
And therefore, good my lord, let me depart.

King. With all my heart, good uncle, when you please.
Yet ere thou goest, Humphrey, resign thy staff,
For Henry will be no more protected;
The Lord shall be my guide both for my land and me.

Hum. My staff? Ay, noble Henry, my life and all.
My staff I yield as willing to be thine,
As ere thy noble father made it mine:
And even as willing at thy feet I leave it,
As others would ambitiously receive it:
And long hereafter, when I am dead and gone,
May honourable peace attend thy throne.

King. Uncle Gloster, stand up, and go in peace.
No less belov'd of us, than when
Thou wert protector over this my land.

[Exit GLOSTER.]

Queen. Take up the staff, for here it ought to stand.
Where should it be but in king Henry's hand?

York. Please it your majesty, this is the day
That was appointed for the combating
Between the armourer and his man, my lord,
And they are ready when your grace doth please.

King. Then call them forth that they may try their rights.

Enter at one door the Armourer and his Neighbours, drinking to him so much that he is drunken, and he enters with a drum before him, and his staff with a sandbag fastened to it, and at the other door his Man with a drum and sandbag, and Prentices drinking to him.

1 Neigh. Here, neighbour Horner, I drink to you in a cup of sack; and fear not, neighbour, you shall do well enough.

2 Neigh. And here, neighbour, here's a cup of charneco.

3 Neigh. Here's a pot of good double beer, neighbour: drink and be merry, and fear not your man.

Arm. Let it come, i' faith I'll pledge you all,
And a fig for Peter.

1 Pren. Here, Peter, I drink to thee, and be not afraid.

2 Pren. Here, Peter, here's a pint of claret wine for thee.

3 Pren. And here's a quart for me, and be merry, Peter,
And fear not thy master; fight for credit of the prentices.

Peter. I thank you all, but I'll drink no more: here, Robin, and if I die, here I give thee my hammer; and Will, thou shalt have my apron: and here, Tom, take all the money that I have. O Lord bless me, I pray God, for I am never able to deal with my master, he hath learned so much fence already.

Sal. Come leave your drinking, and fall to blows. Sirrah, what's thy name?

Peter. Peter, forsooth.

Sal. Peter: what more?

Peter. Thump.

Sal. Thump, then see that thou thump thy master.

Arm. Here's to thee, neighbour; fill all the pots again, for before we fight, look you, I will tell you my mind; for I am come hither as it were of my man's instigation, to prove myself an honest man and Peter a knave: and so have at you Peter with downright blows, as Bevis of Southampton fell upon Ascapart.

Peter. La you, now; I told you he's in his fence already.

[Alarums. PETER hits him on the head and fells him.

Arm. Hold, Peter! I confess, treason, treason.

[He dies.

Peter. O God, I give thee praise.

[He kneels down.

Pren. Ho, well done, Peter! God save the king!

King. Go, take hence that traitor from our sight,
For by his death we do perceive his guilt,
And God, in justice, hath reveal'd to us
The truth and innocence of this poor fellow,
Which he had thought to have murder'd wrongfully.
Come, fellow, follow us for thy reward.

[Exeunt omnes.

(SCENE IV.)

Enter DUKE HUMPHREY and his men, in mourning cloaks.

Hum. Sirrah, what's o'clock?

Serv. Almost ten, my lord.

Hum. Then is that woeful hour hard at hand,
That my poor lady should come by this way,
In shameful penance wandering in the streets.
Sweet Nell, ill can thy noble mind abrook
The abject people gazing on thy face,
With envious looks laughing at thy shame,
That erst did follow thy proud chariot wheels
When thou didst ride in triumph through the streets.

Enter DAME ELEANOR COBHAM barefoot, and a white sheet about her, with a wax candle in her hand, and verses written on her back and pinned on, and accompanied with the Sheriffs of London, and SIR JOHN STANLEY, and Officers, with bills and halberds.

Serv. My gracious lord, see where my lady comes.
Please it your grace, we'll take her from the sheriffs.

Hum. I charge you for your lives stir not a foot,
Nor offer once to draw a weapon here,
But let them do their office as they should.

Eleanor. Come you, my lord, to see my open shame?
Ah, Gloster, now thou dost penance too,
See how the giddy people look at thee,
Shaking their heads and pointing at thee here.
Go, get thee gone, and hide thee from their sights,
And in thy pent-up study rue my shame,
And ban thine enemies,—ah! mine and thine.

Hum. Ah, Nell, sweet Nell, forget this extreme grief,
And bear it patiently to ease thy heart.

Eleanor. Ah, Gloster, teach me to forget myself;
For whilst I think I am thy wedded wife,
The thought of this doth kill my woeful heart.
The ruthless flints do cut my tender feet,
And when I start, the cruel people laugh,
And bid me be advised how I tread;
And thus, with burning taper in my hand,
Mail'd up in shame, with papers on my back,
Ah, Gloster, can I endure this and live?
Sometime I'll say I am duke Humphrey's wife,
And he a prince, protector of the land,
But so he rul'd and such a prince he was,
As he stood by, whilst I his forlorn duchess
Was led with shame, and made a laughing-stock
To every idle rascal follower.

Hum. My lovely Nell, what wouldst thou have me do?
Should I attempt to rescue thee from hence,
I should incur the danger of the law,
And thy disgrace would not be shadow'd so.

Eleanor. Be thou mild, and stir not at my disgrace,
Until the axe of death hang o'er thy head,
As shortly sure it will. For Suffolk, he,
The new-made duke, that may do all in all
With her that loves him so, and hates us all,
And impious York, and Beaufort that false priest,
Have all lim'd bushes to betray thy wings,
And fly thou how thou canst, they will entangle thee.

Enter a Herald of arms.

Herald. I summon your grace unto his highness' parliament, holden at Saint Edmond's-bury, the first of the next month.

Hum. A parliament, and our consent ne'er craved

Therein before? This is—

Well, we will be there.

[Exit Herald.

Master sheriff, I pray proceed no further against my lady than the course of law extends.

Sheriff. Please it your grace, my office here doth end,
And I must deliver her to sir John Stanley,
To be conducted into the Isle of Man.

Hum. Must you, sir John, conduct my lady?

Stan. Ay, my gracious lord, for so it is decreed,
And I am so commanded by the king.

Hum. I pray you, sir John, use her ne'er the worse,
In that I entreat you to use her well.

The world may smile again, and I may live

To do you favour, if you do it her.

And so, sir John, farewell.

Eleanor. What, gone, my lord, and bid not me farewell?

Hum. Witness my bleeding heart, I cannot stay to speak.

[Exeunt HUMPHREY and his men.

Eleanor. Then is he gone, is noble Gloster gone,
And doth duke Humphrey now forsake me too?
Then let me haste from out fair England's bounds:
Come, Stanley, come, and let us haste away.

Stan. Madam, let's go unto some house hereby,
Where you may shift yourself before we go.

Eleanor. Ah, good sir John, my shame cannot be hid,
Nor put away with casting off my sheet:

But, come, let us go; master sheriff, farewell,
Thou hast but done thy office as thou shouldst.

[Exeunt omnes.

(ACT III.)

(SCENE I.)

Enter to the Parliament.

Enter two Heralds before, then the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, the DUKE OF SUFFOLK, and then the DUKE OF YORK and the CARDINAL OF WINCHESTER, and then the KING and the QUEEN, and then the EARL OF SALISBURY and the EARL OF WARWICK.

King. I wonder our uncle Gloster stays so long.

Queen. Can you not see? or will you not perceive
How that ambitious duke doth use himself?

The time hath been, but now the time is past,
That none so humble as duke Humphrey was:

But now let one meet him even in the morn,
When every one will give the time of day,
Yet he will neither move nor speak to us.

See you not how the commons follow him
In troops, crying, God save the good duke Humphrey!
Honouring him as if he were their king?

Gloster is no little man in England,

And if he list to stir commotions

'Tis likely that the people will follow him.

My lord, if you imagine there is no such thing,
Then let it pass, and call't a woman's fear.

My lord of Suffolk, Buckingham, and York,

Disprove my allegations if you can,

And by your speeches if you can reprove me,

I will subscribe, and say I wrong'd the duke.

Suf. Well hath your grace foreseen into that duke;

And if I had been licens'd first to speak,

I think I should have told your grace's tale.

Smooth runs the brook whereas the stream is deepest.

No, no, my sovereign, Gloster is a man

Unsounded yet, and full of deep deceit.

Enter the DUKE OF SOMERSET.

King. Welcome lord Somerset, what news from France?

Som. Cold news, my lord, and this it is,—

That all your holds and towns within those territories

Is overcome, my lord; all is lost.

King. Cold news indeed, lord Somerset;

But God's will be done.

York. Cold news for me, for I had hope of France,

Even as I have of fertile England.

Enter DUKE HUMPHREY.

Hum. Pardon, my liege, that I have stay'd so long.

Suf. Nay, Gloster, know that thou art come too soon,

Unless thou prove more loyal than thou art;

We do arrest thee on high treason here.

Hum. Why, Suffolk's duke, thou shalt not see me blush,

Nor change my countenance for thine arrest.
Whereof I am guilty who are my accusers?

York. 'Tis thought, my lord, your grace took bribes from France,
And stopp'd the soldiers of their pay,
Through which his majesty hath lost all France.

Hum. Is it but thought so? And who are they that think so?

So God me help, as I have watch'd the night,
Ever intending good for England still:
That penny that ever I took from France,
Be brought against me at the judgment day.

I never robb'd the soldiers of their pay;
Many a pound of mine own proper cost
Have I sent over for the soldiers' wants,
Because I would not rack the needy commons.

Card. In your protectorship you did devise Strange torments for offenders, by which means
England hath been defam'd by tyranny.

Hum. Why, 'tis well known that whilst I was protector
Pity was all the fault that was in me:
A murderer or foul felonious thief,
That robs and murders silly passengers,
I tortur'd above the rate of common law.

Suf. Tush, my lord, these be things of no account;
But greater matters are laid unto your charge.
I do arrest thee on high treason here,
And commit thee to my good lord cardinal,
Until such time as thou canst clear thyself.

King. Good uncle, obey to his arrest:
I have no doubt but thou shalt clear thyself;
My conscience tells me thou art innocent.

Hum. Ah, gracious Henry, these days are dangerous!

And would my death might end these miseries,
And stay their moods for good king Henry's sake.
But I am made the prologue to their play,
And thousands more must follow after me,
That dread not yet their lives' destruction.

Suffolk's hateful tongue blabs his heart's malice;
Beaufort's fiery eyes show his envious mind;
Buckingham's proud looks bewray his cruel thoughts
And dogged York, that levels at the moon,
Whose overweening arm I have held back,
All you have joined to betray me thus:

And you, my gracious lady and sovereign mistress,
Causeless have laid complaints upon my head.

I shall not want false witnesses enough,
That so amongst you you may have my life.
The proverb no doubt will be perform'd,
A staff is quickly found to beat a dog.

Suf. Doth he not twit our sovereign lady here,
As if that she, with ignominious wrong,
Had suborn'd or hir'd some to swear against his life?

Queen. But I can give the loser leave to speak.

Hum. Far truer spoke than meant: I lose indeed:
Beshrew the winners' hearts, they play me false.

Buck. He'll wrest the sense, and keep us here all day:
My lord of Winchester, see him sent away.

Card. Who's within there? take in duke Humphrey,
And see him guarded sure within my house.

Hum. Oh, thus king Henry casts away his crutch,
Before his legs can bear his body up;
And puts his watchful shepherd from his side,
Whilst wolves stand snarring who shall bite him first.
Farewell, my sovereign! long may'st thou enjoy
Thy father's happy days, free from annoy!

[Exit HUMPHREY, with the Cardinal's men.]

King. My lords, what to your wisdoms shall seem best
Do and undo as if ourself were here.

Queen. What, will your highness leave the parliament?

King. Ay, Margaret. My heart is kill'd with grief,
Where I may sit and sigh in endless moan,
For who's a traitor, Gloster he is none.

[Exit KING, SALISBURY, and WARWICK.]

Queen. Then sit we down again, my lord cardinal,
Suffolk, Buckingham, York, and Somerset;
Let us consult of proud duke Humphrey's fall.
In mine opinion it were good he died,
For safety of our king and commonwealth.

Suf. And so think I, madam; for, as you know,
If our king Henry had shook hands with death,
Duke Humphrey then would look to be our king:
And it may be by policy he works,
To bring to pass the thing which now we doubt.
The fox barks not when he would steal the lamb;
But if we take him ere he do the deed,
We should not question if that he should live.

York. No, let him die, in that he is a fox,
Lest that in living he offend us more.

Card. Then let him die before the commons know,
For fear that they do rise in arms for him.

York. Then do it suddenly, my lords.

Suf. Let that be my lord cardinal's charge and mine.

Card. Agreed, for he's already kept within my house.

Enter a Messenger.

Queen. How now, sirrah, what news?

Mess. Madam, I bring you news from Ireland.
The wild O'Neil, my lords, is up in arms,
With troops of Irish Kernes, that uncontroll'd
Do plant themselves within the English pale,
And burn and spoil the country as they go.

Queen. What redress shall we have for this, my lords?

York. 'Twere good that my lord of Somerset,
That fortunate champion, were sent over
To keep in awe the stubborn Irishmen;
He did so much good when he was in France.

Som. Had York been there with all his far-fetch'd policies,
He might have lost as much as I.

York. Ay, for York would have lost his life, before
That France should have revolted from England's rule.

Som. Ay, so thou might'st, and yet have govern'd worse than I.

York. What worse than naught? then a shame take all.

Som. Shame on thyself, that wisheth shame.

Queen. Somerset forbear; good York be patient,
And do thou take in hand to cross the seas,
With troops of armed men, to quell the pride
Of those ambitious Irish that rebel.

York. Well, madam, sith your grace is so content,
Let me have some bands of chosen soldiers,
And York shall try his fortunes 'gainst those Kernes.

Queen. York, thou shalt. My lord of Buckingham,
Let it be your charge to muster up such soldiers
As shall suffice him in these needful wars.

Buck. Madam, I will, and levy such a band
As soon shall overcome those Irish rebels.

But, York, where shall those soldiers stay for thee?

York. At Bristol, I'll expect them ten days hence.

Buck. Then thither shall they come, and so farewell. [Exit BUCKINGHAM.]

York. Adieu, my lord of Buckingham.

Queen. Suffolk, remember what you have to do.
And you, lord cardinal, concerning duke Humphrey,
'Twere good that you did see to it in time.

Come, let us go, that it may be perform'd. [Exeunt omnes, manet YORK.]

York. Now, York, bethink thyself, and rouse thee up,

Take time whilst it is offer'd thee so fair,
Lest when thou wouldst, thou canst it not attain!
'Twas men I lack'd, and now they give them me,
And now, whilst I am busy in Ireland,
I have seduc'd a headstrong Kentishman,
John Cade of Ashford,

Under the title of John Mortimer,
(For he is like him every kind of way)

To raise commotion, and by that means

I shall perceive how the common people
Do affect the claim and house of York.

Then, if he have success in his affairs,
From Ireland then comes York again,
To reap the harvest which that coystriall sow'd:

Now, if he should be taken and condemn'd,
He'll ne'er confess that I did set him on,
And therefore ere I go I'll send him word

To put in practice and to gather head,
That so soon as I am gone he may begin
To rise in arms with troops of country swains,
To help him to perform this enterprise.

And then, duke Humphrey, he well made away,
None then can stop the light to England's crown,
But York can tame, and headlong pull them down.

[Exit YORK.]

(SCENE II.)

Then the curtains being drawn, DUKE HUMPHREY is discovered in his bed, and two Men lying on his breast and smothering him in his bed. And then enter the DUKE OF SUFFOLK to them.

Suf. How now, sirs! what, have you despatch'd him?

1. Ay, my lord, he's dead I warrant you.

Suf. Then see the clothes laid smooth about him still,
That when the king comes, he may perceive
No other but that he died of his own accord.

2. All things is handsome now, my lord.

Suf. Then draw the curtains again and get you gone,
And you shall have your firm reward anon.

[Exeunt.]

Enter the KING and QUEEN, the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, and the DUKE OF SOMERSET, and the CARDINAL.

King. My lord of Suffolk, go call our uncle Gloster.
Tell him this day we will that he do clear himself.

Suf. I will, my lord.

[Exit SUFFOLK.]

King. And, good my lords, proceed no further 'gainst our uncle
Than by just proof you can affirm:

For as the sucking child or harmless lamb,
So is he innocent of treason to our state.

Enter SUFFOLK.

How now, Suffolk? where's our uncle?

Suf. Dead in his bed, my lord of Gloster's dead. [The KING falls in a swoon.]

Queen. Ah me, the king is dead: help, help, my lords!

Suf. Comfort, my lord; gracious Henry, comfort.

King. What, doth my lord of Suffolk bid me comfort?

Came he even now to sing a raven's note,
And thinks he that the chirping of a wren,
By crying comfort through a hollow voice,
Can satisfy my griefs, or ease my heart?
Thou baleful messenger, out of my sight,
For even in thine eyeballs murder sits:
Yet do not go. Come, basilisk, and kill
The gazer with thy looks.

Queen. Why do you rate my lord of Suffolk thus,
As if that he had caus'd duke Humphrey's death?
The duke and I too, you know, were enemies,
And ye had best say that I did murder him.

King. Ah, woe is me for wretched Gloster's death.

Queen. Be woe for me, more wretched than he was:
What, dost thou turn away and hide thy face?
I am no loathsome leper, look on me.
Was I for this nigh wrack'd upon the sea,
And thrice by awkward winds driven back from England's bounds?
What might it bode, but that well foretelling
Winds said, seek not a scorpion's nest.

Enter the EARLS OF WARWICK and SALISBURY.

War. My lord, the commons, like an hungry hive of bees,
Run up and down, caring not whom they sting,
For good duke Humphrey's death, whom they report
To be murdered by Suffolk and the cardinal here.

King. That he is dead, good Warwick, is too true,
But how he died God knows, not Henry.

War. Enter his privy chamber, my lord, and view the body. Good father, stay you with the rude multitude till I return.

Sal. I will, son.

[Exit SALISBURY.]

WARWICK draws the curtains, and shows DUKE HUMPHREY in his bed.

King. Ah, uncle Gloster, heaven receive thy soul!
Farewell poor Henry's joy, now thou art gone.

War. Now by his soul that took our shape upon him,
To free us from his Father's dreadful curse,
I am resolv'd that violent hands were laid
Upon the life of this thrice famous duke.

Suf. A dreadful oath, sworn with a solemn tongue!
What instance gives lord Warwick for these words?

War. Oft have I seen a timely-parted ghost,
Of ashy semblance, pale and bloodless;
But, lo! the blood is settled in his face,
More better coloured than when he liv'd.
His well-proportion'd beard made rough and stern,
His fingers spread abroad as one that grasp'd for life,
Yet was by strength surpris'd; the least of these are probable:
It cannot choose but he was murdered.

Queen. Suffolk and the cardinal had him in charge,
And they I trust, sir, are no murderers.

War. Ay, but 'tis well known they were not his friends,
And 'tis well seen he found some enemies.

Card. But have ye no greater proofs than these?

War. Who sees a heifer dead and bleeding fresh,
And sees hard by a butcher with an axe,
But will suspect 'twas he that made the slaughter?
Who finds the partridge in the puttock's nest,
But will imagine how the bird came there,
Although the kite soar with unbloody beak?
Even so suspicious is this tragedy.

Queen. Are you the kite, Beaufort; where's his talons?
Is Suffolk the butcher; where's his knife?

Suf. I wear no knife to slaughter sleeping men,
Yet here's a vengeful sword, rusted with ease,
That shall be scour'd in his rancorous heart
That slanders me with murder's crimson badge.
Say, if thou dare, proud lord of Warwickshire,
That I am guilty in duke Humphrey's death.

War. What dares not Warwick, if false Suffolk dare him?

Queen. He dares not calm his contumelious spirit,
Nor cease to be an arrogant controller,
Though Suffolk dare him twenty hundred times.

War. Madam, be still; with reverence may I say it,
That every word you speak in his defence
Is slander to your royal majesty.

Suf. Blunt-witted lord, ignoble in thy words,
If ever lady wrong'd her lord so much,
Thy mother took unto her blameful bed
Some stern untutor'd churl, and noble stock
Was graft with crab-tree slip, whose fruit thou art,
And never of the Nevil's noble race.

718

War. But that the guilt of murder bucklers thee,
And I should rob the deathsmen of his fee,
Quitting thee thereby of ten thousand shames;
And that my sovereign's presence makes me mute,
I would, false murderous coward, on thy knees
Make thee crave pardon for thy passed speech,
And say, it was thy mother that thou meant'st,
That thou thyself was born in bastardy:
And, after all this fearful homage done,
Give thee thy hire, and send thee down to hell,
Pernicious bloodsucker of sleeping men.

Suf. Thou shouldst be waking whilst I shed thy blood,
If from this presence thou dare go with me.

War. Away, even now, or I will drag thee hence. [WARWICK pulls him out.]

Exit WARWICK and SUFFOLK, and then all the Commons within cry, "Down with Suffolk, down with Suffolk." And then enter again the DUKES OF SUFFOLK and WARWICK, with their weapons drawn.

King. Why, how now, lords?

Suf. The traitorous Warwick, with the men of Bury,
Set all upon me, mighty sovereign.

The Commons again cry, "Down with Suffolk, down with Suffolk." And then enter from them the EARL OF SALISBURY.

Sal. My lord, the commons send you word by me,
That unless false Suffolk here be done to death,
Or banished fair England's territories,
That they will err from your highness' person:
They say, by him the good duke Humphrey died;
They say, by him they fear the ruin of the realm;
And therefore if you love your subjects' weal,
They wish you to banish him from forth the land.

Suf. Indeed, 'tis like the commons, rude unpolish'd hinds,
Would send such message to their sovereign:
But you, my lord, were glad to be employ'd,
To try how quaint an orator you were;
But all the honour Salisbury hath got,
Is—that he was the lord ambassador,
Sent from a sort of tinkers to the king.

Commons. [Within.] An answer from the king, my lord of Salisbury.

King. Good Salisbury, go back again to them;
Tell them we thank them all for their kind care,
And had I not been cited thus by their means,
Myself had done it. Therefore here I swear
If Suffolk be found to breathe in any place
Where I have rule, but three days more, he dies.

[Exit SALISBURY.]

Queen. Oh, Henry, reverse the doom of gentle Suffolk's banishment.

King. Ungentle queen, to call him gentle Suffolk,
Speak not for him, for in England he shall not rest.
If I say, I may relent;
But if I swear, it is irrevocable.
Come, good Warwick, and go thou in with me,
For I have great matters to impart to thee.

[Exeunt KING and WARWICK, manent QUEEN and SUFFOLK.]

Queen. Hell fire and vengeance go along with you!
There's two of you, the devil make the third!
Fie, womanish man, canst thou not curse thy enemies?

Suf. A plague upon them, wherefore should I curse them?

Could curses kill, as do the mandrake's groans,
I would invent as many bitter terms,
Deliver'd strongly through my fixed teeth,
With twice so many signs of deadly hate,
As lean-fac'd Envy in her loathsome cave.
My tongue should stumble in mine earnest words;
Mine eyes should sparkle like the beaten flint;
My hair be fix'd on end, as one distraught;
And every joint should seem to curse and ban.
And now, methinks, my burthen'd heart would break
Should I not curse them. Poison be their drink!
Gall, worse than gall, the daintiest thing they taste!
Their sweetest shade a grove of cypress-trees!
Their softest touch as smart as lizards' stings!
Their music frightful like the serpents' hiss;
And boding screech-owls make the concert full!
All the foul terrors in dark-seated hell—

Queen. Enough, sweet Suffolk, thou torment'st thyself.

Suf. You bad me ban, and will you bid me cease?
Now, by this ground that I am banish'd from,
Well could I curse away a winter's night,
And standing naked on a mountain top,
Where biting cold would never let grass grow,
And think it but a minute spent in sport.

Queen. No more. Sweet Suffolk, hie thee hence to France,
Or live where thou wilt within this world's globe,
I'll have an Iris that shall find thee out.
And long thou shalt not stay, but I'll have thee repeal'd,
Or venture to be banished myself.
Oh, let this kiss be printed in thy hand,
That when thou seest it thou may'st think on me.

Away, I say, that I may feel my grief,
For it is nothing whilst thou standest here.

Suf. Thus is poor Suffolk ten times banished,
Once by the king, but three times thrice by thee.

Enter VAUX.

Queen. How now? whither goes Vaux so fast?

Vaux. To signify unto his majesty
That cardinal Beaufort is at point of death:
Sometimes he raves and cries as he were mad;
Sometimes he calls upon duke Humphrey's ghost,
And whispers to his pillow as to him;
And sometimes he calls to speak unto the king:
And I am going to certify unto his grace,
That even now he call'd aloud for him.

Queen. Go then, good Vaux, and certify the king.
Oh what is worldly pomp! all men must die!
And woe am I for Beaufort's heavy end.
But why mourn I for him, whilst thou art here?
Sweet Suffolk, hie thee hence to France,
For if the king do come, thou sure must die.

Suf. And if I go I cannot live but here to die,
What were it else,
But like a pleasant slumber in thy lap?
Here could I breathe my soul into the air,
As mild and gentle as the new-born babe,
That dies with mother's dug between his lips.
Where from my (thy) sight I should be raging mad,
And call for thee to close mine eyes,
Or with thy lips to stop my dying soul,
That I might breathe it so into thy body,
And then it liv'd in sweet Elysium.

By thee to die, were but to die in jest;
From thee to die, were torment more than death:
Oh, let me stay, befall what may befall.

Queen. Oh might'st thou stay with safety of thy life,
Then shouldst thou stay; but heavens deny it,
And therefore go, but hope ere long to be repeal'd.

Suf. I go.

Queen. And take my heart with thee.

Suf. A jewel lock'd into the woeful'st cask,
That ever yet contain'd a thing of worth.
Thus, like a splitted bark, so sunder we;
This way fall I to death.

Queen. This way for me.

[Exit VAUX.]

[She kisses him.]

[Exit SUFFOLK.]

[Exit QUEEN.]

(SCENE III.)

Enter KING and SALISBURY, and then the curtains be drawn, and the CARDINAL is discovered in his bed, raving and staring as if he were mad.

Card. Oh, death! if thou wilt let me live
But one whole year, I'll give thee as much gold
As will purchase such another island.

King. Oh, see, my lord of Salisbury, how he is troubled:
Lord cardinal, remember, Christ must save thy soul.

Card. Why, died he not in his bed?
What would you have me to do then?
Can I make men live, whether they will or no?
Sirrah, go fetch me the poison which the 'pothecary sent me.
Oh, see where duke Humphrey's ghost doth stand,
And stares me in the face. Look, look, comb down his hair!
So, now he's gone again: Oh, oh, oh!

Sal. See how the pangs of death do gripe his heart.

King. Lord cardinal, if thou diest assur'd of heavenly bliss,
Hold up thy hand, and make some sign to us.
Oh, see he dies, and makes no sign at all!
Oh, God, forgive his soul!

Sal. So bad an end did never none behold;
But as his death, so was his life in all.

King. Forbear to judge, good Salisbury, forbear,
For God will judge us all.
Go, take him hence, and see his funerals perform'd.

[CARDINAL dies.]

[Exeunt.]

(ACT IV.)

(SCENE I.)

Alarums within, and the chambers be discharged, like as it were a fight at sea. And then enter the Captain of the ship, and the Master, and the Master's Mate, and the DUKE OF SUFFOLK disguised, and others with him, and WALTER WHITMORE.

Cap. Bring forward these prisoners that scorn'd to yield;
Unlade their goods with speed, and sink their ship.
Here, master, this prisoner I give to you;
This other, the master's mate shall have;
And, Walter Whitmore, thou shalt have this man:
And let them pay their ransom ere they pass.

Suf. Water!

[He starteth.]

Walter. How now! what, dost fear me?
Thou shalt have better cause anon.

Suf. It is thy name affrights me, not thyself.
I do remember well, a cunning wizard told me
That by Water I should die:
Yet let not that make thee bloody minded;
Thy name, being rightly sounded,
Is Gualtier, not Walter.

Walter. Gualtier or Walter, all's one to me;
I am the man must bring thee to thy death.

Suf. I am a gentleman; look on my ring;
Ransom me at what thou wilt, it shall be paid.

Walter. I lost mine eye in boarding of the ship;
And therefore ere I merchant-like sell blood for gold,
Then cast me headlong down into the sea.

2 Prison. But what shall our ransoms be?

Mast. A hundred pounds apiece; either pay that or die.

2 Prison. Then save our lives; it shall be paid.

Walter. Come, sirrah, thy life shall be the ransom I will have.

Suf. Stay, villain, thy prisoner is a prince,
The duke of Suffolk, William de la Pole.

Cap. The duke of Suffolk folded up in rags.

Suf. Ay, sir, but these rags are no part of the duke:
Jove sometime went disguis'd, and why not I?

Cap. Ay, but Jove was never slain as thou shalt be.

Suf. Base jady groom, king Henry's blood,
The honourable blood of Lancaster,
Cannot be shed by such a lowly swain.

I am sent ambassador for the queen to France;
I charge thee waft me cross the channel safe.

Cap. I'll waft thee to thy death. Go, Walter, take him hence,
And on our long-boat's side chop off his head.

Suf. Thou dar'st not for thine own.

Cap. Yes, Pole.

Suf. Pole.

Cap. Ay, Pole, puddle, kennel, sink, and dirt!

I'll stop that yawning mouth of thine:
Those lips of thine that so oft have kiss'd the queen
Shall sweep the ground,

And thou that smil'dst at good duke Humphrey's death,
Shalt live no longer to infect the earth.

Suf. This villain, being but captain of a pinnace,
Threatens more plagues than mighty Abradas,
The great Macedonian pirate;
Thy words add fury and not remorse in me.

Cap. Ay, but my deeds shall stay thy fury soon.

Suf. Hast not thou waited at my trencher,
When we have feasted with queen Margaret?
Hast not thou kiss'd thy hand, and held my stirrup?
And bare-head plodded by my foot-cloth mule,
And thought thee happy when I smil'd on thee?
This hand hath writ in thy defence;
Then shall I charm thee,—hold thy lavish tongue.

Cap. Away with him, Walter, I say, and off with his head.

1 Prison. Good my lord, entreat him mildly for your life.

Suf. First let this neck stoop to the axe's edge,
Before this knee do bow to any,
Save to the God of heaven, and to my king:
Suffolk's imperial tongue cannot plead
To such a jady groom.

Walter. Come, come, why do we let him speak?
I long to have his head for ransom of mine eye.

Suf. A sworder and banditto slave

Murth'rd sweet Tully;
Brutus' bastard hand stabb'd Julius Cæsar;
And Suffolk dies by pirates on the seas.

[Exit SUFFOLK and WALTER.]

Cap. Off with his head, and send it to the queen;
And ransomless this prisoner shall go free,
To see it safe deliver'd unto her.

Come, let's go.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE II.)

Enter two of the Rebels with long staves.

George. Come away, Nick, and put a long staff in thy pike, and provide thyself, for I can tell thee they have been up this two days.

Nick. Then they had more need to go to bed now. But, sirrah George, what's the matter?

George. Why, sirrah, Jack Cade the dyer of Ashford here, he means to turn this land, and set a new nap on't.

Nick. Ay, marry, he had need so, for 'tis grown threadbare.

'Twas never merry world with us since these gentlemen came up.

George. I warrant thee thou shalt never see a lord wear a leather apron now-a-days.

Nick. But, sirrah, who comes else beside Jack Cade?

George. Why, there's Dick the butcher, and Robin the saddler, and Will that came a wooing to our Nan last Sunday, and Harry, and Tom, and Gregory that should have your Parnil, and a great sort more is come from Rochester, and from Maidstone, and Canterbury, and all the towns hereabouts, and we must be all lords or squires as soon as Jack Cade is king.

Nick. Hark, hark, I hear the drum; they be coming.

Enter JACK CADE, DICK BUTCHER, ROBIN, WILL, TOM, HARRY, and the rest with long staves.

Cade. Proclaim silence.

All. Silence!

Cade. I, John Cade, so named for my valiancy.

Dick. Or rather for stealing of a cade of sprats.

Cade. My father was a Mortimer.

Dick. He was an honest man and a good bricklayer.

Cade. My mother was come of the Lacies.

Nick. She was a pedlar's daughter indeed, and sold many laces.

Robin. And now, being not able to occupy her furred pack, she washeth bucks up and down the country.

Cade. Therefore I am honourably born.

Harry. Ay, the field is honourable, for he was born under a hedge, because his father had no other house but the cage.

Cade. I am able to endure much.

George. That's true, I know he can endure anything, for I have seen him whipped two market-days together.

Cade. I fear neither sword nor fire.

Will. He need not fear the sword, for his coat is of proof.

Dick. But methinks he should fear the fire, being so often burnt in the hand for stealing of sheep.

Cade. Therefore be brave, for your captain is brave, and vows reformation : you shall have seven halfpenny loaves for a penny, and the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops, and it shall be felony to drink small beer, if I be king, as king I will be.

All. God save your majesty!

Cade. I thank you, good people : you shall all eat and drink of my score, and go all in my livery ; and we'll have no writing, but the score and the tally, and there shall be no laws but such as come from my mouth.

Dick. We shall have sore laws then, for he was thrust into the mouth the other day.

George. Ay, and stinking law too, for his breath stinks so that one cannot abide it.

Enter WILL with the Clerk of Chatham.

Will. Oh, captain, a prize!

Cade. Who's that, Will?

Will. The clerk of Chatham : he can write and read and cast account. I took him setting of boys' copies ; and he has a book in his pocket with red letters.

Cade. Zounds, he's a conjurer ! bring him hither. Now, sir, what's your name?

Clerk. Emanuel, sir, an it shall please you.

Dick. It will go hard with you, I tell you, for they use to write that o'er the top of letters.

Cade. What, do you use to write your name ? Or do you, as ancient forefathers have done, use the score and the tally ?

Clerk. Nay, truly, sir, I praise God I have been so well brought up that I can write mine own name.

Cade. Oh, he has confessed ; go hang him with his pen and ink-horn about his neck. [Exit One with the Clerk.]

Enter TOM.

Tom. Captain, news, news ! sir Humphrey Stafford and his brother are coming with the king's power, and mean to kill us all.

Cade. Let them come ; he's but a knight, is he ?

Tom. No, no, he's but a knight.

Cade. Why, then, to equal him, I'll make myself knight. Kneel down John Mortimer, rise up sir John Mortimer. Is there any more of them that be knights ?

Tom. Ay, his brother.

Cade. Then kneel down, Dick Butcher. [He knights him.] Rise up sir Dick Butcher. Now, sound up the drum.

Enter SIR HUMPHREY STAFFORD and his Brother, with drum and Soldiers.

Cade. As for these silken-coated slaves, I pass not a pin ; 'Tis to you, good people, that I speak.

Staf. Why, countrymen, what mean you thus in troops To follow this rebellious traitor Cade ? Why, his father was a bricklayer.

Cade. Well, and Adam was a gardener, what then ? But I come of the Mortimers.

Staf. Ay, the duke of York hath taught you that.

Cade. The duke of York ? nay, I learnt it myself. For look you, Roger Mortimer the earl of March, Married the duke of Clarence' daughter.

Staf. Well, that's true : but what then

Cade. And by her he had two children at a birth.

Staf. That's false.

Cade. Ay, but I say 'tis true.

All. Why then 'tis true.

Cade. And one of them was stolen away by a beggar-woman, and that w. father, and I am his son, deny it an you can.

Nick. Nay, look you, I know 'tis true ; for his father built a chimney in my father's house, and the bricks are alive at this day to testify it.

Cade. But dost thou hear, Stafford ; tell the king that for his father's sake, in whose time boys played at span-counter with French crowns, I am content that he shall be king as long as he lives : marry, always provided I'll be protector over him.

Staf. O monstrous simplicity !

Cade. And tell him, we'll have the lord Say's head, and the duke of Somerset's, for delivering up the dukedoms of Anjou and Maine, and selling the towns in France : by which means England hath been maimed ever since, and gone as it were with a crutch, but that my puissance held it up. And besides, they can speak French, and therefore they are traitors.

Staf. As how, I prithee ?

Cade. Why, the Frenchmen are our enemies, be they not ? and, then, can he that speaks with the tongue of an enemy be a good subject ? Answer me to that.

Staf. Well, sirrah, wilt thou yield thyself unto the king's mercy, and he will pardon thee and these their outrages and rebellious deeds ?

Cade. Nay, bid the king come to me an he will, and then I'll pardon him, or otherwise I'll have his crown, tell him, ere it be long.

Staf. Go, herald, proclaim in all the king's towns, ;

That those that will forsake the rebel Cade

Shall have free pardon from his majesty. [Exeunt STAFFORD and his men.]

Cade. Come, sirs, Saint George for us and Kent. [Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE III.)

Alarums to the battle, where SIR HUMPHREY STAFFORD and his Brother are both slain. Then enter JACK CADE again, and the rest.

Cade. Sir Dick Butcher, thou hast fought to-day most valiantly, and knocked them down as if thou hadst been in thy slaughter-house, and thus I will reward thee : the Lent shall be as long again as it was, and thou shalt have licence to kill for fourscore and one a-week. Drum, strike up, for now we'll march to London, and to-morrow I mean to sit in the king's seat at Westminster.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE IV.)

Enter the KING reading of a letter, and the QUEEN with the DUKE OF SUFFOLK'S head, and the LORD SAY, with others.

King. Sir Humphrey Stafford and his brother are slain, And the rebels march amain to London.

Go back to them, and tell them thus from me,

I'll come and parley with their general.

Yet stay, I'll read the letter once again ;

Lord Say, Jack Cade hath solemnly vow'd to have thy head.

Say. Ay, but I hope your highness shall have his.

King. How now, madam ! still

Lamenting and mourning for Suffolk's death ?

I fear, my love, if I had been dead,

Thou wouldst not have mourn'd so much for me.

Queen. No, my love, I should not mourn, but die for thee

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Oh, fly, my lord ! the rebels are entered Southwark,

And have almost won the bridge,

Calling your grace an usurper :

And that monstrous rebel, Cade, hath sworn

To crown himself king in Westminster.

Therefore fly, my lord, and post to Killingworth.

King. Go bid Buckingham and Clifford gather

An army up, and meet with the rebels.

Come, madam, let us haste to Killingworth.

Come on, lord Say, go thou along with us,

For fear the rebel Cade do find thee out.

Say. My innocence, my lord, shall plead for me,

And therefore, with your highness' leave, I'll stay behind.

King. Even as thou wilt, my lord Say :

Come, madam, let us go.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE V.)

Enter the LORD SCALES upon the Tower walls, walking.

Scales. How now ! is Jack Cade slain ?

Cit. No, my lord, nor likely to be slain, for they have won the bridge, killing all those that withstand them. The lord mayor craveth aid of your honour from the Tower, to defend the city from the rebels.

Scales. Such aid as I can spare, you shall command ;

But I am troubled here with them myself.

The rebels have attempted to win the Tower.

But get you to Smithfield and gather head,

And thither will I send you Matthew Gough :

Fight for your king, your country, and your lives ;

And so farewell, for I must hence again.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE VI.)

Enter JACK CADE, and the rest, and strikes his sword upon London stone.

Cade. Now is Mortimer lord of this city, and now, sitting upon London stone, we command that, the first year of our reign, the pissing conduit run nothing but red wine. And now henceforward, it shall be treason for any that calls me any otherwise than lord Mortimer.

Enter a Soldier.

Sol. Jack Cade, Jack Cade!

Cade. Zounds, knock him down! [They kill him.]

Dick. My lord, there's an army gathered together into Smithfield.

Cade. Come, then, let's go fight with them, but first go on and set London-bridge a-fire, and, if you can, burn down the Tower too. Come, let's away.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE VII.)

Alarums, and then MATTHEW GOUGH is slain, and all the rest with him.
Then enter JACK CADE again and his company.

Cade. So, sirs: now go and pull down the Savoy; others to the inns of court: down with them all.

Dick. I have a suit unto your lordship.

Cade. Be it a lordship, Dick, and thou shalt have it for that word.

Dick. That we may go burn all the records, and that all writing may be put down, and nothing used but the score and tally.

Cade. Dick, it shall be so, and henceforward all things shall be in common, and in Cheapside shall my palfrey go to grass. Why is 't not a miserable thing, that of the skin of an innocent lamb parchment should be made, and then with a little blotting over with ink a man should undo himself? Some say 'tis the bees that sting, but I say 'tis their wax, for I am sure I never sealed to anything but once, and I was never mine own man since.

Nick. But when shall we take up those commodities which you told us of?

Cade. Marry, he that will lustily stand to it, shall take up these commodities following: Item, a gown, a kirtle, a petticoat, and a smock.

Enter GEORGE.

George. My lord, a prize, a prize! here's the lord Say, which sold the towns in France.

Cade. Come hither, thou Say, thou George, (serge), thou buckram lord! what answer canst thou make unto my mightiness, for delivering up the towns in France to monsieur Bus-mine-cue, the dolphin of France? And more than so, thou hast most traitorously erected a grammar-school, to infect the youth of the realm; and against the king's crown and dignity thou hast built up a paper-mill; nay, it will be said to thy face, that thou keep'st men in thy house that daily read of books with red letters, and talk of a noun and verb, and such abominable words as no Christian ear is able to endure it. And besides all this, thou hast appointed certain justices of the peace, in every shire, to hang honest men that steal for their living; and because they could not read, thou hast hung them up; only for which cause they were most worthy to live.

Say. Yes, what of that?

Cade. Marry, I say, thou oughtest not to let thy horse wear a cloak, when an honest man than thyself goes in his hose and doublet.

Say. You men of Kent!

All. Kent, what of Kent?

Say. Nothing, but bona terra.

Cade. Bonum terum, zounds, what's that?

Dick. He speaks French.

Will. No 'tis Dutch.

Nick. No 'tis Outalian, I know it well enough.

Say. Kent (in the Commentaries Cæsar wrote)

Term'd is the civilest place of all this land:

Then, noble countrymen, hear me but speak;

I sold not France, nor lost I Normandy.

Cade. But wherefore dost thou shake thy head so?

Say. It is the palsy, and not fear that makes me.

Cade. Nay, thou nodd'st thy head at us, as who wouldst say, thou wilt be even with me if thou gett'st away: but I'll make thee sure enough now I have thee. Go, take him to the standard in Cheapside, and chop off his head; and then go to Mile-end green to Sir James Cromer, his son-in-law, and cut off his head too, and bring them to me upon two poles presently. Away with him.

[Exit One or Two with the LORD SAY.]

There shall not a nobleman wear a head on his shoulders but he shall pay me tribute for it. Nor there shall not a maid be married, but he shall fee to me for her maidenhead; or else I'll have it myself: Marry, I will that married men shall hold of me in capite, and that their wives shall be as free as heart can think, or tongue can tell.

Enter ROBIN.

Rob. O, captain, London-bridge is a-fire.

Cade. Run to Billingsgate, and fetch pitch and flax, and quench it.

Enter DICK and a Sergeant.

Serg. Justice, justice, I pray you, sir, let me have justice of this fellow here.

Cade. Why, what has he done?

Serg. Alas, sir, he has ravish'd my wife.

Dick. Why, my lord, he would have 'rested me, and I went and entered my action in his wife's paper-house.

Cade. Dick, follow thy suit in her common place. You whoreson villain, you are a sergeant, you'll take any man by the throat for twelve pence: and 'rest a man when he is at dinner, and have him to prison ere the meat be out on 's mouth. Go, Dick, take him hence, and cut out his tongue for cogging; hough him for running; and to conclude, brain him with his own mace.

[Exit with the Sergeant.]

Enter Two with the LORD SAY's head, and SIR JAMES CROMER's, upon two poles.

So, come carry them before me, and at every lane's end let them kiss together.

(SCENE VIII.)

Enter the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, and LORD CLIFFORD, the EARL OF CUMBERLAND.

Clif. Why, countrymen, and warlike friends of Kent, What mean these mutinous rebellions, That you in troops do muster thus yourselves, Under the conduct of this traitor Cade? To rise against your sovereign lord and king, Who mildly hath his pardon sent to you, If you forsake this monstrous rebel here? If honour be the mark whereat you aim, Then haste to France that our forefathers won, And win again that thing which now is lost, And leave to seek your country's overthrow.

All. A Clifford! a Clifford!

[They forsake CADE.]

Cade. Why, how now, will you forsake your general, And ancient freedom which you have possess'd, To bend your necks under their servile yokes, Who, if you stir, will straightway hang you up? But follow me, and you shall pull them down, And make them yield their livings to your hands.

All. A Cade! a Cade!

[They run to CADE again.]

Clif. Brave warlike friends, hear me but speak. Refuse not good whilst it is offer'd you: The king is merciful, then yield to him, And I myself will go along with you To Windsor castle, whereas the king abides, And on mine honour you shall have no hurt.

All. A Clifford! a Clifford! God save the king!

Cade. How like a feather is this rascal company Blown every way! But that they may see there wants no valiancy in me, My staff shall make way through the midst of you, And so a pox take you all.

[He runs through them with his staff, and then flies away.]

Buck. Go, some, and make after him, and proclaim that those that can bring the head of Cade shall have a thousand crowns for his labour. Come, march away.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE IX.)

Enter KING HENRY, and the QUEEN, and SOMERSET.

King. Lord Somerset, what news hear you of the rebel Cade?

Som. This, my gracious lord, that the lord Say is done to death, and the city is almost sacked.

King. God's will be done, for as he hath decreed so must it be: and be as he please, to stop the pride of those rebellious men.

Queen. Had the noble duke of Suffolk been alive, The rebel Cade had been suppress'd ere this, And all the rest that do take part with him.

Enter the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM and CLIFFORD, with the Rebels, with halters about their necks.

Clif. Long live king Henry, England's lawful king. Lo, here, my lord, these rebels are subdued, And offer their lives before your highness' feet.

King. But tell me, Clifford, is their captain here?

Clif. No, my gracious lord, he is fled away, but proclamations are sent forth that he that can but bring his head shall have a thousand crowns. But may it please your majesty to pardon these their faults, that by that traitor's means were thus misled.

King. Stand up, you simple men, and give God praise, For you did take in hand you know not what: And go in peace obedient to your king, And live as subjects, and you shall not want,

Whilst Henry lives, and wears the English crown.

All. God save the king! God save the king!

King. Come, let us haste to London now with speed, That solemn processions may be sung, In laud and honour of the God of heaven, And triumphs of this happy victory.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE X.)

Enter JACK CADE at one door, and at the other, MASTER ALEXANDER IDEN and his men, and JACK CADE lies down, picking of herbs and eating them.

Iden. Good Lord, how pleasant is this country life! This little land my father left me here, With my contented mind, serves me as well As all the pleasures in the court can yield, Nor would I change this pleasure for the court.

Cade. Zounds! here's the lord of the soil: stand, villain! thou wilt betray me to the king, and get a thousand crowns for my head: but ere thou goest I'll make thee eat iron like an ostrich, and swallow my sword like a great pin.

Iden. Why, saucy companion, why should I betray thee? Is 't not enough that thou hast broke my hedges, And enter'd into my ground, without the leave of me, the owner, But thou wilt brave me too?

Cade. Brave thee and beard thee, too, by the best blood of the realm. Look on me well: I have eat no meat this five days; yet if I do not leave thee and thy five men as dead as a door-nail, I pray God I may never eat grass more.

Iden. Nay, it shall never be said, whilst the world stands, That Alexander Iden, an esquire of Kent, Took odds to combat with a famish'd man. Look on me, my limbs are equal unto thine, And every way as big: then hand to hand I'll combat with thee. Sirrah, fetch me weapons, And stand you all aside.

Cade. Now, sword, if thou dost not hew this burly-boned churl into chines of beef, I would thou might'st fall into some smith's hands and be turn'd to hob-nails.

Iden. Come on thy way. [They fight, and CADE falls down.]

Cade. Oh, villain, thou hast slain the flower of Kent for chivalry; but it is famine and not thee that has done it. For come ten thousand devils, and give me but the ten meals that I wanted this five days, and I'll fight with you all. And so a pox rot thee, for Jack Cade must die. [He dies.]

Iden. Jack Cade! and was this that monstrous rebel which I have slain? Oh, sword, I'll honour thee for this, and in my chamber Shalt thou hang as a monument to after-age, For this great service thou hast done to me. I'll drag him hence, and with my sword Cut off his head, and bear it to the king. [Exit.]

(ACT V.)

(SCENE I.)

Enter the DUKE OF YORK, with drum and Soldiers.

York. In arms from Ireland comes York again. Ring bells aloud, bonfires perfume the air, To entertain fair England's royal king. Ah, sancta majestas! who would not buy thee dear?

Enter the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

But soft, who comes here? Buckingham! what news with him?

Buck. York, if thou mean well, I greet thee so.

York. Humphrey of Buckingham, welcome, I swear:

What, comest thou in love, or as a messenger?

Buck. I come as a messenger from our dread lord and sovereign, Henry, To know the reason of these arms in peace; Or that thou, being a subject as I am, Shouldst thus approach so near with colours spread, Whereas the person of the king doth keep?

York. A subject as he is!

Oh, how I hate these spiteful abject terms! But, York, dissemble, till thou meet thy sons, Who now in arms expect their father's sight, And not far hence I know they cannot be. Humphrey duke of Buckingham, pardon me That I answer'd not at first, my mind was troubled. I came to remove that monstrous rebel Cade, And heave proud Somerset from out the court, That basely yielded up the towns in France.

Buck. Why that was presumption on thy behalf: But if it be no otherwise than so, The king doth pardon thee, and grants to thy request, And Somerset is sent unto the Tower.

York. Upon thine honour is it so?

Buck. York, he is, upon mine honour.

York. Then before thy face I here dismiss my troops. Sirs, meet me to-morrow in Saint George's fields, And there you shall receive your pay of me. [Exeunt Soldiers.]

Buck. Come, York, thou shalt go speak unto the king. But see, his grace is coming to meet with us.

Enter KING HENRY.

King. How now, Buckingham? is York friends with us, That thus thou bring'st him hand in hand with thee?

Buck. He is, my lord, and hath discharged his troops, Which came with him, but as your grace did say, To heave the duke of Somerset from hence, And to subdue the rebels that were up.

King. Then welcome, cousin York; give me thy hand, And thanks for thy great service done to us, Against those traitorous Irish that rebell'd.

Enter MASTER IDEN, with JACK CADE'S head.

Iden. Long live King Henry in triumphant peace! Lo, here, my lord, upon my bended knees, I here present the traitorous head of Cade, That hand to hand in single fight I slew.

King. First, thanks to heaven, and next to thee, my friend, That hast subdued that wicked traitor thus.

Oh let me see that head that in his life Did work me and my land such cruel spite.

A visage stern, coal-black his curled locks, Deep-trenched furrows in his frowning brow, Presageth warlike humours in his life.

Here, take it hence, and thou for thy reward Shalt be immediately created knight.

Kneel down, my friend, and tell me what's thy name?

Iden. Alexander Iden, if it please your grace, A poor esquire of Kent.

King. Then rise up Alexander Iden, knight; And for thy maintenance I freely give

A thousand marks a-year to maintain thee, Beside the firm reward that was proclaim'd For those that could perform this worthy act, And thou shalt wait upon the person of the king.

Iden. I humbly thank your grace, and I no longer live Than I prove just and loyal to my king. [Exit.]

Enter the QUEEN with the DUKE OF SOMERSET.

King. O, Buckingham, see where Somerset comes! Bid him go hide himself till York be gone.

Queen. He shall not hide himself for fear of York, But beard and brave him proudly to his face.

York. Who's that? proud Somerset at liberty?

Base, fearful Henry, that thus dishonour'st me,

By heaven, thou shalt not govern over me:

I cannot brook that traitor's presence here,

Nor will I subject be to such a king

That knows not how to govern nor to rule.

Resign thy crown, proud Lancaster, to me,

That thou usurped hast so long by force;

For now is York resolv'd to claim his own,

And rise aloft into fair England's throne.

Som. Proud traitor, I arrest thee on high treason

Against thy sovereign lord; yield thee, false York,

For here I swear thou shalt unto the Tower,

For these proud words which thou hast given the king.

York. Thou art deceiv'd: my sons shall be my bail,

And send thee there in despite of him.

Ho, where are you boys?

Queen. Call Clifford hither presently.

Enter the DUKE OF YORK'S Sons, EDWARD the EARL OF MARCH, and crook-back RICHARD, at the one door, with drum and Soldiers: and at the other door, enter CLIFFORD and his Son, with drum and Soldiers, and CLIFFORD kneels to HENRY, and speaks.

Clif. Long live my noble lord, and sovereign king.

York. We thank thee, Clifford.

Nay, do not affright us with thy looks:

If thou didst mistake, we pardon thee, kneel again.

Clif. Why, I did no way mistake; this is my king.

What, is he mad? To Bedlam with him.

King. Ay, a Bedlam frantic humour drives him thus To levy arms against his lawful king.

Clif. Why doth not your grace send him to the Tower?

Queen. He is arrested, but will not obey;

His sons, he saith, shall be his bail.

York. How say you, boys, will you not?

Edw. Yes, noble father, if our words will serve.

Rich. And if our words will not, our swords shall.

York. Call hither to the stake my two rough bears.

King. Call Buckingham, and bid him arm himself.

York. Call Buckingham, and all the friends thou hast; Both thou and they shall curse this fatal hour.

Enter at one door, the EARLS OF SALISBURY and WARWICK, with drum and Soldiers. And at the other door, the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, with drum and Soldiers.

Clif. Are these thy bears? we'll bait them soon, Despite of thee and all the friends thou hast.

War. You had best go dream again, To keep you from the tempest of the field.

Clif. I am resolv'd to bear a greater storm

Than any thou canst conjure up to-day;

And that I'll write upon thy burgonet,

Might I but know thee by thy household badge.

War. Now by my father's age (badge), old Nevil's crest,

The rampant bear chain'd to the ragged staff,

This day I'll wear aloft my burgonet,

(As on a mountain-top the cedar shows,
That keeps his leaves in spite of any storm,
Even to affright thee with the view thereof.)

Clif. And from thy burgonet will I rend the bear,
And tread him under foot with all contempt,
Despite the bear-ward that protects him so.

Y. Clif. And so, renowned sovereign, to arms,
To quell these traitors and their complices.

Rich. Fie, charity, for shame! speak it not in spite,
For you shall sup with Jesus Christ to-night.

Y. Clif. Foul stigmatic, thou canst not tell.

Rich. No, for if not in heaven, you'll surely sup in hell. [Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE II.)

Alarums to the battle, and then enter the DUKE OF SOMERSET and RICHARD fighting, and RICHARD kills him under the sign of the Castle in Saint Alban's.

Rich. So, lie thou there, and tumble in thy blood.
What's here, the sign of the Castle?
Then the prophecy is come to pass,
For Somerset was forewarn'd of castles,
The which he always did observe.
And now behold, under a paltry alehouse sign,
The Castle in Saint Alban's, Somerset
Hath made the wizard famous by his death.

[Exit.]

Alarums again, and enter the EARL OF WARWICK alone.

War. Clifford of Cumberland, 'tis Warwick calls,
And if thou dost not hide thee from the bear,
Now, whilst the angry trumpets sound alarms,
And dead men's cries do fill the empty air,
Clifford, I say, come forth and fight with me!
Proud northern lord, Clifford of Cumberland,
Warwick is hoarse with calling thee to arms. [CLIFFORD speaks within.]

Clif. Warwick, stand still, and view the way that Clifford Hews with his murth'ring curtel-axe, through the fainting troops
To find thee out.
Warwick, stand still, and stir not till I come.

Enter YORK.

War. How now, my lord, what a-foot?
Who kill'd your horse?

York. The deadly hand of Clifford. Noble lord,
Five horse this day slain under me,
And yet, brave Warwick, I remain alive.
But I did kill his horse he lov'd so well,
The bonniest grey that ere was bred in north.

Enter CLIFFORD, and WARWICK offers to fight with him.

Hold, Warwick, and seek thee out some other chase,
Myself will hunt this deer to death.

War. Brave lord, 'tis for a crown thou fight'st.
Clifford, farewell! as I intend to prosper well to-day,
It grieves my soul to leave thee unassail'd.

[Exit WARWICK.]

York. Now, Clifford, since we are singled here alone,
Be this the day of doom to one of us;
For now my heart hath sworn immortal hate
To thee, and all the house of Lancaster.

Clif. And here I stand, and pitch my foot to thine,
Vowing never to stir till thou or I be slain.
For never shall my heart be safe at rest,
Till I have spoil'd the hateful house of York.

[Alarums, and they fight, and YORK kills CLIFFORD.]

York. Now Lancaster sit sure; thy sinews shrink.
Come, fearful Henry, grovelling on thy face,
Yield up thy crown unto the prince of York.

[Exit YORK.]

Alarums, then enter Young CLIFFORD alone.

Y. Clif. Father of Cumberland!
Where may I seek my aged father forth?
Oh, dismal sight! see where he breathless lies,

All smear'd and welter'd in his luke-warm blood!
Ah, aged pillar of all Cumberland's true house,
Sweet father, to thy murder'd ghost I swear
Immortal hate unto the house of York!
Nor never shall I sleep secure one night,
Till I have furiously reveng'd thy death,
And left not one of them to breathe on earth. [He takes him up on his back.]
And thus, as old Anchises' son did bear
His aged father on his manly back,
And fought with him against the bloody Greeks,
Even so will I. But stay, here's one of them
To whom my soul hath sworn immortal hate.

Enter RICHARD, and then CLIFFORD lays down his father, fights him, and RICHARD flies away again.

Out, crook'd-back villain, get thee from my sight!
But I will after thee, and once again
(When I have borne my father to his tent)
I'll try my fortune better with thee yet. [Exit Young CLIFFORD with his father.]

Alarums again, and then enter Three or Four, bearing the DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM wounded to his tent.

Alarums still, and then enter the KING and QUEEN.

Queen. Away, my lord, and fly to London straight.
Make haste, for vengeance comes along with them:
Come, stand not to expostulate, let's go.

King. Come then, fair queen, to London let us haste,
And summon up a parliament with speed,
To stoo the fury of these dire events. [Exeunt KING and QUEEN.]

(SCENE III.)

Alarums, and then a flourish, and enter the DUKE OF YORK, EDWARD, and RICHARD.

York. How now, boys! fortunate this fight hath been,
I hope, to us and ours, for England's good,
And our great honour, that so long we lost,
Whilst faint-heart Henry did usurp our rights.
But did you see old Salisbury, since we
With bloody minds did buckle with the foe?
I would not for the loss of this right hand,
That aught but well betide that good old man.

Rich. My lord, I saw him in the thickest throng,
Charging his lance with his old weary arms;
And thrice I saw him beaten from his horse,
And thrice this hand did set him up again,
And still he fought with courage 'gainst his foes,
The boldest spirited man that ere mine eyes beheld.

Enter SALISBURY and WARWICK.

Edw. See, noble father, where they both do come,
The only props unto the house of York.

Sal. Well hast thou fought this day, thou valiant duke,
And thou brave bud of York's increasing house!
The small remainder of my weary life
I hold for thee, for with thy warlike arm,
Three times this day thou hast preserv'd my life.

York. What say you, lords? the king is fled to London,
There as I hear to hold a parliament:
What says lord Warwick? shall we after them?

War. After them! nay, before them if we can.
Now, by my faith, lords, 'twas a glorious day!
Saint Alban's battle, won by famous York,
Shall be eterniz'd in all age to come.
Sound, drums and trumpets; and to London all;
And more such days as these to us befall. [Exeunt.]

KING HENRY VI.

PART III.

INTRODUCTORY NOTICE.

THIS drama appears in the original folio collection under the title of "The Third Part of Henry the Sixth, with the Death of the Duke of Yorke." In 1595 was published "The True Tragedie of Richard Duke of Yorke, and the Death of good King Henry the Sixth, with the whole Contention between the two Houses Lancaster and Yorke, as it was sundrie times acted by the Right Honourable the Earle of Pembroke his Servants." This was reprinted in 1600, the publisher of each edition being Thomas Millington. Upon this drama is founded the Third Part of Henry VI., in the form in which we have received it as Shakspeare's. We print this original, as a Supplement, from the edition of Thomas Pavier, in 1619, which edition we have collated with the unique copy now in the Bodleian Library, having been purchased for that noble collection at the sale of Mr. Chalmers's books in 1842. This play, in Pavier's edition, is entitled "The Second Part of the Contention of the Two famous Houses of York and Lancaster." We indicate, in foot-notes, where this edition materially varies from the first copy of 1595.

COSTUME OF HENRY VI., PART III.

The Costume for the Third Part of King Henry VI. is, in fact, that of the reign of Edward IV., the principal characteristics of which were, in male attire, the exceeding shortness of the jackets, doublets, or pourpoints, and the padding out of the shoulders of them with large waddings called mahoitres, the sleeves being slit up the back or across the elbow to show those of the white shirt. This was the commencement of the fashion of slashing which became so prevalent in the next century. The hood had now disappeared entirely, except from official dresses; and bonnets of cloth, a quarter of an ell in height, were worn by the beaux of the day, who also, instead of cropping the hair all round, as in the last three reigns, suffered it to grow to such a length that it came into their eyes. The toes of their shoes and boots were at first ridiculously long and pointed,* and towards the close of the reign as preposterously broad and round. These extravagancies were endeavoured to be checked by sumptuary laws in the third and twenty-second years of Edward's reign, but, as usual, with very little effect. In the female dress some remarkable changes also occur. The gowns have very long trains, with broad velvet borders. The waists are very short, and confined by broad belts buckled before. The steeple head-dress (similar to the Cauchoise, still worn in Normandy, and so called from the Pays de Caux) is a peculiar mark of this reign in England.

Of the historical personages in this play we have several representations. A portrait of Edward IV. is amongst those presented to the Society of Antiquaries by Mr. Kerrich, and, if not to be relied upon as an excellent likeness, it was at least executed during or shortly after his reign, and may be fairly supposed to convey an idea of his general appearance and costume. He wears a black cap with a rich ornament and pendent pearl. His outer dress is cloth of gold—the under one black. In the royal MS. marked 15 E 4 we see him on his throne receiving a book, and surrounded by some of the principal officers of his court. In a MS. in the Lambeth library also he is depicted on his throne receiving a volume from the hands of Lord Rivers and Caxton his printer; and by his side stand his queen, the young Prince Edward, and another royal personage, similarly attired with the prince, who is supposed to be either Richard Duke of Gloster or George Duke of Clarence. The Monk of Croyland informs us that "the new fashion" Edward IV. "chose for the last state-dresses was to have very full hanging sleeves like a monk's, lined with the most sumptuous furs, and so rolled over his shoulders as to give his tall person an air of peculiar grandeur."

Of Louis XI., King of France, there are several authentic portraits in Montfaucon. A drawing of the famous king-making Earl of Warwick exists in the Warwick Roll, College of Arms, as does also one of George Duke of Clarence, Earl of Warwick in right of his wife, Isabel Nevil, eldest daughter and co-heiress of the king-maker. In the additional MSS. at the British Museum (No. 6298), presented by the late Miss Banks, is a most interesting drawing, made apparently in the year 1563. It represents the tomb and effigy of King Henry VI., which were formerly in St. George's Chapel at Windsor, and were destroyed, it is supposed, during the civil wars temp. Charles I., as Sandford in 1677 says, "He (Henry) was interred there under a fair monument, of which there are at present no remains." Over the tomb hang the tabard of arms, the sword, gauntlets, and shield of the deceased monarch, and underneath some later hand has written, "Quære, if not the figure of Henry VI. because of the angel?" alluding to the figure of an angel supporting the royal arms which appear on the side of the tomb, as, although the royal supporters during this reign were usually antelopes, the arms of Henry appear supported by an angel on the counter-seal engraved in Sandford's "Genealogical History," p. 240, edit. 1677. At the same page in Sandford will be found the seal of Edward Prince of Wales, son of Henry VI., on which is the figure of the prince on horseback and in armour, his tabard, shield, and the caparisons of his horse emblazoned with his arms, quarterly France and England, over all a label of three points argent.

In illustration of the military costume of the time we have the illuminations of a MS. in the library at Ghent, written by a follower of Edward IV. in 1471, and presented to Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy. One represents the battle of Barnet. Edward IV. is seen on a white charger, with crimson caparisons, lined with blue and embroidered with golden flowers; his bascinet is surrounded by a crown, and he is in the act of piercing with his lance a knight, presumed to be meant for the Earl of Warwick. Another is the battle of Tewkesbury, wherein Edward is depicted on a brown horse, a crown round his helmet, and the arms of France and England quarterly on his shield. The subject of a third is the execution of Edmund Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, after the battle of Tewkesbury.

The decoration bestowed by Edward IV. upon his followers was a collar composed of suns and roses (badges of the house of York), to which was appended the white lion of March. (Vide Effigies of Sir John Crosby and Lady, engraved in Stothard's "Sepul. Mon.")

* We are told by Blackman that Henry VI. "would not wear the up-pointed horn-like toes then in fashion," and that "his dress was plain." (Vide Collection printed by Hearne at the end of his Otterburne.)

ACT I.

SCENE I.—London. The Parliament-House.

Drums. Some Soldiers of YORK'S Party break in. Then enter the DUKE OF YORK, EDWARD, RICHARD, NORFOLK, MONTAGUE, WARWICK, and others, with white roses in their hats.

War. I wonder how the king escap'd our hands.

York. While we pursued the horsemen of the north,
He slyly stole away, and left his men :

Whereat the great lord of Northumberland,
Whose warlike ears could never brook retreat,
Cheer'd up the drooping army ; and himself,
Lord Clifford, and lord Stafford, all abreast,
Charg'd our main battle's front, and, breaking in,
Were by the swords of common soldiers slain.

Edw. Lord Stafford's father, duke of Buckingham,
Is either slain or wounded dangerous :
I cleft his beaver with a downright blow ;
That this is true, father, behold his blood.

[Showing his bloody sword.]

Mont. And, brother, here's the earl of Wiltshire's blood, [To YORK, showing his.]

Whom I encounter'd as the battles join'd.

Rich. Speak thou for me, and tell them what I did.

[Throwing down the DUKE OF SOMERSET'S head.]

York. Richard hath best deserv'd of all my sons,—
But,<sup>1</sup> is your grace dead, my lord of Somerset ?

Norf. Such hope have all the line of John of Gaunt !

Rich. Thus do I hope to shake king Henry's head.

War. And so do I, victorious prince of York.<sup>2</sup>
Before I see thee seated in that throne
Which now the house of Lancaster usurps,
I vow by heaven, these eyes shall never close.
This is the palace of the fearful king,

And this the regal seat : possess it, York ;
For this is thine, and not king Henry's heirs'.

York. Assist me then, sweet Warwick, and I will ;
For hither we have broken in by force.

Norf. We'll assist you ; he that flies shall die.

York. Thanks, gentle Norfolk,—Stay by me, my lords ;—
And, soldiers, stay, and lodge by me this night.

War. And when the king comes offer him no violence,
Unless he seek to thrust you out by force. [They retire.]

York. The queen, this day, here holds her parliament,
But little thinks we shall be of her council :
By words or blows, here let us win our right.

Rich. Arm'd as we are, let's stay within this house.

War. The bloody parliament shall this be call'd,
Unless Plantagenet, duke of York, be king ;
And bashful Henry depos'd, whose cowardice
Hath made us by-words to our enemies.

York. Then leave me not, my lords ; be resolute ;
I mean to take possession of my right.

War. Neither the king, nor he that loves him best,
The proudest he that holds up Lancaster,
Dare stir a wing if Warwick shake his bells.
I'll plant Plantagenet, root him up who dares :—
Resolve thee, Richard ; claim the English crown.

[WARWICK leads YORK to the throne, who seats himself.]

Flourish. Enter KING HENRY, CLIFFORD, NORTHUMBERLAND, WESTMORELAND, EXETER, and others, with red roses in their hats.

K. Hen. My lords, look where the sturdy rebel sits,
Even in the chair of state ! belike, he means,
Back'd by the power of Warwick, that false peer,
To aspire unto the crown, and reign as king.
Earl of Northumberland, he slew thy father ;
And thine, lord Clifford ; and you both have vow'd revenge
On him, his sons, his favourites, and his friends.

<sup>1</sup> But. So the folio. In the "True Tragedy" we have what, which was the ordinary reading. There is a contemptuous force in but which is hardly given by what. The word is similarly employed in Twelfth Night: "But are you not mad indeed, or do you but counterfeit?"

<sup>2</sup> We follow the punctuation of all the old copies. In the modern text we have, which is probably the better reading,—

"And so do I. Victorious prince of York," &c.

North. If I be not, heavens be reveng'd on me!

Clif. The hope thereof makes Clifford mourn in steel.

West. What, shall we suffer this? let's pluck him down:
My heart for anger burns, I cannot brook it.

K. Hen. Be patient, gentle earl of Westmoreland.

Clif. Patience is for poltroons, and such as he;
He durst not sit there had your father liv'd.
My gracious lord, here in the parliament
Let us assail the family of York.

North. Well hast thou spoken, cousin; be it so.

K. Hen. Ah, know you not the city favours them,
And they have troops of soldiers at their beck?

Exc. But when the duke is slain they'll quickly fly.

K. Hen. Far be the thought of this from Henry's heart,
To make a shambles of the parliament-house!
Cousin of Exeter, frowns, words, and threats,
Shall be the war that Henry means to use.—

[They advance to the DUKE.]

Thou factious duke of York, descend my throne,
And kneel for grace and mercy at my feet;
I am thy sovereign.

York. I am thine.<sup>1</sup>

Exc. For shame, come down; he made thee Duke of York.

York. 'Twas my inheritance, as the earldom<sup>2</sup> was.

Exc. Thy father was a traitor to the crown.

War. Exeter, thou art a traitor to the crown,
In following this usurping Henry.

Clif. Whom should he follow but his natural king?

War. True, Clifford; and that's Richard, duke of York.

K. Hen. And shall I stand, and thou sit in my throne?

York. It must and shall be so. Content thyself.

War. Be duke of Lancaster, let him be king.

West. He is both king and duke of Lancaster;
And that the lord of Westmoreland shall maintain.

War. And Warwick shall disprove it. You forget
That we are those which chas'd you from the field,
And slew your fathers, and with colours spread
March'd through the city to the palace gates.

North. Yes, Warwick, I remember it to my grief;
And, by his soul, thou and thy house shall rue it.

West. Plantagenet, of thee, and these thy sons,
Thy kinsmen and thy friends, I'll have more lives
Than drops of blood were in my father's veins.

Clif. Urge it no more: lest that, instead of words,
I send thee, Warwick, such a messenger
As shall revenge his death before I stir.

War. Poor Clifford! how I scorn his worthless threats!

York. Will you we show our title to the crown?
If not, our swords shall plead it in the field.

K. Hen. What title hast thou, traitor, to the crown?

Thy father was, as thou art, duke of York:
Thy grandfather Roger Mortimer, earl of March:
I am the son of Henry the Fifth,
Who made the Dauphin and the French to stoop,
And seiz'd upon their towns and provinces.

War. Talk not of France, sith thou hast lost it all.

K. Hen. The lord protector lost it, and not I;
When I was crown'd I was but nine months old.

Rich. You are old enough now, and yet methinks you lose:—

Father, tear the crown from the usurper's head.

Edw. Sweet father, do so; set it on your head.

Mont. Good brother, [to YORK] as thou lov'st and honour'st arms,

Let's fight it out, and not stand cavilling thus.

Rich. Sound drums and trumpets, and the king will fly.

York. Sons, peace!

K. Hen. Peace thou! and give king Henry leave to speak.

War. Plantagenet shall speak first:—hear him, lords;
And be you silent and attentive too,
For he that interrupts him shall not live.

K. Hen. Think'st thou that I will leave my kingly throne,

Wherein my grandsire and my father sat?
No: first shall war unpeople this my realm;
Ay, and their colours—often borne in France,
And now in England to our heart's great sorrow,—
Shall be my winding-sheet.—Why faint you, lords?
My title's good, and better far than his.

War. Prove it, Henry, and thou shalt be king.

K. Hen. Henry the Fourth by conquest got the crown.

York. 'Twas by rebellion against his king.

K. Hen. I know not what to say; my title's weak.
Tell me, may not a king adopt an heir?

York. What then?

K. Hen. An if he may, then am I lawful king:
For Richard, in the view of many lords,
Resign'd the crown to Henry the Fourth;
Whose heir my father was, and I am his.

York. He rose against him, being his sovereign,
And made him to resign his crown perforce.

War. Suppose, my lords, he did it unconstrain'd,
Think you 'twere prejudicial to his crown?

Exc. No; for he could not so resign his crown,
But that the next heir should succeed and reign.

K. Hen. Art thou against us, duke of Exeter?

Exc. His is the right, and therefore pardon me.

York. Why whisper you, my lords, and answer not?

Exc. My conscience tells me he is lawful king.

K. Hen. All will revolt from me, and turn to him.

North. Plantagenet, for all the claim thou lay'st,
Think not that Henry shall be so depos'd.

War. Depos'd he shall be, in despite of all.

North. Thou art deceiv'd; 'tis not thy southern power,
Of Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, nor of Kent,—
Which makes thee thus presumptuous and proud,—
Can set the duke up, in despite of me.

Clif. King Henry, be thy title right or wrong,
Lord Clifford vows to fight in thy defence:
May that ground gape, and swallow me alive,
Where I shall kneel to him that slew my father?

K. Hen. O Clifford, how thy words revive my heart!

York. Henry of Lancaster, resign thy crown:—
What mutter you, or what conspire you, lords?

War. Do right unto this princely duke of York;
Or I will fill the house with armed men,
And over the chair of state, where now he sits,
Write up his title with usurping blood.

[He stamps, and the Soldiers show themselves.]

K. Hen. My lord of Warwick, hear but one word;—
Let me, for this my life-time, reign as king.

York. Confirm the crown to me, and to mine heirs,
And thou shalt reign in quiet while thou liv'st.

K. Hen. I am content: Richard Plantagenet,
Enjoy the kingdom after my decease.

Clif. What wrong is this unto the prince your son!

War. What good is this to England and himself!

West. Base, fearful, and despairing Henry!

Clif. How hast thou injur'd both thyself and us!

West. I cannot stay to hear these articles.

North. Nor I.

Clif. Come, cousin, let us tell the queen these news.

West. Farewell, faint-hearted and degenerate king,
In whose cold blood no spark of honour bides.

North. Be thou a prey unto the house of York,
And die in bands for this unmanly deed!

<sup>1</sup> The earlier editors adopted the reading of the "True Tragedy":—

"Thou art deceiv'd, I am thine."

The words which are rejected in the folio assuredly weaken the passage.

Earldom. In the "True Tragedy" we read kingdom.

Clif. In dreadful war may'st thou be overcome!
Or live in peace, abandon'd, and despis'd!

[Exeunt NORTHUMBERLAND, CLIFFORD, and WESTMORELAND.]

War. Turn this way, Henry, and regard them not.

Exe. They seek revenge, and therefore will not yield.

K. Hen. Ah, Exeter!

War. Why should you sigh, my lord?

K. Hen. Not for myself, lord Warwick, but my son,
Whom I unnaturally shall disinherit.

But, be it as it may:—I here entail

The crown to thee, and to thine heirs for ever;

Conditionally, that here thou take an oath

To cease this civil war, and, whilst I live,

To honour me as thy king and sovereign;

And neither by treason, nor hostility,

To seek to put me down, and reign thyself.

York. This oath I willingly take, and will perform.

[Coming from the throne.]

War. Long live king Henry!—Plantagenet, embrace
him.

K. Hen. And long live thou, and these thy forward sons!

York. Now York and Lancaster are reconcil'd.

Exc. Accurs'd be he that seeks to make them foes!

[Senet. The Lords come forward.]

York. Farewell, my gracious lord; I'll to my castle.

War. And I'll keep London, with my soldiers.

Norf. And I to Norfolk, with my followers.

Mont. And I unto the sea, from whence I came.

[Exeunt YORK, and his Sons, WARWICK, NORFOLK,
MONTAGUE, Soldiers, and Attendants.]

K. Hen. And I, with grief and sorrow, to the court.

Enter QUEEN MARGARET and the PRINCE OF WALES.

Exc. Here comes the queen, whose looks bewray<sup>1</sup> her anger:

I'll steal away.

K. Hen. Exeter, so will I. [Going.]

Q. Mar. Nay, go not from me, I will follow thee.

K. Hen. Be patient, gentle queen, and I will stay.

Q. Mar. Who can be patient in such extremes?

Ah, wretched man! 'would I had died a maid,

And never seen thee, never borne thee son,

Seeing thou hast prov'd so unnatural a father!

Hath he deserv'd to lose his birthright thus?

Hadst thou but lov'd him half so well as I;

Or felt that pain which I did for him once;

Or nourish'd him, as I did with my blood;

Thou wouldst have left thy dearest heart-blood there,

Rather than have made that savage duke thine heir,

And disinherited thine only son.

Prince. Father, you cannot disinherit me:

If you be king, why should not I succeed?

K. Hen. Pardon me, Margaret; pardon me, sweet son;

The earl of Warwick and the duke enforc'd me.

Q. Mar. Enforc'd thee! art thou king, and wilt be forc'd?

I shame to hear thee speak. Ah, timorous wretch!

Thou hast undone thyself, thy son, and me;

And given unto the house of York such head,

As thou shalt reign but by their sufferance.

To entail him and his heirs unto the crown,

What is it, but to make thy sepulchre,

And creep into it far before thy time?

Warwick is chancellor, and the lord of Calais;

Stern Faulconbridge commands the narrow seas;

The duke is made protector of the realm;
And yet shalt thou be safe? such safety finds
The trembling lamb environed with wolves.

Had I been there, which am a silly woman,

The soldiers should have toss'd me on their pikes

Before I would have granted to that act.

But thou prefer'st thy life before thine honour:

And, seeing thou dost, I here divorce myself,

Both from thy table, Henry, and thy bed,

Until that act of parliament be repeal'd,

Whereby my son is disinherited.

The northern lords, that have forsworn thy colours,

Will follow mine if once they see them spread:

And spread they shall be; to thy foul disgrace,

And utter ruin of the house of York.

Thus do I leave thee:—Come, son, let's away;

Our army's ready; come, we'll after them.

K. Hen. Stay, gentle Margaret, and hear me speak.

Q. Mar. Thou hast spoke too much already; get thee gone.

K. Hen. Gentle son Edward, thou wilt stay with me?

Q. Mar. Ay, to be murther'd by his enemies.

Prince. When I return with victory from the field
I'll see your grace: till then, I'll follow her.

Q. Mar. Come, son, away; we may not linger thus.

[Exeunt QUEEN MARGARET and the PRINCE.]

K. Hen. Poor queen! how love to me, and to her son,
Hath made her break out into terms of rage!

Reveng'd may she be on that hateful duke;

Whose haughty spirit, winged with desire,

Will cost<sup>2</sup> my crown, and, like an empty eagle,

Tire on the flesh of me and of my son!

The loss of those three lords torments my heart:

I'll write unto them, and entreat them fair;—

Come, cousin, you shall be the messenger.

Exc. And I, I hope, shall reconcile them all. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in Sandal Castle, near Wakefield, in Yorkshire.

Enter EDWARD, RICHARD, and MONTAGUE.

Rich. Brother, though I be youngest, give me leave.

Edw. No, I can better play the orator.

Mont. But I have reasons strong and forcible.

Enter YORK.

York. Why, how now, sons and brother, at a strife?
What is your quarrel? how began it first?

Edw. No quarrel, but a slight contention.

York. About what?

Rich. About that which concerns your grace, and us;
The crown of England, father, which is yours.

York. Mine, boy? not till king Henry be dead.

Rich. Your right depends not on his life, or death.

Edw. Now you are heir, therefore enjoy it now:
By giving the house of Lancaster leave to breathe
It will outrun you, father, in the end.

York. I took an oath that he should quietly reign.

Edw. But for a kingdom any oath may be broken:<sup>3</sup>
I would break a thousand oaths to reign one year.

Rich. No; God forbid your grace should be forsworn.

York. I shall be if I claim by open war.

Rich. I'll prove the contrary, if you'll hear me speak.

York. Thou canst not, son; it is impossible.

Rich. An oath is of no moment, being not took

coast—"Will coast the crown"—will hover about the crown. It is unnecessary to turn a plain expression into a metaphor.

<sup>3</sup> Lord Chedworth quotes Cicero as the authority for this opinion:—"Si violandum est jus, regnandi gratiâ violandum est: aliis rebus pietatem colas."—De Officiis, l. 3.

Before a true and lawful magistrate,
That hath authority over him that swears :
Henry had none, but did usurp the place ;
Then, seeing 'twas he that made you to depose,
Your oath, my lord, is vain and frivolous.
Therefore, to arms. And, father, do but think
How sweet a thing it is to wear a crown ;
Within whose circuit is Elysium,
And all that poets feign of bliss and joy.
Why do we linger thus ? I cannot rest,
Until the white rose that I wear be dyed
Even in the lukewarm blood of Henry's heart.

York. Richard, enough ; I will be king, or die.
Brother, thou shalt to London presently,
And whet on Warwick to this enterprise.
Thou, Richard, shalt unto the duke of Norfolk,
And tell him privily of our intent.
You, Edward, shall unto my lord Cobham,
With whom the Kentish men will willingly rise :
In them I trust ; for they are soldiers,
Witty,<sup>1</sup> courteous, liberal, full of spirit.
While you are thus employ'd, what resteth more,
But that I seek occasion how to rise,
And yet the king not privy to my drift,
Nor any of the house of Lancaster ?

Enter a Messenger.

But, stay ; What news ? why com'st thou in such post ?

Mess. The queen, with all the northern earls and lords,
Intend here to besiege you in your castle :
She is hard by with twenty thousand men ;
And therefore fortify your hold, my lord.

York. Ay, with my sword. What ! think'st thou that we fear them ?

Edward and Richard, you shall stay with me ;
My brother Montague shall post to London :
Let noble Warwick, Cobham, and the rest,
Whom we have left protectors of the king,
With powerful policy strengthen themselves,
And trust not simple Henry, nor his oaths.

Mont. Brother, I go ; I'll win them, fear it not :
And thus most humbly I do take my leave. [Exit.]

Enter SIR JOHN and SIR HUGH MORTIMER.

York. Sir John, and sir Hugh Mortimer, mine uncles !
You are come to Sandal in a happy hour ;
The army of the queen mean to besiege us.

Sir John. She shall not need, we'll meet her in the field.

York. What, with five thousand men ?

Rich. Ay, with five hundred, father, for a need.
A woman's general ; what should we fear ?

[A march afar off.]

Edw. I hear their drums ; let's set our men in order ;
And issue forth, and bid them battle straight.

York. Five men to twenty !—though the odds be great,
I doubt not, uncle, of our victory.
Many a battle have I won in France,
When as the enemy hath been ten to one ;
Why should I not now have the like success ?

[Alarum. Excunt.]

SCENE III.—Plains near Sandal Castle.

Alarums Excursions. Enter RUTLAND and his Tutor.

Rut. Ah, whither shall I fly to 'scape their hands ?
Ah, tutor, look where bloody Clifford comes !

Enter CLIFFORD and Soldiers.

Clif. Chaplain, away ! thy priesthood saves thy life.
As for the brat of this accursed duke,
Whose father slew my father, he shall die.

Tut. And I, my lord, will bear him company.

Clif. Soldiers, away with him.

Tut. Ah, Clifford ! murder not this innocent child,
Lest thou be hated both of God and man.

[Exit, forced off by Soldiers.]

Clif. How now ! is he dead already ? Or is it fear
That makes him close his eyes ?—I'll open them.

Rut. So looks the pent-up lion o'er the wretch
That trembles under his devouring paws :
And so he walks, insulting o'er his prey ;
And so he comes to rend his limbs asunder.
Ah, gentle Clifford, kill me with thy sword,
And not with such a cruel threat'ning look.
Sweet Clifford, hear me speak before I die :
I am too mean a subject for thy wrath ;
Be thou reveng'd on men, and let me live.

Clif. In vain thou speak'st, poor boy ; my father's blood
Hath stopp'd the passage where thy words should enter.

Rut. Then let my father's blood open it again ;
He is a man, and, Clifford, cope with him.

Clif. Had I thy brethren here, their lives and thine
Were not revenge sufficient for me ;

No, if I digg'd up thy forefathers' graves,
And hung their rotten coffins up in chains,
It could not slake mine ire, nor ease my heart.

The sight of any of the house of York

Is as a fury to torment my soul ;

And till I root out their accursed line,

And leave not one alive, I live in hell.

Therefore— [Lifting his hand.]

Rut. O, let me pray before I take my death :—
To thee I pray : Sweet Clifford, pity me !

Clif. Such pity as my rapier's point affords.

Rut. I never did thee harm : Why wilt thou slay me ?

Clif. Thy father hath.

Rut. But 'twas ere I was born.

Thou hast one son, for his sake pity me ;

Lest in revenge thereof,—sith God is just,—

He be as miserably slain as I.

Ah, let me live in prison all my days ;

And when I give occasion of offence,

Then let me die, for now thou hast no cause.

Clif. No cause ?

Thy father slew my father ; therefore, die.

[CLIFFORD stabs him.]

Rut. Dii faciant, laudis summa sit ista tua ! [Dies.]

Clif. Plantagenet ! I come, Plantagenet !

And this thy son's blood, cleaving to my blade,

Shall rust upon my weapon, till thy blood,

Congea'd with this, do make me wipe off both. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—The same.

Alarum. Enter YORK.

York. The army of the queen hath got the field ;
My uncles both are slain in rescuing me ;
And all my followers to the eager foe
Turn back, and fly, like ships before the wind,
Or lambs pursued by hunger-starved wolves.
My sons—God knows what hath bechanced them :
But this I know,—they have demean'd themselves
Like men born to renown, by life, or death.
Three times did Richard make a lane to me ;
And thrice cried,—“ Courage, father ! fight it out ! ”
And full as oft came Edward to my side,
With purple faulchion, painted to the hilt

In blood of those that had encounter'd him :
 And when the hardiest warriors did retire,
 Richard cried,—“Charge! and give no foot of ground!”
 And cried,—“A crown, or else a glorious tomb!
 A sceptre, or an earthly sepulchre!”
 With this, we charg'd again : but, out, alas!
 We bodg'd<sup>1</sup> again ; as I have seen a swan
 With bootless labour swim against the tide,
 And spend her strength with over-matching waves.

[A short alarum within.]

Ah, hark! the fatal followers do pursue;
 And I am faint, and cannot fly their fury:
 And were I strong I would not shun their fury:
 The sands are number'd that make up my life;
 Here must I stay, and here my life must end.

Enter QUEEN MARGARET, CLIFFORD, NORTHUMBERLAND, and Soldiers.

Come, bloody Clifford,—rough Northumberland,—
 I dare your quenchless fury to more rage;
 I am your butt, and I abide your shot.

North. Yield to our mercy, proud Plantagenet.

Clif. Ay, to such mercy as his ruthless arm,
 With downright payment show'd unto my father.
 Now Phaëton hath tumbled from his car,
 And made an evening at the noontide prick.

York. My ashes, as the phoenix, may bring forth
 A bird that will revenge upon you all:
 And in that hope I throw mine eyes to heaven,
 Scorning whate'er you can afflict me with.

Why come you not? what! multitudes, and fear?

Clif. So cowards fight, when they can fly no further;
 So doves do peck the falcon's piercing talons;
 So desperate thieves, all hopeless of their lives,
 Breathe out invectives 'gainst the officers.

York. O Clifford, but bethink thee once again,
 And in thy thought o'er-run my former time:
 And, if thou canst for blushing, view this face;
 And bite thy tongue, that slanders him with cowardice,
 Whose frown hath made thee faint and fly ere this.

Clif. I will not bandy with thee word for word;
 But buckle with thee blows, twice two for one. [Draws.]

Q. Mar. Hold, valiant Clifford! for a thousand causes,
 I would prolong awhile the traitor's life:—
 Wrath makes him deaf: speak thou, Northumberland.

North. Hold, Clifford; do not honour him so much
 To prick thy finger, though to wound his heart:
 What valour were it when a cur doth grin
 For one to thrust his hand between his teeth,
 When he might spurn him with his foot away?
 It is war's prize to take all vantages;
 And ten to one is no impeach of valour.

[They lay hands on YORK, who struggles.]

Clif. Ay, ay, so strives the woodcock with the gin.

North. So doth the coney struggle in the net.

[YORK is taken prisoner.]

York. So triumph thieves upon their conquer'd booty;
 So true men yield, with robbers so o'ermatch'd.

North. What would your grace have done unto him now?

Q. Mar. Brave warriors, Clifford and Northumberland,
 Come, make him stand upon this molehill here;
 That raught<sup>2</sup> at mountains with outstretched arms,
 Yet parted but the shadow with his hand.
 What! was it you that would be England's king?
 Was't you, that revell'd in our parliament,
 And made a preachment of your high descent?
 Where are your mess of sons, to back you now?

<sup>2</sup> Raught—the ancient preterite of to reach.

The wanton Edward, and the lusty George?
 And where's that valiant crook-back prodigy,
 Dicky your boy, that, with his grumbling voice,
 Was wont to cheer his dad in mutinies?
 Or, with the rest, where is your darling Rutland?
 Look, York; I stain'd this napkin with the blood
 That valiant Clifford, with his rapier's point,
 Made issue from the bosom of the boy:
 And, if thine eyes can water for his death,
 I give thee this to dry thy cheeks withal.
 Alas, poor York! but that I hate thee deadly,
 I should lament thy miserable state.
 I prithee, grieve, to make me merry, York.
 What, hath thy fiery heart so parch'd thine entrails,
 That not a tear can fall for Rutland's death?
 Why art thou patient, man? thou shouldst be mad;
 And I, to make thee mad, do mock thee thus.
 Stamp, rave, and fret, that I may sing and dance.<sup>3</sup>
 Thou wouldst be fee'd, I see, to make me sport;
 York cannot speak unless he wear a crown.
 A crown for York;—and, lords, bow low to him.
 Hold you his hands, whilst I do set it on.

[Putting a paper crown on his head.]

Ay, marry, sir, now looks he like a king!
 Ay, this is he that took king Henry's chair;
 And this is he was his adopted heir.
 But how is it that great Plantagenet
 Is crown'd so soon, and broke his solemn oath?
 As I bethink me, you should not be king
 Till our king Henry had shook hands with death.
 And will you pale<sup>4</sup> your head in Henry's glory,
 And rob his temples of the diadem,
 Now in his life, against your holy oath?
 O, 'tis a fault too, too unpardonable!
 Off with the crown; and, with the crown, his head;
 And, whilst we breathe, take time to do him dead.

Clif. That is my office, for my father's sake.

Q. Mar. Nay, stay; let's hear the orisons he makes.

York. She-wolf of France, but worse than wolves of France,

Whose tongue more poisons than the adder's tooth!
 How ill-beseeming is it in thy sex,
 To triumph, like an Amazonian trull,
 Upon their woes whom fortune captivates!
 But that thy face is, visor-like, unchanging,
 Made impudent with use of evil deeds,
 I would assay, proud queen, to make thee blush:
 To tell thee whence thou cam'st, of whom deriv'd,
 Were shame enough to shame thee, wert thou not shameless.

Thy father bears the type of king of Naples,
 Of both the Sicils and Jerusalem,
 Yet not so wealthy as an English yeoman.
 Hath that poor monarch taught thee to insult?
 It needs not, nor it boots thee not, proud queen;
 Unless the adage must be verified,
 That beggars, mounted, run their horse to death.
 'Tis beauty that doth oft make women proud;
 But God he knows thy share thereof is small:
 'Tis virtue that doth make them most admir'd;
 The contrary doth make thee wonder'd at:
 'Tis government that makes them seem divine;
 The want thereof makes thee abominable:
 Thou art as opposite to every good
 As the Antipodes are unto us,
 Or as the south to the septentrion.
 O, tiger's heart, wrapp'd in a woman's hide!
 How couldst thou drain the life-blood of the child,

<sup>3</sup> We place this line as in the folio. In the “True Tragedy” its position is after

“I prithee, grieve, to make me merry, York.”

<sup>4</sup> Pale—impale, encircle.

To bid the father wipe his eyes withal,
 And yet be seen to bear a woman's face?
 Women are soft, mild, pitiful, and flexible;
 Thou, stern, obdurate, flinty, rough, remorseless.
 Bid'st thou me rage? why, now thou hast thy wish:
 Wouldst have me weep? why, now thou hast thy will:
 For raging wind blows up incessant showers,
 And when the rage allays the rain begins.
 These tears are my sweet Rutland's obsequies;
 And every drop cries vengeance for his death,
 'Gainst thee, fell Clifford, and thee, false Frenchwoman.

North. Beshrew me, but his passions move me so
 That hardly can I check my eyes from tears.

York. That face of his the hungry cannibals
 Would not have touch'd, would not have stain'd with blood:

But you are more inhuman, more inexorable,
 O, ten times more, than tigers of Hyrcania.
 See, ruthless queen, a hapless father's tears:
 This cloth thou dipp'dst in blood of my sweet boy,
 And I with tears do wash the blood away.
 Keep thou the napkin, and go boast of this:

[He gives back the handkerchief.]

And, if thou tell'st the heavy story right,
 Upon my soul, the hearers will shed tears;
 Yea, even my foes will shed fast-falling tears,
 And say,—Alas, it was a piteous deed!—
 There, take the crown, and with the crown my curse;
 And in thy need such comfort come to thee
 As now I reap at thy too cruel hand!
 Hard-hearted Clifford, take me from the world;
 My soul to heaven, my blood upon your heads!

North. Had he been slaughter-man to all my kin,
 I should not for my life but weep with him,
 To see how inly sorrow gripes his soul.

Q. Mar. What, weeping-ripe, my lord Northumberland?
 Think but upon the wrong he did us all,
 And that will quickly dry thy melting tears.

Clif. Here's for my oath, here's for my father's death.

[Stabbing him.]

Q. Mar. And here's to right our gentle-hearted king.

[Stabbing him.]

York. Open thy gate of mercy, gracious God!
 My soul flies through these wounds to seek out thee.

[Dies.]

Q. Mar. Off with his head, and set it on York gates;
 So York may overlook the town of York. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Plain near Mortimer's Cross in Herefordshire.

Drums. Enter EDWARD and RICHARD, with their Forces, marching.

Edw. I wonder how our princely father 'scap'd;
 Or whether he be 'scap'd away, or no,
 From Clifford's and Northumberland's pursuit;
 Had he been ta'en, we should have heard the news;
 Had he been slain, we should have heard the news;
 Or, had he 'scap'd, methinks we should have heard
 The happy tidings of his good escape.
 How fares my brother? why is he so sad?

Rich. I cannot joy, until I be resolv'd
 Where our right valiant father is become.
 I saw him in the battle range about;
 And watch'd him, how he singled Clifford forth.

Methought, he bore him in the thickest troop
 As doth a lion in a herd of neat:
 Or as a bear, encompass'd round with dogs;
 Who having pinch'd a few, and made them cry,
 The rest stand all aloof, and bark at him.
 So far'd our father with his enemies;
 So fled his enemies my warlike father;
 Methinks, 'tis prize<sup>1</sup> enough to be his son.
 See how the morning opes her golden gates,
 And takes her farewell of the glorious sun!
 How well resembles it the prime of youth,
 Trimm'd like a younker, prancing to his love!

Edw. Dazzle mine eyes, or do I see three suns?

Rich. Three glorious suns, each one a perfect sun;
 Not separated with the racking clouds,
 But sever'd in a pale clear-shining sky.
 See, see! they join, embrace, and seem to kiss,
 As if they vow'd some league inviolable:
 Now are they but one lamp, one light, one sun.
 In this the heaven figures some event.

Edw. 'Tis wondrous strange, the like yet never heard of.
 I think it cites us, brother, to the field;
 That we, the sons of brave Plantagenet,
 Each one already blazing by our meeds,<sup>2</sup>
 Should, notwithstanding, join our lights together,
 And overshine the earth, as this the world.
 Whate'er it bodes, henceforward will I bear
 Upon my target three fair shining suns.

Rich. Nay, bear three daughters;—by your leave I speak it,
 You love the breeder better than the male.

Enter a Messenger.

But what art thou, whose heavy looks foretell
 Some dreadful story hanging on thy tongue?

Mess. Ah, one that was a woeful looker on,
 When as the noble duke of York was slain,
 Your princely father, and my loving lord.

Edw. O, speak no more! for I have heard too much.

Rich. Say how he died, for I will hear it all.

Mess. Environed he was with many foes;
 And stood against them, as the hope of Troy
 Against the Greeks that would have enter'd Troy.
 But Hercules himself must yield to odds;
 And many strokes, though with a little axe,
 Hew down and fell the hardest-timber'd oak.
 By many hands your father was subdued;
 But only slaughter'd by the ireful arm
 Of unrelenting Clifford and the queen:
 Who crown'd the gracious duke, in high despite;
 Laugh'd in his face; and, when with grief he wept,
 The ruthless queen gave him, to dry his cheeks,
 A napkin steeped in the harmless blood
 Of sweet young Rutland, by rough Clifford slain:
 And, after many scorns, many foul taunts,
 They took his head, and on the gates of York
 They set the same; and there it doth remain,
 The saddest spectacle that e'er I view'd.

Edw. Sweet duke of York, our prop to lean upon,
 Now thou art gone, we have no staff, no stay!
 O Clifford, boist'rous Clifford, thou hast slain
 The flower of Europe for his chivalry;
 And treacherously hast thou vanquish'd him,
 For, hand to hand, he would have vanquish'd thee!
 Now my soul's palace is become a prison:
 Ah, would she break from hence! that this my body
 Might in the ground be closed up in rest:
 For never henceforth shall I joy again,
 Never, O never, shall I see more joy.

<sup>1</sup> Prize. So the folio; the quartos, pride.

Meeds—merits.

Rich. I cannot weep; for all my body's moisture
Scarce serves to quench my furnace-burning heart:
Nor can my tongue unload my heart's great burthen;
For self-same wind, that I should speak withal,
Is kindling coals that fire all my breast,
And burn me up with flames that tears would quench.
To weep is to make less the depth of grief:
Tears, then, for babes; blows and revenge for me!—
Richard, I bear thy name, I'll venge thy death,
Or die renowned by attempting it.

Edw. His name that valiant duke hath left with thee;
His dukedom and his chair with me is left.

Rich. Nay, if thou be that princely eagle's bird,
Show thy descent by gazing 'gainst the sun:
For chair and dukedom, throne and kingdom say;
Either that is thine, or else thou wert not his.

March. Enter WARWICK and MONTAGUE, with Forces.

War. How now, fair lords? What fare? what news abroad?

Rich. Great lord of Warwick, if we should recount
Our baleful news, and at each word's deliverance
Stab poniards in our flesh till all were told,
The words would add more anguish than the wounds.
O valiant lord, the duke of York is slain.

Edw. O Warwick! Warwick! that Plantagenet
Which held thee dearly as his soul's redemption,
Is by the stern lord Clifford done to death.

War. Ten days ago I drown'd these news in tears:
And now, to add more measure to your woes,
I come to tell you things sith then befallen.
After the bloody fray at Wakefield fought,
Where your brave father breath'd his latest gasp,
Tidings, as swiftly as the post could run,
Were brought me of your loss, and his depart.
I then in London, keeper of the king,
Muster'd my soldiers, gather'd flocks of friends,
[And very well appointed, as I thought,<sup>1</sup>]
March'd towards Saint Alban's to intercept the queen,
Bearing the king in my behalf along:
For by my scouts I was advertised
That she was coming with a full intent
To dash our late decree in parliament,
Touching king Henry's oath and your succession.
Short tale to make,—we at Saint Alban's met,
Our battles join'd, and both sides fiercely fought:
But, whether 'twas the coldness of the king,
Who look'd full gently on his warlike queen,
That robb'd my soldiers of their heated spleen;
Or whether 'twas report of her success;
Or more than common fear of Clifford's rigour,
Who thunders to his captives—blood and death,
I cannot judge: but, to conclude with truth,
Their weapons like to lightning came and went;
Our soldiers—like the night-owl's lazy flight,
Or like a lazy thresher with a flail,—
Fell gently down, as if they struck their friends.
I cheer'd them up with justice of our cause,
With promise of high pay and great rewards:
But all in vain; they had no heart to fight,
And we, in them, no hope to win the day,
So that we fled: the king unto the queen;
Lord George your brother, Norfolk, and myself,
In haste, post-haste, are come to join with you;
For in the marches here, we heard, you were
Making another head to fight again.

Edw. Where is the duke of Norfolk, gentle Warwick?
And when came George from Burgundy to England?

War. Some six miles off the duke is with the soldiers:
And for your brother, he was lately sent
From your kind aunt, duchess of Burgundy,
With aid of soldiers to this needful war.

Rich. 'Twas odds, belike, when valiant Warwick fled:
Oft have I heard his praises in pursuit,
But ne'er, till now, his scandal of retire.

War. Nor now my scandal, Richard, dost thou hear:
For thou shalt know, this strong right hand of mine
Can pluck the diadem from faint Henry's head,
And wring the awful sceptre from his fist;
Were he as famous and as bold in war,
As he is fam'd for mildness, peace, and prayer.

Rich. I know it well, lord Warwick: blame me not;
'Tis love I bear thy glories makes me speak.
But, in this troublous time, what's to be done?
Shall we go throw away our coats of steel,
And wrap our bodies in black mourning gowns,
Numbering our Ave-Maries with our beads?
Or shall we on the helmets of our foes
Tell our devotion with revengeful arms?
If for the last, say,—Ay, and to it, lords.

War. Why, therefore Warwick came to seek you out;
And therefore comes my brother Montague.
Attend me, lords. The proud insulting queen,
With Clifford and the haught Northumberland,
And of their feather many more proud birds,
Have wrought the easy melting king like wax.
He swore consent to your succession,
His oath enrolled in the parliament;
And now to London all the crew are gone,
To frustrate both his oath, and what beside
May make against the house of Lancaster
Their power, I think, is thirty thousand strong:
Now, if the help of Norfolk, and myself,
With all the friends that thou, brave earl of March,
Amongst the loving Welshmen canst procure,
Will but amount to five and twenty thousand,
Why, Via! to London will we march amain;
And once again bestride our foaming steeds,
And once again cry—Charge upon our foes!
But never once again turn back and fly.

Rich. Ay, now, methinks, I hear great Warwick speak:
Ne'er may he live to see a sunshine day
That cries—Retire, if Warwick bid him stay.

Edw. Lord Warwick, on thy shoulder will I lean;
And when thou fail'st<sup>2</sup> (as God forbid the hour!)
Must Edward fall, which peril heaven forefend!

War. No longer earl of March, but duke of York;
The next degree is England's royal throne:
For king of England shalt thou be proclaim'd
In every borough as we pass along;
And he that throws not up his cap for joy
Shall for the fault make forfeit of his head.
King Edward, valiant Richard, Montague,
Stay we no longer dreaming of renown,
But sound the trumpets, and about our task.

Rich. Then, Clifford, were thy heart as hard as steel,
(As thou hast shown it flinty by thy deeds,)
I come to pierce it, or to give thee mine.

Edw. Then strike up, drums;—God, and Saint George,
for us!

Enter a Messenger.

War. How now? what news?

Mess. The duke of Norfolk sends you word by me,
The queen is coming with a puissant host;
And craves your company for speedy counsel.

War. Why then it sorts, brave warriors; Let's away.

[Exeunt.]

<sup>2</sup> Faill'st. So the folio; but it is sometimes printed fall'st. The quartos read faint'st.

SCENE II.—Before York.

Enter KING HENRY, QUEEN MARGARET, the PRINCE OF WALES, CLIFFORD, and NORTHUMBERLAND, with Forces.

Q. Mar. Welcome, my lord, to this brave town of York.

Yonder's the head of that arch-enemy
That sought to be encompass'd with your crown:
Doth not the object cheer your heart, my lord?

K. Hen. Ay, as the rocks cheer them that fear their wrack;—

To see this sight, it irks my very soul.
Withhold revenge, dear God! 'tis not my fault,
Nor wittingly have I infring'd my vow.

Clif. My gracious liege, this too much lenity
And harmful pity must be laid aside.
To whom do lions cast their gentle looks?
Not to the beast that would usurp their den.
Whose hand is that the forest bear doth lick?
Not his that spoils her young before her face.
Who 'scapes the lurking serpent's mortal sting?
Not he that sets his foot upon her back.

The smallest worm will turn being trodden on;
And doves will peck in safeguard of their brood.
Ambitious York did level at thy crown,
Thou smiling, while he knit his angry brows:
He, but a duke, would have his son a king,
And raise his issue, like a loving sire;
Thou, being a king, bless'd with a goodly son,
Didst yield consent to disinherit him,
Which argued thee a most unloving father.

Unreasonable creatures feed their young;
And though man's face be fearful to their eyes,
Yet, in protection of their tender ones,
Who hath not seen them (even with those wings
Which sometime they have used with fearful flight,)
Make war with him that climb'd unto their nest,
Offering their own lives in their youngs' defence?
For shame, my liege, make them your precedent!
Were it not pity that this goodly boy
Should lose his birthright by his father's fault;
And long hereafter say unto his child,—

“What my great-grandfather and grandsire got,
My careless father fondly gave away?”
Ah, what a shame were this! Look on the boy;
And let his manly face, which promiseth
Successful fortune, steel thy melting heart
To hold thine own, and leave thine own with him.

K. Hen. Full well hath Clifford play'd the orator,
Inferring arguments of mighty force.
But, Clifford, tell me, didst thou never hear
That things ill got had ever bad success?
And happy always was it for that son,
Whose father for his hoarding went to hell?
I'll leave my son my virtuous deeds behind;
And 'would my father had left me no more!
For all the rest is held at such a rate
As brings a thousand-fold more care to keep,
Than in possession any jot of pleasure.
Ah, cousin York! 'would thy best friends did know
How it doth grieve me that thy head is here!

Q. Mar. My lord, cheer up your spirits; our foes are nigh,

And this soft courage makes your followers faint.
You promis'd knighthood to our forward son;
Unsheathe your sword, and dub him presently.
Edward, kneel down.

K. Hen. Edward Plantagenet, arise a knight;
And learn this lesson,—Draw thy sword in right.

Prince. My gracious father, by your kingly leave,

I'll draw it as apparent to the crown,
And in that quarrel use it to the death.

Clif. Why, that is spoken like a toward prince.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Royal commanders, be in readiness:
For, with a band of thirty thousand men,
Comes Warwick backing of the duke of York;
And in the towns, as they do march along,
Proclaims him king, and many fly to him:
Darraign<sup>1</sup> your battle, for they are at hand.

Clif. I would your highness would depart the field;
The queen hath best success when you are absent.

Q. Mar. Ay, good my lord, and leave us to our fortune.

K. Hen. Why, that's my fortune too; therefore I'll stay.

North. Be it with resolution then to fight.

Prince. My royal father, cheer these noble lords,
And hearten those that fight in your defence:
Unsheathe your sword, good father; cry, “Saint George!”

March. Enter EDWARD, GEORGE, RICHARD, WARWICK, NORFOLK, MONTAGUE, and Soldiers.

Edw. Now, perjur'd Henry! wilt thou kneel for grace,
And set thy diadem upon my head;
Or bide the mortal fortune of the field?

Q. Mar. Go, rate thy minions, proud insulting boy!
Becomes it thee to be thus bold in terms,
Before thy sovereign, and thy lawful king?

Edw. I am his king, and he should bow his knee;
I was adopted heir by his consent:
Since when, his oath is broke; for, as I hear,
You, that are king though he do wear the crown,
Have caus'd him, by new act of parliament,
To blot out me and put his own son in.

Clif. And reason too;
Who should succeed the father but the son?

Rich. Are you there, butcher?—O, I cannot speak!

Clif. Ay, crook-back; here I stand, to answer thee,
Or any he the proudest of thy sort.

Rich. 'Twas you that kill'd young Rutland, was it not?

Clif. Ay, and old York, and yet not satisfied.

Rich. For God's sake, lords, give signal to the fight.

War. What say'st thou, Henry, wilt thou yield the crown?

Q. Mar. Why, how now, long-tongued Warwick! dare you speak?

When you and I met at Saint Alban's last,
Your legs did better service than your hands.

War. Then 'twas my turn to fly, and now 'tis thine.

Clif. You said so much before, and yet you fled.

War. 'Twas not your valour, Clifford, drove me thence.

North. No, nor your manhood that durst make you stay

Rich. Northumberland, I hold thee reverently;
Break off the parley; for scarce I can refrain
The execution of my big-swoln heart
Upon that Clifford, that cruel child-killer.

Clif. I slew thy father: Call'st thou him a child?

Rich. Ay, like a dastard, and a treacherous coward,
As thou didst kill our tender brother Rutland;
But, ere sunset, I'll make thee curse the deed.

K. Hen. Have done with words, my lords, and hear me speak.

Q. Mar. Defy them then, or else hold close thy lips.

K. Hen. I prithee, give no limits to my tongue;
I am a king, and privileg'd to speak.

<sup>1</sup> Darraign. It is curious that the elder quartos have a word which sounds more modern—prepare. To darraign is used by Chaucer:—

“Full prively two harnes hath he dight,
Both suffisant and mete to darreine
The bataille in the feld betwix hem tweine.”

Clif. My liege, the wound that bred this meeting here
Cannot be cur'd by words; therefore be still.

Rich. Then, executioner, unsheathe thy sword:
By him that made us all, I am resolv'd
That Clifford's manhood lies upon his tongue.

Edw. Say, Henry, shall I have my right or no?
A thousand men have broke their fasts to-day,
That ne'er shall dine unless thou yield the crown.

War. If thou deny, their blood upon thy head;
For York in justice puts his armour on.

Prince. If that be right which Warwick says is right,
There is no wrong, but everything is right.

Rich. Whoever got thee, there thy mother stands;
For, well I wot, thou hast thy mother's tongue.

Q. Mar. But thou art neither like thy sire nor dam;
But like a foul mis-shapen stigmatick,<sup>1</sup>
Mark'd by the destinies to be avoided,
As venom toads, or lizards' dreadful stings.

Rich. Iron of Naples, hid with English gilt,
Whose father bears the title of a king,
(As if a channel<sup>2</sup> should be call'd the sea,)
Sham'st thou not, knowing whence thou art extraught,
To let thy tongue detect thy base-born heart?

Edw. A wisp of straw<sup>3</sup> were worth a thousand crowns,
To make this shameless callet know herself.
Helen of Greece was fairer far than thou,
Although thy husband may be Menelaus;
And ne'er was Agamemnon's brother wrong'd
By that false woman as this king by thee.
His father revell'd in the heart of France,
And tam'd the king, and made the Dauphin stoop;
And had he match'd according to his state,
He might have kept that glory to this day:
But when he took a beggar to his bed,
And grac'd thy poor sire with his bridal day,
Even then that sunshine brew'd a shower for him,
That wash'd his father's fortunes forth of France,
But heap'd sedition on his crown at home.
For what hath broach'd this tumult but thy pride?
Hadst thou been meek, our title still had slept:
And we, in pity of the gentle king,
Had slipp'd our claim until another age.

Geo. But when we saw our sunshine made thy spring,
And that thy summer bred us no increase,
We set the axe to thy usurping root:
And though the edge hath something hit ourselves,
Yet, know thou, since we have begun to strike,
We'll never leave till we have hewn thee down,
Or bath'd thy growing with our heated bloods.

Edw. And, in this resolution, I defy thee;
Not willing any longer conference,
Since thou deny'st the gentle king to speak.
Sound trumpets!—let our bloody colours wave!—
And either victory, or else a grave.

Q. Mar. Stay, Edward.

Edw. No, wrangling woman; we'll no longer stay;
These words will cost ten thousand lives to-day. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Field of Battle between Towton and Saxton in Yorkshire.

Alarums: Excursions. Enter WARWICK.

War. Forspent<sup>4</sup> with toil, as runners with a race,
I lay me down a little while to breathe:
For strokes receiv'd, and many blows repaid,

<sup>3</sup> Wisp of straw. Capell conjectures that there is some allusion in this expression to the queen's alleged incontinency—to which the word callet also refers. It is similarly applied by Nashe in his "Apology of Pierce Penniless":—"A wisp, a wisp, you kitchen-stuff wrangler!"

"A wisp, a wisp, you kitchen-stuff wrangler!"

Have robb'd my strong-knit sinews of their strength,
And, spite of spite, needs must I rest awhile.

Enter EDWARD, running.

Edw. Smile, gentle heaven! or strike, ungentle death!
For this world frowns, and Edward's sun is clouded.

War. How now, my lord? what hap? what hope of good?

Enter GEORGE.

Geo. Our hap is loss, our hope but sad despair;
Our ranks are broke, and ruin follows us:
What counsel give you, whither shall we fly?

Edw. Bootless is flight; they follow us with wings:
And weak we are, and cannot shun pursuit.

Enter RICHARD.

Rich. Ah, Warwick, why hast thou withdrawn thyself?
Thy brother's blood the thirsty earth hath drunk,
Broach'd with the steely point of Clifford's lance:
And, in the very pangs of death, he cried,—
Like to a dismal clangour heard from far,—
"Warwick, revenge! brother, revenge my death!"
So underneath the belly of their steeds,
That stain'd their fetlocks in his smoking blood,
The noble gentleman gave up the ghost.

War. Then let the earth be drunken with our blood:
I'll kill my horse, because I will not fly.
Why stand we like soft-hearted women here,
Wailing our losses, whiles the foe doth rage;
And look upon, as if the tragedy
Were play'd in jest by counterfeiting actors?
Here on my knee I vow to God above,
I'll never pause again, never stand still,
Till either death hath closed these eyes of mine,
Or fortune given me measure of revenge.

Edw. O Warwick, I do bend my knee with thine;
And, in this vow, do chain my soul to thine;
And, ere my knee rise from the earth's cold face,
I throw my hands, mine eyes, my heart to thee,
Thou setter up and plucker down of kings!
Beseeching thee, if with thy will it stands
That to my foes this body must be prey,
Yet that thy brazen gates of heaven may ope,
And give sweet passage to my sinful soul!
Now, lords, take leave until we meet again,
Where'er it be, in heaven, or in earth.

Rich. Brother, give me thy hand;—and, gentle Warwick,
Let me embrace thee in my weary arms:
I, that did never weep, now melt with woe,
That winter should cut off our spring-time so.

War. Away, away! Once more, sweet lords, farewell.

Geo. Yet let us all together to our troops,
And give them leave to fly that will not stay;
And call them pillars that will stand to us;
And, if we thrive, promise them such rewards
As victors wear at the Olympian games:
This may plant courage in their quailing breasts;
For yet is hope of life and victory.

Fore-slow<sup>5</sup> no longer, make we hence amain. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The same. Another part of the Field.

Excursions. Enter RICHARD and CLIFFORD.

Rich. Now, Clifford, I have singled thee alone:
Suppose this arm is for the duke of York,

<sup>4</sup> Forspent. So the folio; the quartos, sore spent. In the same manner we have in King John forwearied—excessively wearied.

<sup>5</sup> Fore-slow—delay, loiter.

And this for Rutland ; both bound to revenge,
Wert thou environ'd with a brazen wall.

Clif. Now, Richard, I am with thee here alone :
This is the hand that stabb'd thy father York ;
And this the hand that slew thy brother Rutland ;
And here's the heart that triumphs in their death,
And cheers these hands that slew thy sire and brother,
To execute the like upon thyself ;
And so, have at thee.

[They fight. WARWICK enters ; CLIFFORD flies.]

Rich. Nay, Warwick, single out some other chase ;
For I myself will hunt this wolf to death. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—Another part of the Field.

Alarum. Enter KING HENRY.

K. Hen. This battle fares like to the morning's war,
When dying clouds contend with growing light ;
What time the shepherd, blowing of his nails,
Can neither call it perfect day nor night.
Now sways it this way, like a mighty sea,
Forc'd by the tide to combat with the wind ;
Now sways it that way, like the self-same sea
Forc'd to retire by fury of the wind :
Sometime, the flood prevails ; and then, the wind :
Now, one the better ; then, another best ;
Both tugging to be victors, breast to breast,
Yet neither conqueror, nor conquered :
So is the equal poise of this fell war.
Here on this molehill will I sit me down.
To whom God will, there be the victory !
For Margaret my queen, and Clifford too,
Have chid me from the battle ; swearing both
They prosper best of all when I am thence.
'Would I were dead ! if God's good will were so :
For what is in this world but grief and woe ?
O God ! methinks it were a happy life,
To be no better than a homely swain :
To sit upon a hill, as I do now,
To carve out dials quaintly, point by point,
Thereby to see the minutes, how they run :
How many make the hour full complete,
How many hours bring about the day,
How many days will finish up the year,
How many years a mortal man may live.
When this is known, then to divide the times :
So many hours must I tend my flock ;
So many hours must I take my rest ;
So many hours must I contemplate ;
So many hours must I sport myself ;
So many days my ewes have been with young ;
So many weeks ere the poor fools will yean ;
So many years ere I shall shear the fleece ;
So minutes, hours, days, months, and years,<sup>1</sup>
Pass'd over to the end they were created,
Would bring white hairs unto a quiet grave.
Ah, what a life were this ! how sweet ! how lovely !
Gives not the hawthorn bush a sweeter shade
To shepherds, looking on their silly sheep,
Than doth a rich embroider'd canopy
To kings, that fear their subjects' treachery ?
O, yes it doth ; a thousand-fold it doth.
And, to conclude,—the shepherd's homely curds,
His cold thin drink out of his leather bottle,
His wonted sleep under a fresh tree's shade,
All which secure and sweetly he enjoys,
Is far beyond a prince's delicates,

His viands sparkling in a golden cup,
His body couched in a curious bed,
When care, mistrust, and treason wait on him.

Alarum. Enter a Son that has killed his father, dragging in the dead body.

Son. Ill blows the wind that profits nobody.
This man, whom hand to hand I slew in fight,
May be possessed with some store of crowns ;
And I, that haply take them from him now,
May yet ere night yield both my life and them
To some man else, as this dead man doth me.
Who's this ?—O God ! it is my father's face,
Whom in this conflict I unwares have kill'd.
O heavy times, begetting such events !
From London by the king was I press'd forth ;
My father, being the earl of Warwick's man,
Came on the part of York, press'd by his master ;
And I, who at his hands receiv'd my life,
Have by my hands of life bereaved him.
Pardon me, God, I knew not what I did !
And pardon, father, for I knew not thee !
My tears shall wipe away these bloody marks ;
And no more words, till they have flow'd their fill.

K. Hen. O piteous spectacle ! O bloody times !
Whilst lions war, and battle for their dens,
Poor harmless lambs abide their enmity.
Weep, wretched man, I'll aid thee, tear for tear ;
And let our hearts, and eyes, like civil war,
Be blind with tears, and break o'ercharg'd with grief.

Enter a Father, who has killed his son, with the body in his arms.

Fath. Thou that so stoutly hast resisted me,
Give me thy gold, if thou hast any gold ;
For I have bought it with an hundred blows.
But let me see :—is this our foeman's face ?
Ah, no, no, no, it is mine only son !
Ah, boy, if any life be left in thee,
Throw up thine eye ; see, see, what showers arise,
Blown with the windy tempest of my heart,
Upon thy wounds, that kill mine eye and heart !
O, pity, God, this miserable age !
What stratagems,<sup>2</sup> how fell, how butcherly,
Erroneous, mutinous, and unnatural,
This deadly quarrel daily doth beget !
O boy, thy father gave thee life too soon,
And hath bereft thee of thy life too late !

K. Hen. Woe above woe ! grief more than common grief !
O, that my death would stay these ruthless deeds !
O pity, pity, gentle heaven, pity !
The red rose and the white are on his face,
The fatal colours of our striving houses :
The one, his purple blood right well resembles ;
The other, his pale cheeks, methinks, present :
Wither one rose, and let the other flourish !
If you contend, a thousand lives must wither.

Son. How will my mother, for a father's death,
Take on with me, and ne'er be satisfied !

Fath. How will my wife, for slaughter of my son,
Shed seas of tears, and ne'er be satisfied !

K. Hen. How will the country, for these woeful chances,
Misthink the king, and not be satisfied !

Son. Was ever son so rued a father's death ?

Fath. Was ever father so bemoan'd a son ?

<sup>1</sup> Rowe changed the line thus :—

"So minutes, hours, days, weeks, months, and years."

Stratagems. M. Mason has shown that stratagems here means disastrous events—not merely the events of war, its surprises and snares.

K. Hen. Was ever king so griev'd for subjects' woe?
Much is your sorrow; mine, ten times so much.

Son. I'll bear thee hence, where I may weep my fill.

[Exit, with the body.]

Fath. These arms of mine shall be thy winding-sheet;
My heart, sweet boy, shall be thy sepulchre;
For from my heart thine image ne'er shall go.
My sighing breast shall be thy funeral bell;
And so obsequious<sup>1</sup> will thy father be,
Sad<sup>2</sup> for the loss of thee, having no more,
As Priam was for all his valiant sons.
I'll bear thee hence; and let them fight that will,
For I have murder'd where I should not kill.

[Exit, with the body.]

K. Hen. Sad-hearted men, much overgone with care,
Here sits a king more woeful than you are.

Alarums: Excursions Enter QUEEN MARGARET, PRINCE OF WALES, and EXETER.

Prince. Fly, father, fly! for all your friends are fled,
And Warwick rages like a chafed bull:
Away! for death doth hold us in pursuit.

Q. Mar. Mount you, my lord; towards Berwick post again:

Edward and Richard, like a brace of greyhounds
Having the fearful flying hare in sight,
With fiery eyes, sparkling for very wrath,
And bloody steel grasp'd in their ireful hands,
Are at our backs; and therefore hence again.

Exe. Away; for vengeance comes along with them:
Nay, stay not to expostulate, make speed;
Or else come after, I'll away before.

K. Hen. Nay, take me with thee, good sweet Exeter;
Not that I fear to stay, but love to go
Whither the queen intends. Forward; away! [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—The same.

A loud Alarum. Enter CLIFFORD, wounded.

Clif. Here burns my candle out, ay, here it dies,
Which, whiles it lasted, gave king Henry light.
O, Lancaster! I fear thy overthrow,
More than my body's parting with my soul.
My love and fear glued many friends to thee:
And, now I fall, thy tough commixtures melt.
Impairing Henry, strength'ning mis-proud York,
[The common people swarm like summer flies:<sup>3</sup>
And whither fly the gnats but to the sun?
And who shines now but Henry's enemies?
O Phœbus! hadst thou never given consent
That Phaëton should check thy fiery steeds,
Thy burning car never had scorched the earth:
And Henry, hadst thou sway'd as kings should do,
Or as thy father, and his father, did,
Giving no ground unto the house of York,
They never then had sprung like summer flies;
I, and ten thousand in this luckless realm,
Had left no mourning widows for our death,
And thou this day hadst kept thy chair in peace.
For what doth cherish weeds, but gentle air?
And what makes robbers bold, but too much lenity?
Bootless are plaints, and cureless are my wounds:
No way to fly, nor strength to hold out flight;
The foe is merciless, and will not pity;
For at their hands I have deserv'd no pity.
The air hath got into my deadly wounds,

<sup>1</sup> Obsequious—performing obsequies.

<sup>2</sup> Sad. This word was given by Rowe instead of Men in the folio.

And much effuse of blood doth make me faint:
Come, York, and Richard, Warwick, and the rest;
I stabb'd your fathers' bosoms, split my breast. [He faints.]

Alarum and Retreat. Enter EDWARD, GEORGE, RICHARD, MONTAGUE, WARWICK, and Soldiers.

Edw. Now breathe we, lords; good fortune bids us
pause,

And smooth the frowns of war with peaceful looks.
Some troops pursue the bloody-minded queen,
That led calm Henry, though he were a king,
As doth a sail, fill'd with a fretting gust,
Command an argosy to stem the waves.
But think you, lords, that Clifford fled with them?

War. No, 'tis impossible he should escape:
For, though before his face I speak the words,
Your brother Richard mark'd him for the grave:
And, wheresoe'er he is, he's surely dead.

[CLIFFORD groans, and dies.]

Edw. Whose soul is that which takes her heavy leave?

Rich. A deadly groan, like life and death's departing.

Edw. See who it is: and, now the battle's ended,
If friend, or foe, let him be gently used.

Rich. Revoke that doom of mercy, for 'tis Clifford;
Who, not contented that he lopp'd the branch
In hewing Rutland when his leaves put forth,
But set his murdering knife unto the root
From whence that tender spray did sweetly spring,—
I mean, our princely father, duke of York.

War. From off the gates of York fetch down the head,
Your father's head, which Clifford placed there:
Instead whereof let this supply the room;
Measure for measure must be answered.

Edw. Bring forth that fatal screech-owl to our house,
That nothing sung but death to us and ours:
Now death shall stop his dismal threatening sound,
And his ill-boding tongue no more shall speak.

[Attendants bring the body forward.]

War. I think his understanding is bereft:—
Speak, Clifford, dost thou know who speaks to thee?—
Dark cloudy death o'ershades his beams of life,
And he nor sees, nor hears us what we say.

Rich. O, would he did! and so, perhaps, he doth;
'Tis but his policy to counterfeit,
Because he would avoid such bitter taunts
Which in the time of death he gave our father.

Geo. If so thou think'st, vex him with eager<sup>4</sup> words.

Rich. Clifford, ask mercy, and obtain no grace.

Edw. Clifford, repent in bootless penitence.

War. Clifford, devise excuses for thy faults.

Geo. While we devise fell tortures for thy faults.

Rich. Thou didst love York, and I am son to York.

Edw. Thou pitied'st Rutland, I will pity thee.

Geo. Where's captain Margaret, to fence you now?

War. They mock thee, Clifford! swear as thou wast wont.

Rich. What, not an oath? nay, then the world goes hard

When Clifford cannot spare his friends an oath:
I know by that he's dead: And, by my soul,
If this right hand would buy two hours' life,
That I in all despite might rail at him,
This hand should chop it off; and with the issuing blood
Stifle the villain, whose unstanched thirst
York and young Rutland could not satisfy.

War. Ay, but he's dead: Off with the traitor's head,
And rear it in the place your father's stands.
And now to London with triumphant march,

There to be crowned England's royal king.
 From whence shall Warwick cut the sea to France
 And ask the lady Bona for thy queen :
 So shalt thou sinew both these lands together ;
 And, having France thy friend, thou shalt not dread
 The scatter'd foe, that hopes to rise again ;
 For though they cannot greatly sting to hurt,
 Yet look to have them buzz, to offend thine ears.
 First, will I see the coronation ;
 And then to Brittany I'll cross the sea,
 To effect this marriage, so it please my lord.

Edw. Even as thou wilt, sweet Warwick, let it be :
 For in thy shoulder do I build my seat ;
 And never will I undertake the thing
 Wherein thy counsel and consent is wanting.
 Richard, I will create thee duke of Gloster ;
 And George, of Clarence ; Warwick, as ourself,
 Shall do, and undo, as him pleaseth best.

Rich. Let me be duke of Clarence ; George, of Gloster ;
 For Gloster's dukedom is too ominous.

War. Tut, that's a foolish observation ;
 Richard, be duke of Gloster. Now to London,
 To see these honours in possession. [Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Chase in the North of England.

Enter Two Keepers, with cross-bows in their hands.

1 Keeper. Under this thick-grown brake we'll shroud ourselves ;

For through this laund<sup>1</sup> anon the deer will come ;
 And in this covert will we make our stand,
 Culling the principal of all the deer.

2 Keeper. I'll stay above the hill, so both may shoot.

1 Keeper. That cannot be ; the noise of thy cross-bow
 Will scare the herd, and so my shoot is lost.

Here stand we both, and aim we at the best :

And, for the time shall not seem tedious,

I'll tell thee what befell me on a day,

In this self-place where now we mean to stand.

2 Keeper. Here comes a man, let's stay till he be past.

Enter KING HENRY, disguised, with a prayer-book.

K. Hen. From Scotland am I stol'n, even of pure love,
 To greet mine own land with my wishful sight.

No, Harry, Harry, 'tis no land of thine ;

Thy place is fill'd, thy sceptre wrung from thee,

Thy balm wash'd off, wherewith thou wast anointed :

No bending knee will call thee Cæsar now,

No humble suitors press to speak for right,

No, not a man comes for redress of thee ;

For how can I help them, and not myself ?

1 Keeper. Ay, here's a deer whose skin's a keeper's fee :
 This is the quondam king ; let's seize upon him.

K. Hen. Let me embrace these sour adversities :<sup>2</sup>
 For wise men say it is the wisest course.

2 Keeper. Why linger we ? let us lay hands upon him.

1 Keeper. Forbear awhile ; we'll hear a little more.

K. Hen. My queen and son are gone to France for aid ;
 And, as I hear, the great commanding Warwick
 Is thither gone, to crave the French king's sister
 To wife for Edward : If this news be true,
 Poor queen and son, your labour is but lost ;
 For Warwick is a subtle orator,

And Lewis a prince soon won with moving words.
 By this account, then, Margaret may win him ;
 For she's a woman to be pitied much :
 Her sighs will make a battery in his breast ;
 Her tears will pierce into a marble heart ;
 The tiger will be mild while she doth mourn ;
 And Nero will be tainted with remorse,
 To hear, and see, her plaints, her brinish tears.

Ay, but she's come to beg ; Warwick, to give :

She, on his left side, craving aid for Henry ;

He, on his right, asking a wife for Edward.

She weeps, and says—her Henry is depos'd ;

He smiles, and says—his Edward is install'd ;

That she, poor wretch, for grief can speak no more :

Whiles Warwick tells his title, smooths the wrong,

Inferreth arguments of mighty strength ;

And, in conclusion, wins the king from her,

With promise of his sister, and what else,

To strengthen and support king Edward's place.

O Margaret, thus 'twill be ; and thou, poor soul,

Art then forsaken, as thou went'st forlorn.

2 Keeper. Say, what art thou that talk'st of kings and queens ?

K. Hen. More than I seem, and less than I was born to :
 A man at least, for less I should not be ;

And men may talk of kings, and why not I ?

2 Keeper. Ay, but thou talk'st as if thou wert a king.

K. Hen. Why, so I am, in mind ; and that's enough.

1 Keeper. But if thou be a king, where is thy crown ?

K. Hen. My crown is in my heart, not on my head ;

Not deck'd with diamonds and Indian stones,

Nor to be seen ; my crown is call'd content ;

A crown it is that seldom kings enjoy.

2 Keeper. Well, if you be a king crown'd with content,

Your crown content and you must be contented

To go along with us : for, as we think,

You are the king king Edward hath depos'd ;

And we his subjects, sworn in all allegiance,

Will apprehend you as his enemy.

K. Hen. But did you never swear and break an oath

2 Keeper. No, never such an oath ; nor will not now.

K. Hen. Where did you dwell when I was king of England ?

2 Keeper. Here in this country where we now remain.

K. Hen. I was anointed king at nine months old ;

My father, and my grandfather, were kings ;

And you were sworn true subjects unto me :

And, tell me then, have you not broke your oaths ?

1 Keeper. No ;

For we were subjects but while you were king.

K. Hen. Why, am I dead ? do I not breathe a man ?

Ah, simple men, you know not what you swear.

Look, as I blow this feather from my face,

And as the air blows it to me again,

Obeying with my wind when I do blow,

And yielding to another when it blows,

Commanded always by the greater gust ;

Such is the lightness of you common men.

But do not break your oaths ; for, of that sin

My mild entreaty shall not make you guilty.

Go where you will, the king shall be commanded ;

And be you kings ; command, and I'll obey.

1 Keeper. We are true subjects to the king, king Edward.

K. Hen. So would you be again to Henry,

If he were seated as king Edward is.

1 Keeper. We charge you, in God's name, and in the king's,

To go with us unto the officers.

K. Hen. In God's name, lead ; your king's name be obey'd :

And what God will that<sup>1</sup> let your king perform ;
And what he will I humbly yield unto. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—London. A Room in the Palace.

Enter KING EDWARD, GLOSTER, CLARENCE, and LADY GREY.

K. Edw. Brother of Gloster, at Saint Alban's field
This lady's husband, sir John Grey, was slain,
His lands then seiz'd on by the conqueror :
Her suit is now, to repossess those lands ;
Which we in justice cannot well deny,
Because in quarrel of the house of York
The worthy gentleman did lose his life.

Glo. Your highness shall do well to grant her suit ;
It were dishonour to deny it her.

K. Edw. It were no less ; but yet I'll make a pause.

Glo. Yea ! is it so ?

I see the lady hath a thing to grant,
Before the king will grant her humble suit.

Clar. He knows the game : How true he keeps the wind ! [Aside.]

Glo. Silence ! [Aside.]

K. Edw. Widow, we will consider of your suit ;
And come some other time, to know our mind.

L. Grey. Right gracious lord, I cannot brook delay :
May it please your highness to resolve me now ;
And what your pleasure is shall satisfy me.

Glo. [Aside.] Ay, widow ? then I'll warrant you all your lands,

An if what pleases him shall pleasure you.
Fight closer, or, good faith, you'll catch a blow.

Clar. I fear her not unless she chance to fall. [Aside.]

Glo. God forbid that ! for he'll take vantages. [Aside.]

K. Edw. How many children hast thou, widow ? tell me.

Clar. I think, he means to beg a child of her. [Aside.]

Glo. Nay, whip me then ; he'll rather give her two. [Aside.]

L. Grey. Three, my most gracious lord.

Glo. You shall have four, if you'll be rul'd by him. [Aside.]

K. Edw. 'Twere pity they should lose their father's lands.

L. Grey. Be pitiful, dread lord, and grant it then.

K. Edw. Lords, give us leave : I'll try this widow's wit.

Glo. Ay, good leave have you ; for you will have leave
Till youth take leave, and leave you to the crutch.

[GLOSTER and CLARENCE retire to the other side.]

K. Edw. Now tell me, madam, do you love your children ?

L. Grey. Ay, full as dearly as I love myself.

K. Edw. And would you not do much to do them good ?

L. Grey. To do them good I would sustain some harm.

K. Edw. Then get your husband's lands, to do them
good.

L. Grey. Therefore I came unto your majesty.

K. Edw. I'll tell you how these lands are to be got.

L. Grey. So shall you bind me to your highness' service.

K. Edw. What service wilt thou do me, if I give them ?

L. Grey. What you command that rests in me to do.

K. Edw. But you will take exceptions to my boon.

L. Grey. No, gracious lord, except I cannot do it.

K. Edw. Ay, but thou canst do what I mean to ask.

L. Grey. Why, then I will do what your grace commands.

Glo. He plies her hard ; and much rain wears the marble. [Aside.]

Clar. As red as fire ! nay, then her wax must melt.

[Aside.]

L. Grey. Why stops my lord ? shall I not hear my task ?

K. Edw. An easy task ; 'tis but to love a king.

L. Grey. That's soon perform'd, because I am a subject.

K. Edw. Why then, thy husband's lands I freely give thee.

L. Grey. I take my leave with many thousand thanks.

Glo. The match is made ; she seals it with a curtsy.

K. Edw. But stay thee, 'tis the fruits of love I mean.

L. Grey. The fruits of love I mean, my loving liege.

K. Edw. Ay, but I fear me, in another sense.

What love think'st thou I sue so much to get ?

L. Grey. My love till death, my humble thanks, my prayers ;

That love which virtue begs and virtue grants.

K. Edw. No, by my troth, I did not mean such love.

L. Grey. Why, then you mean not as I thought you did.

K. Edw. But now you partly may perceive my mind.

L. Grey. My mind will never grant what I perceive
Your highness aims at, if I aim aright.

K. Edw. To tell thee plain, I aim to lie with thee.

L. Grey. To tell you plain, I had rather lie in prison.

K. Edw. Why, then thou shalt not have thy husband's lands.

L. Grey. Why, then mine honesty shall be my dower ;
For by that loss I will not purchase them.

K. Edw. Therein thou wrong'st thy children mightily.

L. Grey. Herein your highness wrongs both them and me.

But, mighty lord, this merry inclination
Accords not with the sadness<sup>2</sup> of my suit ;
Please you dismiss me, either with ay or no.

K. Edw. Ay, if thou wilt say ay to my request :

No, if thou dost say no to my demand.

L. Grey. Then, no, my lord. My suit is at an end.

Glo. The widow likes him not, she knits her brows. [Aside.]

Clar. He is the bluntest wooer in Christendom. [Aside.]

K. Edw. [Aside.] Her looks do argue her replete with modesty ;

Her words do show her wit incomparable.

All her perfections challenge sovereignty :

One way, or other, she is for a king ;

And she shall be my love, or else my queen.

Say, that king Edward take thee for his queen

L. Grey. 'Tis better said than done, my gracious lord :

I am a subject fit to jest withal,

But far unfit to be a sovereign.

K. Edw. Sweet widow, by my state I swear to thee,

I speak no more than what my soul intends ;

And that is, to enjoy thee for my love.

L. Grey. And that is more than I will yield unto :

I know I am too mean to be your queen :

And yet too good to be your concubine.

K. Edw. You cavil, widow ; I did mean my queen.

L. Grey. 'Twill grieve your grace my son should call you father.

K. Edw. No more than when my<sup>3</sup> daughters call thee mother.

Thou art a widow, and thou hast some children :

And, by God's mother, I, being but a bachelor,

Have other some : why, 'tis a happy thing

To be the father unto many sons.

Answer no more, for thou shalt be my queen.

Glo. The ghostly father now hath done his shrift. [Aside.]

Clar. When he was made a shriver, 'twas for shift. [Aside.]

K. Edw. Brothers, you muse what chat we two have had.

Glo. The widow likes it not, for she looks very sad.

K. Edw. You'd think it strange if I should marry her.

Clar. To whom, my lord?

K. Edw. Why, Clarence, to myself.

Glo. That would be ten days' wonder, at the least.

Clar. That's a day longer than a wonder lasts.

Glo. By so much is the wonder in extremes.

K. Edw. Well, jest on, brothers: I can tell you both
Her suit is granted for her husband's lands.

Enter a Nobleman.

Nob. My gracious lord, Henry your foe is taken,
And brought your prisoner to your palace gate.

K. Edw. See that he be convey'd unto the Tower:
And go we, brothers, to the man that took him,
To question of his apprehension.

Widow, go you along;—Lords, use her honourably.

[Excunt KING EDWARD, LADY GREY, CLARENCE, and Lord.]

Glo. Ay, Edward will use women honourably,
'Would he were wasted, marrow, bones, and all,
That from his loins no hopeful branch may spring,
To cross me from the golden time I look for!

And yet, between my soul's desire and me,
(The lustful Edward's title buried,)

Is Clarence, Henry, and his son young Edward,
And all the unlook'd-for issue of their bodies,
To take their rooms, ere I can place myself:

A cold premeditation for my purpose!

Why, then I do but dream on sovereignty;

Like one that stands upon a promontory,

And spies a far-off shore where he would tread,

Wishing his foot were equal with his eye;

And chides the sea that sunders him from thence,

Saying, he'll lade it dry to have his way:

So do I wish the crown, being so far off;

And so I chide the means that keep me from it:

And so I say, I'll cut the causes off,
Flattering me with impossibilities.

My eye's too quick, my heart o'erweens too much,

Unless my hand and strength could equal them.

Well, say there is no kingdom then for Richard;

What other pleasure can the world afford?

I'll make my heaven in a lady's lap,

And deck my body in gay ornaments,

And witch sweet ladies with my words and looks.

O miserable thought! and more unlikely

Than to accomplish twenty golden crowns!

Why, love forswore me in my mother's womb:

And, for I should not deal in her soft laws,

She did corrupt frail nature with some bribe

To shrink mine arm up like a wither'd shrub;

To make an envious mountain on my back,

Where sits deformity to mock my body;

To shape my legs of an unequal size;

To disproportion me in every part,

Like to a chaos, or an unlick'd bear-whelp,

That carries no impression like the dam.

And am I then a man to be belov'd?

O, monstrous fault, to harbour such a thought!

Then, since this earth affords no joy to me

But to command, to check, to o'erbear such

As are of better person than myself,

I'll make my heaven to dream upon the crown;

And, whiles I live, to account this world but hell,

Until my mis-shaped trunk, that bears this head,

Be round impaled with a glorious crown.

And yet I know not how to get the crown,

For many lives stand between me and home;

And I,—like one lost in a thorny wood,

That rents the thorns, and is rent with the thorns,

Seeking a way, and straying from the way;

Not knowing how to find the open air,

But toiling desperately to find it out,—

Torment myself to catch the English crown:

And from that torment I will free myself,

Or hew my way out with a bloody axe.

Why, I can smile, and murder whiles I smile:

And cry, content, to that which grieves my heart;

And wet my cheeks with artificial tears,

And frame my face to all occasions.

I'll drown more sailors than the mermaid shall;

I'll slay more gazers than the basilisk;

I'll play the orator as well as Nestor;

Deceive more slyly than Ulysses could;

And, like a Sinon, take another Troy:

I can add colours to the chameleon;

Change shapes with Proteus, for advantages,

And set the murderous Machiavel to school.

Can I do this, and cannot get a crown?

Tut! were it further off, I'll pluck it down.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—France. A Room in the Palace.

Flourish. Enter LEWIS the French King, and LADY BONA, attended; the KING takes his state. Then enter QUEEN
MARGARET, PRINCE EDWARD her son, and the EARL OF OXFORD.

K. Lew. Fair queen of England, worthy Margaret, [Rising.]

Sit down with us; it ill befits thy state

And birth that thou shouldst stand, while Lewis doth sit.

Q. Mar. No, mighty king of France; now Margaret

Must strike her sail, and learn awhile to serve,

Where kings command. I was, I must confess,

Great Albion's queen in former golden days:

But now mischance hath trod my title down,

And with dishonour laid me on the ground;

Where I must take like seat unto my fortune,

And to my humble seat conform myself.

K. Lew. Why, say, fair queen, whence springs this deep despair?

Q. Mar. From such a cause as fills mine eyes with tears,

And stops my tongue, while heart is drown'd in cares.

K. Lew. Whate'er it be, be thou still like thyself,

And sit thee by our side: yield not thy neck

[Seats her by him.]

To fortune's yoke, but let thy dauntless mind

Still ride in triumph over all mischance.

Be plain, queen Margaret, and tell thy grief;

It shall be eas'd if France can yield relief.

Q. Mar. Those gracious words revive my drooping thoughts,

And give my tongue-tied sorrows leave to speak.

Now, therefore, be it known to noble Lewis,

That Henry, sole possessor of my love,

Is, of a king, become a banish'd man,

And forc'd to live in Scotland a forlorn;

While proud ambitious Edward, duke of York,

Usurps the regal title, and the seat

Of England's true-anointed lawful king.

This is the cause, that I, poor Margaret,

With this my son, prince Edward, Henry's heir,

Am come to crave thy just and lawful aid;

And if thou fail us all our hope is done:

Scotland hath will to help, but cannot help;

Our people and our peers are both misled,

Our treasure seiz'd, our soldiers put to flight,

And, as thou seest, ourselves in heavy plight.

K. Lew. Renowned queen, with patience calm the storm,
While we bethink a means to break it off.

Q. Mar. The more we stay the stronger grows our foe.

K. Lew. The more I stay the more I'll succour thee.

Q. Mar. O, but impatience waiteth on true sorrow :
And see, where comes the breeder of my sorrow.

Enter WARWICK, attended.

K. Lew. What's he approacheth boldly to our presence ?

Q. Mar. Our earl of Warwick, Edward's greatest friend.

K. Lew. Welcome, brave Warwick ! What brings thee to France ?

[Descending from his state. QUEEN MARGARET rises.]

Q. Mar. Ay, now begins a second storm to rise ;
For this is he that moves both wind and tide.

War. From worthy Edward, king of Albion,
My lord and sovereign, and thy vowed friend,
I come, in kindness and unfeigned love,
First, to do greetings to thy royal person ;

And then to crave a league of amity :
And, lastly, to confirm that amity
With nuptial knot, if thou vouchsafe to grant
That virtuous lady Bona, thy fair sister,
To England's king in lawful marriage.

Q. Mar. If that go forward Henry's hope is done.

War. And, gracious madam, [to BONA] in our king's behalf,

I am commanded, with your leave and favour,
Humbly to kiss your hand, and with my tongue
To tell the passion of my sovereign's heart ;
Where fame, late entering at his heedful ears,
Hath plac'd thy beauty's image, and thy virtue.

Q. Mar. King Lewis, and lady Bona, hear me speak,
Before you answer Warwick. His demand
Springs not from Edward's well-meant honest love,
But from deceit, bred by necessity ;
For how can tyrants safely govern home,
Unless abroad they purchase great alliance ?
To prove him tyrant, this reason may suffice,
That Henry liveth still : but were he dead,
Yet here prince Edward stands, king Henry's son.
Look therefore, Lewis, that by this league and marriage
Thou draw not on thy danger and dishonour :
For though usurpers sway the rule awhile,
Yet heavens are just, and time suppresseth wrongs.

War. Injurious Margaret !

Prince. And why not queen ?

War. Because thy father Henry did usurp ;
And thou no more art prince than she is queen.

Oxf. Then Warwick disannuls great John of Gaunt,
Which did subdue the greatest part of Spain ;
And, after John of Gaunt, Henry the Fourth,
Whose wisdom was a mirror to the wisest ;
And, after that wise prince, Henry the Fifth,
Who by his prowess conquered all France :
From these our Henry lineally descends.

War. Oxford, how haps it in this smooth discourse
You told not, how Henry the Sixth hath lost
All that which Henry the Fifth had gotten ?
Methinks, these peers of France should smile at that.
But for the rest, you tell a pedigree
Of threescore and two years ; a silly time
To make prescription for a kingdom's worth.

Oxf. Why, Warwick, canst thou speak against thy liege,

Whom thou obey'dst thirty and six years,
And not bewray thy treason with a blush ?

War. Can Oxford, that did ever fence the right,

Now buckler falsehood with a pedigree ?
For shame ! leave Henry and call Edward king.

Oxf. Call him my king, by whose injurious doom
My elder brother, the lord Aubrey Vere,
Was done to death and more than so, my father,
Even in the downfall of his mellow'd years,
When nature brought him to the door of death ?
No, Warwick, no ; while life upholds this arm,
This arm upholds the house of Lancaster.

War. And I the house of York.

K. Lew. Queen Margaret, prince Edward, and Oxford,
Vouchsafe at our request to stand aside,
While I use further conference with Warwick.

Q. Mar. Heaven grant that Warwick's words bewitch him not !

[Retiring with the PRINCE and OXFORD.]

K. Lew. Now, Warwick, tell me, even upon thy conscience,

Is Edward your true king ? for I were loath
To link with him that were not lawful chosen.

War. Thereon I pawn my credit and mine honour.

K. Lew. But is he gracious in the people's eye ?

War. The more, that Henry was unfortunate.

K. Lew. Then further, all dissembling set aside,
Tell me for truth the measure of his love
Unto our sister Bona.

War. Such it seems

As may beseem a monarch like himself.
Myself have often heard him say, and swear,
That this his love was an eternal plant,
Whereof the root was fix'd in virtue's ground,
The leaves and fruit maintain'd with beauty's sun ;
Exempt from envy, but not from disdain,
Unless the lady Bona quit his pain.

K. Lew. Now, sister, let us hear your firm resolve.

Bona. Your grant, or your denial, shall be mine :—
Yet I confess, [to WAR.] that often ere this day,
When I have heard your king's desert recounted,
Mine ear hath tempted judgment to desire.

K. Lew. Then, Warwick, thus,—Our sister shall be Edward's ;

And now forthwith shall articles be drawn
Touching the jointure that your king must make,
Which with her dowry shall be counterpois'd :
Draw near, queen Margaret, and be a witness
That Bona shall be wife to the English king.

Prince. To Edward, but not to the English king.

Q. Mar. Deceitful Warwick ! it was thy device
By this alliance to make void my suit ;
Before thy coming Lewis was Henry's friend.

K. Lew. And still is friend to him and Margaret :
But if your title to the crown be weak,
As may appear by Edward's good success,
Then 'tis but reason that I be releas'd
From giving aid, which late I promised.
Yet shall you have all kindness at my hand
That your estate requires, and mine can yield.

War. Henry now lives in Scotland, at his ease ;
Where, having nothing, nothing he can lose.
And as for you yourself, our quondam queen,
You have a father able to maintain you ;
And better 'twere you troubled him than France.

Q. Mar. Peace, impudent and shameless Warwick, peace ;
Proud setter-up and puller-down of kings !
I will not hence till with my talk and tears,
Both full of truth, I make king Lewis behold
Thy sly conveyance,<sup>1</sup> and thy lord's false love ;
For both of you are birds of self-same feather.

[A horn sounded within.]

K. Lew. Warwick, this is some post to us, or thee.

<sup>1</sup> Conveyance—juggling, artifice.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My lord ambassador, these letters are for you ;
Sent from your brother, marquis Montague ;—
These from our king unto your majesty ;—
And, madam, these for you ; from whom—I know not.

[To MARGARET. They all read their letters.

Oxf. I like it well, that our fair queen and mistress
Smiles at her news, while Warwick frowns at his.

Prince. Nay, mark, how Lewis stamps as he were nettled :

I hope all's for the best.

K. Lew. Warwick, what are thy news ? and yours, fair queen ?

Q. Mar. Mine such as fill my heart with unhop'd joys.

War. Mine full of sorrow and heart's discontent.

K. Lew. What ! has your king married the lady Grey ?

And now, to soothe your forgery and his,
Sends me a paper to persuade me patience ?
Is this the alliance that he seeks with France ?
Dare he presume to scorn us in this manner ?

Q. Mar. I told your majesty as much before :
This proveth Edward's love and Warwick's honesty.

War. King Lewis, I here protest, in sight of heaven,
And by the hope I have of heavenly bliss,
That I am clear from this misdeed of Edward's ;
No more my king, for he dishonours me ;
But most himself, if he could see his shame.
Did I forget, that by the house of York
My father came untimely to his death ?
Did I let pass the abuse done to my niece ?
Did I impale him with the regal crown ?
Did I put Henry from his native right ;
And am I guerdon'd at the last with shame ?
Shame on himself : for my desert is honour.
And to repair my honour lost for him,
I here renounce him, and return to Henry :
My noble queen, let former grudges pass,
And henceforth I am thy true servitor ;
I will revenge his wrong to lady Bona,
And replant Henry in his former state.

Q. Mar. Warwick, these words have turn'd my hate to love ;

And I forgive and quite forget old faults,
And joy that thou becom'st king Henry's friend.

War. So much his friend, ay, his unfeigned friend,
That if king Lewis vouchsafe to furnish us
With some few bands of chosen soldiers,
I'll undertake to land them on our coast,
And force the tyrant from his seat by war.
'Tis not his new-made bride shall succour him :
And as for Clarence, as my letters tell me,
He's very likely now to fall from him ;
For matching more for wanton lust than honour,
Or than for strength and safety of our country.

Bona. Dear brother, how shall Bona be reveng'd,
But by thy help to this distressed queen ?

Q. Mar. Renowned prince, how shall poor Henry live,
Unless thou rescue him from foul despair ?

Bona. My quarrel and this English queen's are one.

War. And mine, fair lady Bona, joins with yours.

K. Lew. And mine with hers, and thine, and Margaret's.
Therefore, at last, I firmly am resolv'd,
You shall have aid.

Q. Mar. Let me give humble thanks for all at once.

K. Lew. Then England's messenger, return in post ;
And tell false Edward, thy supposed king,
That Lewis of France is sending over maskers,
To revel it with him and his new bride :
Thou seest what's past, go fear<sup>1</sup> thy king withal.

Bona. Tell him, in hope he'll prove a widower shortly,
I'll wear the willow garland for his sake.

Q. Mar. Tell him, my mourning weeds are laid aside,
And I am ready to put armour on.

War. Tell him from me, that he hath done me wrong ;
And therefore I'll uncrown him, ere 't be long.

There's thy reward ; be gone. [Exit Mess.

K. Lew. But, Warwick, thou,

And Oxford, with five thousand men,
Shall cross the seas, and bid false Edward battle :
And, as occasion serves, this noble queen
And prince shall follow with a fresh supply.

Yet, ere thou go, but answer me one doubt ;

What pledge have we of thy firm loyalty ?

War. This shall assure my constant loyalty :

That if our queen and this young prince agree,

I'll join mine eldest daughter and my joy

To him forthwith in holy wedlock bands.

Q. Mar. Yes, I agree, and thank you for your motion :

Son Edward, she is fair and virtuous,

Therefore delay not, give thy hand to Warwick ;

And, with thy hand, thy faith irrevocable,

That only Warwick's daughter shall be thine.

Prince. Yes, I accept her, for she well deserves it ;

And here, to pledge my vow, I give my hand.

[He gives his hand to WARWICK.

K. Lew. Why stay we now ? These soldiers shall be levied,

And thou, lord Bourbon, our high admiral,

Shall waft them over with our royal fleet.

I long till Edward fall by war's mischance,

For mocking marriage with a dame of France.

[Exeunt all but WARWICK.

War. I came from Edward as ambassador,
But I return his sworn and mortal foe :
Matter of marriage was the charge he gave me,
But dreadful war shall answer his demand.
Had he none else to make a stale<sup>2</sup> but me ?
Then none but I shall turn his jest to sorrow.
I was the chief that rais'd him to the crown,
And I'll be chief to bring him down again :
Not that I pity Henry's misery,
But seek revenge on Edward's mockery. [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—London. A Room in the Palace.

Enter GLOSTER, CLARENCE, SOMERSET, MONTAGUE, and others.

Glo. Now tell me, brother Clarence, what think you
Of this new marriage with the lady Grey ?
Hath not our brother made a worthy choice ?

Clar. Alas, you know, 'tis far from hence to France ;
How could he stay till Warwick made return ?

Som. My lords, forbear this talk ; here comes the king.

Flourish. Enter KING EDWARD, attended ; LADY GREY, as Queen ; PEMBROKE, STAFFORD, HASTINGS, and others.

Glo. And his well-chosen bride.

Clar. I mind to tell him plainly what I think.

K. Edw. Now, brother of Clarence, how like you our choice,
That you stand pensive, as half malcontent ?

<sup>2</sup> Stale—stalking-horse, as in The Comedy of Errors—

“ Poor I am but his stale.”

Clar. As well as Lewis of France, or the earl of Warwick:

Which are so weak of courage and in judgment,
That they'll take no offence at our abuse.

K. Edw. Suppose they take offence without a cause,
They are but Lewis and Warwick; I am Edward,
Your king and Warwick's, and must have my will.

Glo. And you<sup>1</sup> shall have your will, because our king;
Yet hasty marriage seldom proveth well.

K. Edw. Yea, brother Richard, are you offended too?

Glo. Not I:

No; God forbid that I should wish them sever'd
Whom God hath join'd together: ay, and 'twere pity
To sunder them that yoke so well together.

K. Edw. Setting your scorns and your mislike aside,
Tell me some reason, why the lady Grey
Should not become my wife, and England's queen:
And you too, Somerset and Montague,
Speak freely what you think.

Clar. Then this is mine opinion, that king Lewis
Becomes your enemy, for mocking him
About the marriage of the lady Bona.

Glo. And Warwick, doing what you gave in charge,
Is now dishonoured by this new marriage.

K. Edw. What, if both Lewis and Warwick be appeas'd
By such invention as I can devise?

Mont. Yet, to have join'd with France in such alliance,
Would more have strengthen'd this our commonwealth
'Gainst foreign storms, than any home-bred marriage.

Hast. Why, knows not Montague that of itself
England is safe, if true within itself?

Mont. Yes, but the safer when it is back'd with France.

Hast. 'Tis better using France than trusting France:

Let us be back'd with God, and with the seas,
Which he hath given for fence impregnable,
And with their helps only defend ourselves;
In them, and in ourselves, our safety lies.

Clar. For this one speech, lord Hastings well deserves
To have the heir of the lord Hungerford.

K. Edw. Ay, what of that? it was my will and grant;
And, for this once, my will shall stand for law.

Glo. And yet, methinks your grace hath not done well
To give the heir and daughter of lord Scales
Unto the brother of your loving bride;
She better would have fitted me, or Clarence:
But in your bride you bury brotherhood.

Clar. Or else you would not have bestow'd the heir
Of the lord Bonville on your new wife's son,
And leave your brothers to go speed elsewhere.

K. Edw. Alas, poor Clarence! is it for a wife
That thou art malcontent? I will provide thee.

Clar. In choosing for yourself you show'd your judgment;

Which being shallow, you shall give me leave
To play the broker in mine own behalf;
And, to that end, I shortly mind to leave you.

K. Edw. Leave me, or tarry, Edward will be king,
And not be tied unto his brother's will.

Q. Eliz. My lords, before it pleas'd his majesty
To raise my state to title of a queen,
Do me but right, and you must all confess
That I was not ignoble of descent,
And meaner than myself have had like fortune.
But as this title honours me and mine,
So your dislikes, to whom I would be pleasing,
Do cloud my joys with danger and with sorrow.

K. Edw. My love, forbear to fawn upon their frowns:
What danger or what sorrow can befall thee,
So long as Edward is thy constant friend,
And their true sovereign, whom they must obey?

<sup>1</sup> You is not in the original; added by Rowe.

Nay, whom they shall obey, and love thee too,
Unless they seek for hatred at my hands:
Which if they do, yet will I keep thee safe,
And they shall feel the vengeance of my wrath.

Glo. I hear, yet say not much, but think the more.

[Aside.]

Enter a Messenger.

K. Edw. Now, messenger, what letters or what news
From France?

Mess. My sovereign liege, no letters; and few words,
But such as I, without your special pardon,
Dare not relate.

K. Edw. Go to, we pardon thee: therefore, in brief,
Tell me their words as near as thou canst guess them.
What answer makes king Lewis unto our letters?

Mess. At my depart, these were his very words
"Go tell false Edward, the supposed king,
That Lewis of France is sending over maskers
To revel it with him and his new bride."

K. Edw. Is Lewis so brave? belike, he thinks me Henry.
But what said lady Bona to my marriage?

Mess. These were her words, utter'd with mild disdain:
"Tell him, in hope he'll prove a widower shortly,
I'll wear the willow garland for his sake."

K. Edw. I blame not her, she could say little less;
She had the wrong. But what said Henry's queen?
For I have heard that she was there in place.<sup>2</sup>

Mess. "Tell him," quoth she, "my mourning weeds are done,

And I am ready to put armour on."

K. Edw. Belike, she minds to play the Amazon.
But what said Warwick to these injuries?

Mess. He, more incens'd against your majesty
Than all the rest, discharg'd me with these words:
"Tell him from me, that he hath done me wrong,
And therefore I'll uncrown him, ere 't be long."

K. Edw. Ha! durst the traitor breathe out so proud words?

Well, I will arm me, being thus forewarn'd:
They shall have wars, and pay for their presumption.
But say, is Warwick friends with Margaret?

Mess. Ay, gracious sovereign; they are so link'd in friendship

That young prince Edward marries Warwick's daughter.

Clar. Belike, the elder; Clarence will have the younger.
Now, brother king, farewell, and sit you fast,
For I will hence to Warwick's other daughter;
That, though I want a kingdom, yet in marriage
I may not prove inferior to yourself.
You that love me and Warwick follow me.

[Exit CLARENCE, and SOMERSET follows.]

Glo. Not I.

My thoughts aim at a further matter; I
Stay not for love of Edward, but the crown. [Aside.]

K. Edw. Clarence and Somerset both gone to Warwick!
Yet am I arm'd against the worst can happen;
And haste is needful in this desperate case.
Pembroke, and Stafford, you in our behalf
Go levy men, and make prepare for war.
They are already, or quickly will be landed:
Myself in person will straight follow you.

[Exeunt PEMBROKE and STAFFORD.]

But, ere I go, Hastings, and Montague,
Resolve my doubt. You twain, of all the rest,
Are near to Warwick by blood, and by alliance:
Tell me if you love Warwick more than me?

<sup>2</sup> In place—there present, a common form of expression amongst our old writers.
The same expression occurs in the sixth scene of this act:—

"Yet in this one thing let me blame your grace.
For choosing me when Clarence is in place."

If it be so, then both depart to him;
I rather wish you foes than hollow friends;
But if you mind to hold your true obedience,
Give me assurance with some friendly vow,
That I may never have you in suspect.

Mont. So God help Montague, as he proves true!

Hast. And Hastings, as he favours Edward's cause!

K. Edw. Now, brother Richard, will you stand by us?

Glo. Ay, in despite of all that shall withstand you.

K. Edw. Why so; then am I sure of victory.

Now therefore let us hence; and lose no hour,
Till we meet Warwick with his foreign power. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Plain in Warwickshire.

Enter WARWICK and OXFORD, with French and other Forces.

War. Trust me, my lord, all hitherto goes well;
The common people by numbers swarm to us.

Enter CLARENCE and SOMERSET.

But, see, where Somerset and Clarence come;
Speak suddenly, my lords, are we all friends?

Clar. Fear not that, my lord.

War. Then, gentle Clarence, welcome unto Warwick;
And welcome, Somerset: I hold it cowardice
To rest mistrustful where a noble heart
Hath pawn'd an open hand in sign of love;
Else might I think that Clarence, Edward's brother,
Were but a feigned friend to our proceedings:
But welcome, sweet Clarence; my daughter shall be thine.
And now what rests, but, in night's coverture,
Thy brother being carelessly encamp'd,
His soldiers lurking in the towns about,
And but attended by a simple guard,
We may surprise and take him at our pleasure?
Our scouts have found the adventure very easy:
That as Ulysses, and stout Diomedes,
With slight and manhood stole to Rhesus' tents,
And brought from thence the Thracian fatal steeds;
So we, well cover'd with the night's black mantle,
At unawares may beat down Edward's guard,
And seize himself: I say not, slaughter him,
For I intend but only to surprise him.
You that will follow me to this attempt
Applaud the name of Henry, with your leader.

[They all cry Henry.]

Why, then, let's on our way in silent sort:
For Warwick and his friends, God and Saint George!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Edward's Camp near Warwick.

Enter certain Watchmen, to guard the KING'S tent.

1 Watch. Come on, my masters, each man take his stand;

The king, by this, is set him down to sleep.

Watch. What, will he not to bed?

1 Watch. Why, no: for he hath made a solemn vow
Never to lie and take his natural rest
Till Warwick, or himself, be quite suppress'd.

2 Watch. To-morrow then, belike, shall be the day,
If Warwick be so near as men report.

3 Watch. But say, I pray, what nobleman is that
That with the king here resteth in his tent?

1 Watch. 'Tis the lord Hastings, the king's chiefest friend.

3 Watch. O, is it so? But why commands the king
That his chief followers lodge in towns about him,
While he himself keeps in the cold field?

Watch. 'Tis the more honour, because more dangerous.

3 Watch. Ay; but give me worship, and quietness,
I like it better than a dangerous honour.

If Warwick knew in what estate he stands,
'Tis to be doubted he would waken him.

1 Watch. Unless our halberds did shut up his passage.

2 Watch. Ay; wherefore else guard we his royal tent,
But to defend his person from night-foes?

Enter WARWICK, CLARENCE, OXFORD, SOMERSET, and Forces.

War. This is his tent; and see, where stands his guard.
Courage, my masters: honour now, or never!
But follow me, and Edward shall be ours.

1 Watch. Who goes there?

2 Watch. Stay, or thou diest.

[WARWICK, and the rest, cry all—“Warwick! Warwick!” and set upon the Guard; who fly, crying—“Arm! Arm!” WARWICK, and the rest, following them.]

The drum beating, and trumpets sounding, re-enter WARWICK, and the rest, bringing the KING out in a gown, sitting in a chair: GLOSTER and HASTINGS fly.

Som.

What are they that fly there?

War. Richard and Hastings: let them go, here's the duke.

K. Edw. The duke! why, Warwick, when we parted last,
Thou call'dst me king.

War.

Ay, but the case is altered:

When you disgrac'd me in my ambassade,
Then I degraded you from being king,
And come now to create you duke of York.
Alas! how should you govern any kingdom,
That know not how to use ambassadors;
Nor how to be contented with one wife;
Nor how to use your brothers brotherly;
Nor how to study for the people's welfare;
Nor how to shroud yourself from enemies?

K. Edw. Yea, brother of Clarence, art thou here too?
Nay, then I see that Edward needs must down.

Yet, Warwick, in despite of all mischance,
Of thee thyself, and all thy complices,
Edward will always bear himself as king:
Though fortune's malice overthrow my state,
My mind exceeds the compass of her wheel.

War. Then, for his mind, be Edward England's king:

[Takes off his crown.]

But Henry now shall wear the English crown,
And be true king indeed; thou but the shadow.

My lord of Somerset, at my request,
See that forthwith duke Edward be convey'd
Unto my brother, archbishop of York.
When I have fought with Pembroke and his fellows,
I'll follow you, and tell what answer
Lewis, and the lady Bona, send to him:
Now, for awhile, farewell, good duke of York.

K. Edw. What fates impose that men must needs abide;
It boots not to resist both wind and tide.

[Exit KING EDWARD, led out; SOMERSET with him.]

Oxf. What now remains, my lords, for us to do,
But march to London with our soldiers?

War. Ay, that's the first thing that we have to do;
To free king Henry from imprisonment,
And see him seated in the regal throne. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—London. A Room in the Palace.

Enter QUEEN ELIZABETH and RIVERS.

Riv. Madam, what makes you in this sudden change?

Q. Eliz. Why, brother Rivers, are you yet to learn
What late misfortune is befall'n king Edward?

Riv. What, loss of some pitch'd battle against Warwick?

Q. Eliz. No, but the loss of his own royal person.

Riv. Then is my sovereign slain?

Q. Eliz. Ay, almost slain, for he is taken prisoner;
Either betray'd by falsehood of his guard,
Or by his foe surpris'd at unawares:
And, as I further have to understand,
Is new committed to the bishop of York,
Fell Warwick's brother, and by that our foe.

Riv. These news, I must confess, are full of grief:
Yet, gracious madam, bear it as you may;
Warwick may lose, that now hath won the day.

Q. Eliz. Till then, fair hope must hinder life's decay
And I the rather wean me from despair,
For love of Edward's offspring in my womb:
This is it that makes me bridle passion,
And bear with mildness my misfortune's cross;
Ay, ay, for this I draw in many a tear,
And stop the rising of blood-sucking sighs,
Lest with my sighs or tears I blast or drown
King Edward's fruit, true heir to the English crown.

Riv. But, madam, where is Warwick then become?

Q. Eliz. I am informed that he comes towards London,
To set the crown once more on Henry's head:
Guess thou the rest; king Edward's friends must down,
But, to prevent the tyrant's violence,
(For trust not him that hath once broken faith),
I'll hence forthwith unto the sanctuary,
To save at least the heir of Edward's right;
There shall I rest secure from force and fraud.
Come therefore, let us fly, while we may fly;
If Warwick take us we are sure to die. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Park near Middleham Castle in Yorkshire.

Enter GLOSTER, HASTINGS, SIR WILLIAM STANLEY, and others.

Glo. Now, my lord Hastings, and sir William Stanley,
Leave off to wonder why I drew you hither,
Into this chiefest thicket of the park.
Thus stands the case: You know our king, my brother,
Is prisoner to the bishop here, at whose hands
He hath good usage and great liberty;
And often, but attended with weak guard,
Comes hunting this way to disport himself.
I have advertis'd him by secret means,
That if, about this hour, he make this way,
Under the colour of his usual game,
He shall here find his friends, with horse and men,
To set him free from his captivity.

Enter KING EDWARD, and a Huntsman.

Hunt. This way, my lord; for this way lies the game.

K. Edw. Nay, this way, man; see where the huntsmen stand.

Now, brother of Gloster, lord Hastings, and the rest,
Stand you thus close to steal the bishop's deer?

Glo. Brother, the time and case requireth haste;
Your horse stands ready at the park corner.

K. Edw. But whither shall we then?

Hast. To Lynn, my lord; and ship from thence to Flanders.

Glo. Well guess'd, believe me; for that was my meaning.

K. Edw. Stanley, I will requite thy forwardness.

Glo. But wherefore stay we? 'tis no time to talk.

K. Edw. Huntsman, what say'st thou? wilt thou go along?

Hunt. Better do so than tarry and be hang'd.

Glo. Come then, away; let's have no more ado.

K. Edw. Bishop, farewell: shield thee from Warwick's frown;
And pray that I may repossess the crown. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—A Room in the Tower.

Enter KING HENRY, CLARENCE, WARWICK, SOMERSET, young RICHMOND, OXFORD, MONTAGUE, Lieutenant of the Tower, and Attendants.

K. Hen. Master lieutenant, now that God and friends
Have shaken Edward from the regal seat,
And turn'd my captive state to liberty,
My fear to hope, my sorrows unto joys,
At our enlargement what are thy due fees?

Lieu. Subjects may challenge nothing of their sovereigns;
But, if an humble prayer may prevail,
I then crave pardon of your majesty.

K. Hen. For what, lieutenant? for well using me?
Nay, be thou sure, I'll well requite thy kindness,
For that it made my imprisonment a pleasure:
Ay, such a pleasure as incaged birds
Conceive, when, after many moody thoughts,
At last, by notes of household harmony,
They quite forget their loss of liberty.
But, Warwick, after God, thou sett'st me free,
And chiefly therefore I thank God and thee;
He was the author, thou the instrument.
Therefore, that I may conquer fortune's spite,
By living low where fortune cannot hurt me;
And that the people of this blessed land
May not be punish'd with my thwarting stars;
Warwick, although my head still wear the crown,
I here resign my government to thee,
For thou art fortunate in all thy deeds.

War. Your grace hath still been fam'd for virtuous;
And now may seem as wise as virtuous,
By spying and avoiding fortune's malice,
For few men rightly temper with the stars:
Yet in this one thing let me blame your grace,
For choosing me, when Clarence is in place.

Clar. No, Warwick, thou art worthy of the sway,
To whom the heavens, in thy nativity,
Adjudg'd an olive-branch, and laurel crown,
As likely to be blest in peace, and war;
And therefore I yield thee my free consent.

War. And I choose Clarence only for protector.

K. Hen. Warwick and Clarence, give me both your hands;
Now join your hands, and with your hands your hearts,
That no dissension hinder government:
I make you both protectors of this land;
While I myself will lead a private life,
And in devotion spend my latter days,
To sin's rebuke, and my Creator's praise.

War. What answers Clarence to his sovereign's will?

Clar. That he consents, if Warwick yield consent;
For on thy fortune I repose myself.

War. Why then, though loath, yet must I be content:
We'll yoke together, like a double shadow
To Henry's body, and supply his place;
I mean, in bearing weight of government,
While he enjoys the honour, and his ease.
And, Clarence, now then it is more than needful,
Forthwith that Edward be pronounc'd a traitor,
And all his lands and goods be confiscate.

Clar. What else? and that succession be determin'd.

War. Ay, therein Clarence shall not want his part.

K. Hen. But, with the first of all your chief affairs,

Let me entreat, (for I command no more,) That Margaret your queen, and my son Edward, Be sent for, to return from France with speed : For, till I see them here, by doubtful fear My joy of liberty is half eclips'd.

Clar. It shall be done, my sovereign, with all speed.

K. Hen. My lord of Somerset, what youth is that, Of whom you seem to have so tender care ?

Som. My liege, it is young Henry, earl of Richmond.

K. Hen. Come hither, England's hope : If secret powers [Lays his hand on his head.]

Suggest but truth to my divining thoughts,
This pretty lad will prove our country's bliss.
His looks are full of peaceful majesty,
His head by nature fram'd to wear a crown,
His hand to wield a sceptre ; and himself
Likely, in time, to bless a regal throne.
Make much of him, my lords ; for this is he Must help you more than you are hurt by me.

Enter a Messenger.

War. What news, my friend ?

Mess. That Edward is escaped from your brother,
And fled, as he hears since, to Burgundy.

War. Unsavoury news : But how made he escape ?

Mess. He was convey'd by Richard duke of Gloster,
And the lord Hastings, who attended him<sup>1</sup>

In secret ambush on the forest side,
And from the bishop's huntsmen rescued him ;
For hunting was his daily exercise.

War. My brother was too careless of his charge.
But let us hence, my sovereign, to provide
A salve for any sore that may betide.

[Exeunt KING HENRY, WAR., CLAR., Lieut.,
and Attendants.]

Som. My lord, I like not of this flight of Edward's :
For doubtless Burgundy will yield him help ;
And we shall have more wars before 't be long.
As Henry's late presaging prophecy
Did glad my heart, with hope of this young Richmond ;
So doth my heart misgive me, in these conflicts
What may befall him, to his harm and ours :
Therefore, lord Oxford, to prevent the worst,
Forthwith we'll send him hence to Brittany,
Till storms be past of civil enmity.

Oxf. Ay ; for if Edward repossess the crown,
'Tis like that Richmond with the rest shall down.

Som. It shall be so ; he shall to Brittany.
Come, therefore, let's about it speedily. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.—Before York.

Enter KING EDWARD, GLOSTER, HASTINGS, and Forces.

K. Edw. Now, brother Richard, lord Hastings, and the rest,

Yet thus far fortune maketh us amends,
And says, that once more I shall interchange
My waned state for Henry's regal crown.
Well have we pass'd, and now repass'd the seas,
And brought desired help from Burgundy :
What then remains, we being thus arriv'd
From Ravenspurgh haven before the gates of York,
But that we enter as into our dukedom ?

Glo. The gates made fast !—Brother, I like not this ;

For many men that stumble at the threshold
Are well foretold that danger lurks within.

K. Edw. Tush, man ! abodements must not now affright us :

By fair or foul means we must enter in,
For hither will our friends repair to us.

Hast. My liege, I'll knock once more to summon them.

Enter on the walls the Mayor of York, and his brethren.

May. My lords, we were forewarned of your coming,
And shut the gates for safety of ourselves ;
For now we owe allegiance unto Henry.

K. Edw. But, master mayor, if Henry be your king,
Yet Edward, at the least, is duke of York.

May. True, my good lord ; I know you for no less.

K. Edw. Why, and I challenge nothing but my dukedom,
As being well content with that alone.

Glo. But when the fox hath once got in his nose,
He'll soon find means to make the body follow. [Aside.]

Hast. Why, master mayor, why stand you in a doubt ?
Open the gates, we are king Henry's friends.

May. Ay, say you so ? the gates shall then be open'd.
[Exeunt from above.]

Glo. A wise stout captain, and soon persuaded !<sup>2</sup>

Hast. The good old man would fain that all were well,
So 'twere not 'long of him : but, being enter'd,
I doubt not, I, but we shall soon persuade
Both him and all his brothers unto reason.

Re-enter the Mayor, and Two Aldermen, below.

K. Edw. So, master mayor : these gates must not be shut,

But in the night, or in the time of war.
What ! fear not, man, but yield me up the keys ;
[Takes his keys.]

For Edward will defend the town, and thee,
And all those friends that deign to follow me.

Drum. Enter MONTGOMERY, and Forces, marching.

Glo. Brother, this is sir John Montgomery,
Our trusty friend, unless I be deceiv'd.

K. Edw. Welcome, sir John ! But why come you in arms ?

Mont. To help king Edward in his time of storm,
As every loyal subject ought to do.

K. Edw. Thanks, good Montgomery : But we now forget
Our title to the crown ; and only claim
Our dukedom, till God please to send the rest.

Mont. Then fare you well, for I will hence again :
I came to serve a king, and not a duke.
Drummer, strike up, and let us march away.

[A march begun.]

K. Edw. Nay, stay, sir John, awhile ; and we'll debate
By what safe means the crown may be recover'd.

Mont. What talk you of debating ? in few words,
If you'll not here proclaim yourself our king,
I'll leave you to your fortune ; and be gone,
To keep them back that come to succour you :
Why should we fight if you pretend no title ?

Glo. Why, brother, wherefore stand you on nice points ?

K. Edw. When we grow stronger, then we'll make our claim :

Till then, 'tis wisdom to conceal our meaning.

Hast. Away with scrupulous wit ! now arms must rule.

Glo. And fearless minds climb soonest unto crowns.

<sup>1</sup> Attended him—waited for him.
The line stands in some modern editions—

"A wise stout captain, and persuaded soon."

Hanmer made the transposition, which Steevens says "requires no apology." It is scarcely necessary to point out that the ruggedness of the original line has a peculiar propriety when uttered with the solemn irony of Richard. Shakspeare, as well as every real dramatic poet, varies his metre not only with the expression of passion, but according to the character of the speaker.

Brother, we will proclaim you out of hand;
The bruit<sup>1</sup> thereof will bring you many friends.

K. Edw. Then be it as you will: For 'tis my right,
And Henry but usurps the diadem.

Mont. Ay, now my sovereign speaketh like himself;
And now will I be Edward's champion.

Hast. Sound trumpet; Edward shall be here proclaim'd:
Come, fellow-soldier, make thou proclamation.

[Gives him a paper. Flourish.]

Sol. [Reads.] "Edward the Fourth, by the grace of God, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland," &c.

Mont. And whosoe'er gainsays king Edward's right,
By this I challenge him to single fight.

[Throws down his gauntlet.]

All. Long live Edward the Fourth!

K. Edw. Thanks, brave Montgomery;—and thanks unto you all.

If fortune serve me I'll requite this kindness.
Now, for this night, let's harbour here in York:
And, when the morning sun shall raise his car
Above the border of this horizon,
We'll forward towards Warwick, and his mates;
For, well I wot that Henry is no soldier.
Ah, froward Clarence!—how evil it beseems thee
To flatter Henry, and forsake thy brother!
Yet, as we may, we'll meet both thee and Warwick.
Come on, brave soldiers; doubt not of the day;
And that once gotten doubt not of large pay. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VIII.—London. A Room in the Palace.

Enter KING HENRY, WARWICK, CLARENCE, MONTAGUE, EXETER, and OXFORD.

War. What counsel, lords? Edward from Belgia,
With hasty Germans, and blunt Hollanders,
Hath pass'd in safety through the narrow seas,
And with his troops doth march amain to London;
And many giddy people flock to him.

Oxf. Let's levy men, and beat him back again.

Clar. A little fire is quickly trodden out;
Which, being suffer'd, rivers cannot quench.

War. In Warwickshire I have true-hearted friends,
Not mutinous in peace, yet bold in war;
Those will I muster up: and thou, son Clarence,
Shalt stir up<sup>2</sup> in Suffolk, Norfolk, and in Kent,
The knights and gentlemen to come with thee:
Thou, brother Montague, in Buckingham,
Northampton, and in Leicestershire, shalt find
Men well inclin'd to hear what thou command'st:
And thou, brave Oxford, wondrous well belov'd,
In Oxfordshire shalt muster up thy friends.
My sovereign, with the loving citizens,
Like to his island girt in with the ocean,
Or modest Dian circled with her nymphs,
Shall rest in London, till we come to him.
Fair lords, take leave, and stand not to reply.
Farewell, my sovereign.

K. Hen. Farewell, my Hector, and my Troy's true hope.

Clar. In sign of truth I kiss your highness' hand.

K. Hen. Well-minded Clarence, be thou fortunate.

Mont. Comfort, my lord;—and so I take my leave.

Oxf. And thus [kissing HENRY'S hand] I seal my truth, and bid adieu.

K. Hen. Sweet Oxford, and my loving Montague,
And all at once, once more a happy farewell.

War. Farewell, sweet lords; let's meet at Coventry.

[Exeunt WAR., CLAR., OXF., and MONT.]

K. Hen. Here at the palace will I rest awhile.
Cousin of Exeter, what thinks your lordship?
Methinks the power that Edward hath in field
Should not be able to encounter mine.

Exc. The doubt is that he will seduce the rest.

K. Hen. That's not my fear, my meed hath got me fame.
I have not stopp'd mine ears to their demands,
Nor posted off their suits with slow delays;
My pity hath been balm to heal their wounds,
My mildness hath allay'd their swelling griefs,
My mercy dried their water-flowing tears:
I have not been desirous of their wealth,
Nor much oppress'd them with great subsidies,
Nor forward of revenge, though they much err'd;
Then why should they love Edward more than me?
No, Exeter, these graces challenge grace:
And when the lion fawns upon the lamb
The lamb will never cease to follow him.

[Shout within, "A Lancaster! a Lancaster!"]

Exc. Hark, hark, my lord! what shouts are these?

Enter KING EDWARD, GLOSTER, and Soldiers.

K. Edw. Seize on the shame-fac'd Henry, bear him
hence,

And once again proclaim us king of England.
You are the fount that makes small brooks to flow;
Now stops thy spring; my sea shall suck them dry,
And swell so much the higher by their ebb.
Hence with him to the Tower; let him not speak.

[Exeunt some with KING HENRY.]

And, lords, towards Coventry bend we our course,
Where peremptory Warwick now remains:
The sun shines hot, and if we use delay,
Cold-biting winter mars our hop'd-for hay.

Glo. Away betimes, before his forces join,
And take the great-grown traitor unawares:
Brave warriors, march amain towards Coventry. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Coventry.

Enter, upon the walls, WARWICK, the Mayor of Coventry, two Messengers, and others.

War. Where is the post that came from valiant Oxford?
How far hence is thy lord, mine honest fellow?

1 Mess. By this at Dunsmore, marching hitherward.

War. How far off is our brother Montague?
Where is the post that came from Montague?

2 Mess. By this at Daintry, with a puissant troop.

Enter SIR JOHN SOMERVILLE.

War. Say, Somerville, what says my loving son?
And by thy guess, how nigh is Clarence now?

Som. At Southam I did leave him with his forces,
And do expect him here some two hours hence.

[Drum heard.]

War. Then Clarence is at hand, I hear his drum.

Som. It is not his, my lord; here Southam lies;
The drum your honour hears marcheth from Warwick.

War. Who should that be? belike, unlook'd-for friends.

Som. They are at hand, and you shall quickly know.

Drums. Enter KING EDWARD, GLOSTER, and Forces, marching.

K. Edw. Go, trumpet, to the walls, and sound a parle.

<sup>1</sup> Bruit—report. Thus, in the authorised translation of the Bible (Jeremiah x. 22):—

"Behold the noise of the bruit is come."

9 D

Glo. See, how the surly Warwick mans the wall.

War. O, unbid spite! is sportful Edward come?
Where slept our scouts, or how are they seduc'd,
That we could hear no news of his repair?

K. Edw. Now, Warwick, wilt thou ope the city gates,— Speak gentle words, and humbly bend thy knee,—
Call Edward king, and at his hands beg mercy,—
And he shall pardon thee these outrages?

War. Nay, rather, wilt thou draw thy forces hence,— Confess who set thee up and pluck'd thee down,—
Call Warwick patron, and be penitent,—
And thou shalt still remain the duke of York?

Glo. I thought, at least, he would have said the king;
Or did he make the jest against his will?

War. Is not a dukedom, sir, a goodly gift?

Glo. Ay, by my faith, for a poor earl to give;
I'll do thee service for so good a gift.

War. 'Twas I that gave the kingdom to thy brother.

K. Edw. Why then 'tis mine, if but by Warwick's gift.

War. Thou art no Atlas for so great a weight:
And, weakling, Warwick takes his gift again;
And Henry is my king, Warwick his subject.

K. Edw. But Warwick's king is Edward's prisoner:
And, gallant Warwick, do but answer this,
What is the body when the head is off?

Glo. Alas, that Warwick had no more forecast,
But whiles he thought to steal the single ten,
The king was slyly finger'd from the deck!<sup>1</sup>
You left poor Henry at the bishop's palace,
And, ten to one, you'll meet him in the Tower.

K. Edw. 'Tis even so; yet you are Warwick still.

Glo. Come, Warwick, take the time, kneel down, kneel down:

Nay, when? strike now, or else the iron cools.

War. I had rather chop this hand off at a blow,
And with the other fling it at thy face,
Than bear so low a sail to strike to thee.

K. Edw. Sail how thou canst, have wind and tide thy friend:

This hand, fast wound about thy coal-black hair,
Shall, whiles thy head is warm, and new cut off,
Write in the dust this sentence with thy blood,
"Wind-changing Warwick now can change no more."

Enter OXFORD, with drum and colours.

War. O cheerful colours! see, where Oxford comes!

Oxf. Oxford, Oxford, for Lancaster!

[OXFORD and his Forces enter the city.]

Glo. The gates are open, let us enter too.

K. Edw. So other foes may set upon our backs.
Stand we in good array; for they, no doubt,
Will issue out again and bid us battle:
If not, the city, being but of small defence,
We'll quickly rouse the traitors in the same.

War. O, welcome, Oxford! for we want thy help.

Enter MONTAGUE, with drum and colours.

Mont. Montague, Montague, for Lancaster!

[He and his Forces enter the city.]

Glo. Thou and thy brother both shall buy this treason
Even with the dearest blood your bodies bear.

K. Edw. The harder match'd, the greater victory:
My mind presageth happy gain, and conquest.

<sup>1</sup> Deck. A pack of cards was formerly called a deck. There is a similar example in "Selimus" (1594):—

"Well, if I chance but once to get the deck,
To deal about and shuffle as I would."

Enter SOMERSET, with drum and colours.

Som. Somerset, Somerset, for Lancaster!

[He and his Forces enter the city.]

Glo. Two of thy name, both dukes of Somerset,
Have sold their lives unto the house of York;
And thou shalt be the third, if this sword hold.

Enter CLARENCE, with drum and colours.

War. And lo, where George of Clarence sweeps along,
Of force enough to bid his brother battle;
With whom an upright zeal to right prevails,
More than the nature of a brother's love:
Come, Clarence, come; thou wilt if Warwick call.

Clar. Father of Warwick, know you what this means?

[Taking the red rose out of his cap.]

Look here, I throw my infamy at thee:
I will not ruinate my father's house,
Who gave his blood to lime the stones together,
And set up Lancaster. Why, trow'st thou, Warwick,
That Clarence is so harsh, so blunt, unnatural,
To bend the fatal instruments of war
Against his brother and his lawful king?
Perhaps, thou wilt object my holy oath:
To keep that oath were more impiety
Than Jephtha's, when he sacrific'd his daughter.
I am so sorry for my trespass made,
That, to deserve well at my brother's hands,
I here proclaim myself thy mortal foe;
With resolution, wheresoe'er I meet thee,
(As I will meet thee if thou stir abroad,)
To plague thee for thy foul misleading me.
And so, proud-hearted Warwick, I defy thee,
And to my brother turn my blushing cheeks.
Pardon me, Edward, I will make amends;
And, Richard, do not frown upon my faults,
For I will henceforth be no more unconstant.

K. Edw. Now welcome more, and ten times more belov'd,
Than if thou never hadst deserv'd our hate.

Glo. Welcome, good Clarence; this is brother-like.

War. O passing<sup>2</sup> traitor, perjurd, and unjust!

K. Edw. What, Warwick, wilt thou leave the town and fight?

Or shall we beat the stones about thine ears?

War. Alas, I am not coop'd here for defence:
I will away towards Barnet presently,
And bid thee battle, Edward, if thou dar'st.

K. Edw. Yes, Warwick, Edward dares, and leads the way:

Lords, to the field; Saint George, and victory.

[March. Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Field of Battle near Barnet.

Alarums and Excursions. Enter KING EDWARD bringing in WARWICK, wounded.

K. Edw. So, lie thou there: die thou, and die our fear;
For Warwick was a bug that fear'd us all.
Now, Montague, sit fast; I seek for thee,
That Warwick's bones may keep thine company. [Exit.]

War. Ah, who is nigh? come to me friend or foe,
And tell me who is victor, York, or Warwick?
Why ask I that? my mangled body shows,
My blood, my want of strength, my sick heart shows,
That I must yield my body to the earth,
And, by my fall, the conquest to my foe.
Thus yields the cedar to the axe's edge,
Whose arms gave shelter to the princely eagle,

J. A. HOUSTON R.S.A. PINXT

T. BROWN SCUL

THE DEATH OF THE EARL OF WARWICK.

(KING . . .)

Under whose shade the ramping lion slept ;
Whose top-branch overpeer'd Jove's spreading tree,
And kept low shrubs from winter's powerful wind.
These eyes, that now are dimm'd with death's black veil,
Have been as piercing as the mid-day sun
To search the secret treasons of the world :
The wrinkles in my brows, now fill'd with blood,
Were liken'd oft to kingly sepulchres ;
For who liv'd king but I could dig his grave ?
And who durst smile when Warwick bent his brow ?
Lo, now my glory smear'd in dust and blood !
My parks, my walks, my manors that I had,
Even now forsake me ; and of all my lands
Is nothing left me, but my body's length !
Why, what is pomp, rule, reign, but earth and dust ?
And live we how we can, yet die we must.

Enter OXFORD and SOMERSET.

Som. Ah, Warwick, Warwick ! wert thou as we are
We might recover all our loss again.
The queen from France hath brought a puissant power ;
Even now we heard the news : Ah, couldst thou fly !

War. Why, then I would not fly.—Ah, Montague,
If thou be there, sweet brother, take my hand,
And with thy lips keep in my soul awhile !
Thou lov'st me not ; for, brother, if thou didst,
Thy tears would wash this cold congealed blood
That glues my lips, and will not let me speak.
Come quickly, Montague, or I am dead.

Som. Ah, Warwick, Montague hath breath'd his last ;
And to the latest gasp cried out for Warwick,
And said, Commend me to my valiant brother.
And more he would have said ; and more he spoke,
Which sounded like a cannon in a vault,
That might not be distinguish'd ; but, at last,
I well might hear deliver'd with a groan,
O, farewell, Warwick !

War. Sweet rest to his soul !—
Fly, lords, and save yourselves ; for Warwick bids
You all farewell, to meet in heaven.<sup>1</sup> [Dies.

Oxf. Away, away, to meet the queen's great power.
[Exeunt, bearing off WARWICK'S body.

SCENE III.—Another part of the Field.

Flourish. Enter KING EDWARD, in triumph ; with CLARENCE, GLOSTER, and the rest.

K. Edw. Thus far our fortune keeps an upward course,
And we are grac'd with wreaths of victory.
But, in the midst of this bright-shining day,
I spy a black, suspicious, threat'ning cloud,
That will encounter with our glorious sun,
Ere he attain his easeful western bed :
I mean, my lords, those powers that the queen
Hath rais'd in Gallia have arriv'd our coast,
And, as we hear, march on to fight with us.

Clar. A little gale will soon disperse that cloud,
And blow it to the source from whence it came :
Thy very beams will dry those vapours up ;
For every cloud engenders not a storm.

Glo. The queen is valued thirty thousand strong,
And Somerset, with Oxford, fled to her ;
If she have time to breathe, be well assur'd
Her faction will be full as strong as ours.

K. Edw. We are advertis'd by our loving friends,
That they do hold their course toward Tewkesbury ;
We, having now the best at Barnet field,

Will thither straight, for willingness rids way :
And, as we march, our strength will be augmented
In every county as we go along.
Strike up the drum ; cry, Courage ! and away. [Exeunt.

SCENE IV.—Plains near Tewkesbury.

March. Enter QUEEN MARGARET, PRINCE EDWARD, SOMERSET, OXFORD, and Soldiers.

Q. Mar. Great lords, wise men ne'er sit and wail their loss,

But cheerly seek how to redress their harms.
What, though the mast be now blown overboard,
The cable broke, the holding anchor lost,
And half our sailors swallow'd in the flood,
Yet lives our pilot still : Is't meet that he Should leave the helm, and, like a fearful lad,
With tearful eyes add water to the sea,
And give more strength to that which hath too much ;
Whiles, in his moan, the ship splits on the rock,
Which industry and courage might have sav'd ?
Ah, what a shame ! ah, what a fault were this !
Say, Warwick was our anchor ; what of that ?
And Montague our top-mast ; what of him ?
Our slaughter'd friends the tackles ; what of these ?
Why, is not Oxford here another anchor ?
And Somerset an other goodly mast ?
The friends of France our shrouds and tacklings ?
And, though unskilful, why not Ned and I
For once allow'd the skilful pilot's charge ?
We will not from the helm, to sit and weep ;
But keep our course, though the rough wind say no,
From shelves and rocks that threaten us with wrack.
As good to chide the waves as speak them fair.
And what is Edward but a ruthless sea ?
What Clarence, but a quicksand of deceit ?
And Richard, but a ragged fatal rock ?
All these the enemies to our poor bark.
Say, you can swim ; alas, 'tis but awhile :
Tread on the sand ; why then you quickly sink :
Bestride the rock ; the tide will wash you off,
Or else you famish, that's a threefold death.
This speak I, lords, to let you understand,
If case some one of you would fly from us,
That there's no hop'd-for mercy with the brothers,
More than with ruthless waves, with sands and rocks.
Why, courage, then ! what cannot be avoided
'Twere childish weakness to lament or fear.

Prince. Methinks, a woman of this valiant spirit
Should, if a coward heard her speak these words,
Infuse his breast with magnanimity,
And make him, naked, foil a man at arms.
I speak not this as doubting any here :
For did I but suspect a fearful man,
He should have leave to go away betimes ;
Lest, in our need, he might infect another,
And make him of like spirit to himself.
If any such be here, as God forbid !
Let him depart, before we need his help.

Oxf. Women and children of so high a courage !
And warriors faint ! why, 'twere perpetual shame.
O, brave young prince ! thy famous grandfather
Doth live again in thee : Long may'st thou live,
To bear his image, and renew his glories !

Som. And he that will not fight for such a hope
Go home to bed, and, like the owl by day,
If he arise, be mock'd and wonder'd at.

Q. Mar. Thanks, gentle Somerset ;—sweet Oxford, thanks.

Prince. And take his thanks that yet hath nothing else.

<sup>1</sup> In this line the word again has been interpolated in early modern editions—
“to meet again in heaven.”

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Prepare you, lords, for Edward is at hand,
Ready to fight; therefore be resolute.

Oxf. I thought no less: it is his policy
To haste thus fast, to find us unprovided.

Som. But he's deceived, we are in readiness.

Q. Mar. This cheers my heart, to see your forwardness.

Oxf. Here pitch our battle; hence we will not budge.

March. Enter, at a distance, KING EDWARD, CLARENCE, GLOSTER, and Forces.

K. Edw. Brave followers, yonder stands the thorny wood,
Which, by the heavens' assistance, and your strength,
Must by the roots be hewn up yet ere night.

I need not add more fuel to your fire,
For well I wot ye blaze to burn them out:
Give signal to the fight, and to it, lords.

Q. Mar. Lords, knights, and gentlemen, what I should say

My tears gainsay; for every word I speak,
Ye see, I drink the water of mine eyes.
Therefore, no more but this: Henry, your sovereign,
Is prisoner to the foe; his state usurp'd,
His realm a slaughter-house, his subjects slain,
His statutes cancell'd, and his treasure spent;
And yonder is the wolf that makes this spoil.
You fight in justice; then, in God's name, lords,
Be valiant, and give signal to the fight.

[Exeunt both armies.]

SCENE V.—Another part of the same.

Alarums: Excursions and afterwards a Retreat. Then, enter KING EDWARD, CLARENCE, GLOSTER, and Forces: with QUEEN MARGARET, OXFORD, and SOMERSET, prisoners.

K. Edw. Now, here a period of tumultuous broils.
Away with Oxford to Hammes' castle straight:
For Somerset, off with his guilty head.
Go, bear them hence; I will not hear them speak.

Oxf. For my part, I'll not trouble thee with words.

Som. Nor I, but stoop with patience to my fortune.

[Exeunt OXFORD and SOMERSET, guarded.]

Q. Mar. So part we sadly in this troublous world,
To meet with joy in sweet Jerusalem.

K. Edw. Is proclamation made, that who finds Edward Shall have a high reward, and he his life?

Glo. It is: and lo, where youthful Edward comes.

Enter Soldiers, with PRINCE EDWARD.

K. Edw. Bring forth the gallant, let us hear him speak.
What! can so young a thorn begin to prick?
Edward, what satisfaction canst thou make
For bearing arms, and stirring up my subjects,
And all the trouble thou hast turn'd me to?

Prince. Speak like a subject, proud ambitious York!
Suppose that I am now my father's mouth;
Resign thy chair, and, where I stand, kneel thou,
Whilst I propose the self-same words to thee,
Which, traitor, thou wouldst have me answer to.

Q. Mar. Ah, that thy father had been so resolv'd!

Glo. That you might still have worn the petticoat,
And ne'er have stolen the breech from Lancaster.

Prince. Let Æsop fable in a winter's night;
His currish riddles sort not with this place.

Glo. By heaven, brat, I'll plague you for that word.

Q. Mar. Ay, thou wast born to be a plague to men.

Glo. For God's sake, take away this captive scold.

Prince. Nay, take away this scolding crook-back rather.

K. Edw. Peace, wilful boy, or I will charm your tongue.

Clar. Untutor'd lad, thou art too malapert.

Prince. I know my duty, you are all undutiful:

Lascivious Edward, and thou perjurd George,
And thou misshapen Dick, I tell ye all,

I am your better, traitors as ye are;

And thou usurp'st my father's right and mine.

K. Edw. Take that, the likeness of this railer here.

[Stabs him.]

Glo. Sprawl'st thou? take that, to end thy agony.

[GLO. stabs him.]

Clar. And there's for twitting me with perjury.

[CLAR. stabs him.]

Q. Mar. O, kill me too!

Glo. Marry, and shall.

[Offers to kill her.]

K. Edw. Hold, Richard, hold, for we have done too much.

Glo. Why should she live to fill the world with words?

K. Edw. What! doth she swoon? use means for her recovery.

Glo. Clarence, excuse me to the king my brother;

I'll hence to London on a serious matter:

Ere ye come there, be sure to hear some news.

Clar. What? what?

Glo. The Tower! the Tower!

[Exit.]

Q. Mar. O, Ned, sweet Ned, speak to thy mother, boy!

Canst thou not speak?—O traitors! murderers!—

They that stabb'd Cæsar shed no blood at all,

Did not offend, nor were not worthy blame,

If this foul deed were by, to equal it.

He was a man: this, in respect, a child;

And men ne'er spend their fury on a child.

What's worse than murderer, that I may name it?

No, no; my heart will burst, an if I speak;

And I will speak, that so my heart may burst.

Butchers and villains, bloody cannibals!

How sweet a plant have you untimely cropp'd!

You have no children, butchers! if you had,

The thought of them would have stirr'd up remorse:

But, if you ever chance to have a child,

Look in his youth to have him so cut off,

As, deathsmen! you have rid this sweet young prince!

K. Edw. Away with her; go, bear her hence perforce.

Q. Mar. Nay, never bear me hence, despatch me here;

Here sheathe thy sword, I'll pardon thee my death:

What! wilt thou not?—then, Clarence, do it thou.

Clar. By heaven, I will not do thee so much ease.

Q. Mar. Good Clarence, do; sweet Clarence, do thou do it.

Clar. Didst thou not hear me swear I would not do it?

Q. Mar. Ay, but thou usest to forswear thyself:

'Twas sin before, but now 'tis charity.

What! wilt thou not? where is that devil's butcher,

Hard-favour'd Richard? Richard, where art thou?

Thou art not here: Murder is thy alms-deed;

Petitioners for blood thou ne'er put'st back.

K. Edw. Away, I say; I charge ye, bear her hence.

Q. Mar. So come to you, and yours, as to this prince.

[Exit, led out forcibly.]

K. Edw. Where's Richard gone?

Clar. To London, all in post; and, as I guess,
To make a bloody supper in the Tower.

K. Edw. He's sudden, if a thing comes in his head.

Now march we hence: discharge the common sort,

With pay and thanks, and let's away to London,

And see our gentle queen how well she fares:

By this, I hope, she hath a son for me.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.—London. A Room in the Tower.

KING HENRY is discovered sitting, with a book in his hand, the Lieutenant attending. Enter GLOSTER.

Glo. Good day, my lord! What, at your book so hard?
K. Hen. Ay, my good lord: My lord, I should say, rather:

'Tis sin to flatter, good was little better:
Good Gloster and good devil were alike,
And both preposterous; therefore, not good lord.

Glo. Sirrah, leave us to ourselves: we must confer.

[Exit Lieutenant.]

K. Hen. So flies the reckless shepherd from the wolf:
So first the harmless sheep doth yield his fleece,
And next his throat unto the butcher's knife.
What scene of death hath Roscius now to act?

Glo. Suspicion always haunts the guilty mind;
The thief doth fear each bush an officer.

K. Hen. The bird that hath been limed in a bush,
With trembling wings misdoubteth every bush:
And I, the hapless male to one sweet bird,
Have now the fatal object in my eye,
Where my poor young was lim'd, was caught, and kill'd.

Glo. Why, what a peevish fool was that of Crete,
That taught his son the office of a fowl;
And yet, for all his wings, the fool was drown'd.

K. Hen. I, Dædalus; my poor boy, Icarus;
Thy father, Minos, that denied our course;
The sun, that sear'd the wings of my sweet boy,
Thy brother Edward; and thyself, the sea,
Whose envious gulf did swallow up his life.
Ah, kill me with thy weapon, not with words!
My breast can better brook thy dagger's point,
Than can my ears that tragic history.

But wherefore dost thou come? is't for my life?

Glo. Think'st thou I am an executioner?

K. Hen. A persecutor, I am sure, thou art;
If murdering innocents be executing,
Why, then thou art an executioner.

Glo. Thy son I kill'd for his presumption.

K. Hen. Hadst thou been kill'd when first thou didst presume,

Thou hadst not liv'd to kill a son of mine.
And thus I prophesy,—that many a thousand,
Which now mistrust no parcel of my fear;
And many an old man's sigh, and many a widow's,
And many an orphan's water-standing eye,—
Men for their sons', wives for their husbands',
And orphans for their parents' timeless death,<sup>1</sup>—
Shall rue the hour that ever thou wast born.
The owl shriek'd at thy birth, an evil sign;
The night-crow cried, aboding luckless time;
Dogs howl'd, and hideous tempests shook down trees;
The raven rook'd her on the chimney's top,
And chattering pies in dismal discords sung.
Thy mother felt more than a mother's pain,
And yet brought forth less than a mother's hope;
To wit, an indigested and deformed lump,<sup>2</sup>
Not like the fruit of such a goodly tree.
Teeth hadst thou in thy head when thou wast born,
To signify thou cam'st to bite the world:
And, if the rest be true which I have heard,
Thou cam'st—

Glo. I'll hear no more:—Die, prophet, in thy speech:

[Stabs him.]

For this, amongst the rest, was I ordain'd.

K. Hen. Ay, and for much more slaughter after this.
O God! forgive my sins, and pardon thee! [Dies.]

Glo. What, will the aspiring blood of Lancaster
Sink in the ground? I thought it would have mounted.
See how my sword weeps for the poor king's death!
O, may such purple tears be always shed
From those that wish the downfall of our house!
If any spark of life be yet remaining,
Down, down to hell; and say I sent thee thither.

[Stabs him again.]

I, that have neither pity, love, nor fear.
Indeed, 'tis true that Henry told me of;
For I have often heard my mother say
I came into the world with my legs forward:
Had I not reason, think ye, to make haste,
And seek their ruin that usurp'd our right?
The midwife wonder'd: and the women cried,
"O, Jesus bless us, he is born with teeth!"
And so I was; which plainly signified
That I should snarl, and bite, and play the dog.
Then, since the heavens have shap'd my body so,
Let hell make crook'd my mind to answer it.
I have no brother, I am like no brother:
And this word love, which greybeards call divine,
Be resident in men like one another,
And not in me; I am myself alone.
Clarence, beware; thou keep'st me from the light;
But I will sort a pitchy day for thee:
For I will buzz abroad such prophecies,
That Edward shall be fearful of his life;
And then, to purge his fear, I'll be thy death.
King Henry and the prince his son are gone:
Clarence, thy turn is next, and then the rest,
Counting myself but bad till I be best.
I'll throw thy body in another room,
And triumph, Henry, in thy day of doom. [Exit.]

SCENE VII.—The same. A Room in the Palace.

KING EDWARD is discovered sitting on his throne; QUEEN ELIZABETH, with the infant PRINCE, CLARENCE, GLOSTER, HASTINGS, and others, near him.

K. Edw. Once more we sit in England's royal throne,
Re-purchas'd with the blood of enemies.
What valiant foemen, like to autumn's corn,
Have we mow'd down, in tops of all their pride!
Three dukes of Somerset, threefold renown'd
For hardy and undoubted champions:
Two Cliffords, as the father and the son;
And two Northumberlands: two braver men
Ne'er spur'd their coursers at the trumpet's sound:
With them, the two brave bears, Warwick and Montague,
That in their chains fetter'd the kingly lion,
And made the forest tremble when they roar'd.
Thus have we swept suspicion from our seat,
And made our footstool of security.
Come hither, Bess, and let me kiss my boy:
Young Ned, for thee, thine uncles and myself
Have in our armours watch'd the winter's night;
Went all afoot in summer's scalding heat,
That thou might'st repossess the crown in peace;
And of our labours thou shalt reap the gain.

Glo. I'll blast his harvest, if your head were laid;
For yet I am not look'd on in the world.
This shoulder was ordain'd so thick to heave;
And heave it shall some weight, or break my back:
Work thou the way, and that shall execute. [Aside.]

K. Edw. Clarence, and Gloster, love my lovely queen,
And kiss your princely nephew, brothers both.

<sup>1</sup> We point this passage in the belief that "timeless death" is connected not only with parents', but with husbands' and sons'.

This line stands thus in the folio. Malone printed—
"To wit, an indigest deformed lump."

Clar. The duty that I owe unto your majesty
I seal upon the lips of this sweet babe.

Queen. Thanks, noble Clarence : worthy brother, thanks.<sup>1</sup>

Glo. And, that I love the tree from whence thou sprang'st,

Witness the loving kiss I give the fruit :

To say the truth, so Judas kiss'd his master ;

And cried—all hail ! when as he meant—all harm. [Aside.]

K. Edw. Now am I seated as my soul delights,
Having my country's peace, and brothers' loves.

Clar. What will your grace have done with Margaret ?
Reignier, her father, to the king of France
Hath pawn'd the Sicils and Jerusalem,
And hither have they sent it for her ransom.

K. Edw. Away with her, and waft her hence to France.
And now what rests, but that we spend the time
With stately triumphs, mirthful comic shows,
Such as befit the pleasure of the court ?
Sound, drums and trumpets !—farewell, sour annoy !
For here, I hope, begins our lasting joy. [Exeunt.]

HISTORICAL ILLUSTRATIONS TO KING HENRY VI.—PART III.

ACT I.

THE battle of St. Alban's concluded the Second Part of the drama of Henry VI. ; in the first scene of this Third Part the conquerors are assembled in the Parliament House, boasting of their exploits, and resolved to carry out their victory to its utmost consequences. Yet five years had elapsed between this first great triumph of the Yorkists and the compromise between the rival houses which we find in the scene before us. That compromise followed the battle of Northampton, in the thirty-eighth year of Henry VI. ; the battle of St. Alban's was fought in the thirty-third year of that reign. We transcribe the passages from the chroniclers upon which Shakspeare has constructed his plot. Hall says :—

“During this trouble was a parliament summoned to begin at Westminster in the month of October next following. Before which time Richard Duke of York, being in Ireland, by swift couriers and flying posts, was advertised of the great victory gained by his party at the field of Northampton, and also knew that the king was now in case to be kept and ordered at his pleasure and will ; wherefore, losing no time, nor slugging one hour, he sailed from Develine to Chester with no small company, and by long journeys came to the city of London, which he entered the Friday next before the feast of Saint Edward the Confessor, with a sword borne naked before him, and took his lodging in the king's own palace, whereupon the common people babbled that he should be king, and that King Henry should no longer reign. During the time of this parliament, the Duke of York, with a bold countenance, entered into the chamber of the peers and sat down in the throne royal under the cloth of estate (which is the king's peculiar seat), and in the presence as well of the nobility as of the spirituality (after a pause made) said these words in effect.” . . .

Hall then gives a long oration, which Holinshed copies, with the following remarks:—“Master Edward Hall, in his Chronicle, maketh mention of an oration which the Duke of York uttered, sitting in the regal seat there in the chamber of the peers, either at this his first coming in amongst them, or else at some one time after, the which we have thought good also to set down ; though John Whethamsted, the Abbot of St. Alban's, who lived in those days, and by all likelihood was there present at the parliament, maketh no further recital of any words which the duke should utter at that time in that his book of records, where he entreateth of this matter.” Hall thus proceeds :—“When the duke had thus ended his oration, the lords sat still like images graven in the wall, or dumb gods, neither whispering nor speaking, as though their mouths had been sewed up. The duke, perceiving none answer to be made to his declared purpose, not well content with their sober silence and taciturnity, advised them well to digest and ponder the effect of his oration and saying, and so, neither fully displeased nor all pleased, departed to his lodging in the king's palace.”

The compromise upon which the parliament resolved is thus noticed by Hall :—“After long arguments made, and deliberate consultation had among the peers, prelates, and commons of the realm, upon the vigil of All Saints it was condescended and agreed by the three estates, for so much as King Henry had been taken as king by the space of xxxviii. years and more, that he should enjoy the name and title of king, and have possession of the realm, during his life natural : And if he either died or resigned, or forfeited the same for infringing any point of this concord, then the said crown and authority royal should immediately be divoluted to the Duke of York, if he then lived, or else to the next heir of his line and lineage, and that the duke from thenceforth should be protector and regent of the land. Provided alway, that if the king did closely or apertly study or go about to break or alter this agreement, or to compass or imagine the death or destruction of the said duke or his blood, then he to forfeit the crown, and the Duke of York to take it. These articles, with many other, were not only written, sealed, and sworn by the two parties, but also were enacted in the high court of parliament. For joy whereof, the king, having in his company the said duke, rode to the cathedral church of St. Paul within the city of London ; and there, on the day of All Saints, went solemnly, with the diadem on his head, in procession, and was lodged a good space after in the bishop's palace, near to the said church. And upon the Saturday next ensuing Richard Duke of York was, by the sound of a trumpet, solemnly proclaimed heir apparent to the crown of England, and protector of the realm.”

The battle of Wakefield soon followed this hollow compromise. The main incidents of the third and fourth scenes are built upon the chroniclers. Hall writes thus :—“The Duke of York with his people descended down in good order and array, and was suffered to pass forward toward the main battle : but when he was in the plain ground between his castle and the town of Wakefield he was environed on every side, like a fish in a net, or a deer in a buckstall : so that he, manfully fighting, was within half an hour slain and dead, and his whole army discomfited ; and with him died of his trusty friends, his two bastard uncles, Sir John and Sir Hugh Mortimers, Sir Davy Halle his chief counsellor, Sir Hugh Hastings, Sir Thomas Nevel, William and Thomas Aparre, both brethren, and two thousand and eight hundred other, whereof many were young gentlemen and heirs of great parentage in the south part, whose lineages revenged their deaths within four months next and immediately ensuing.

Whilst this battle was in fighting, a priest called Sir Robert Aspoll, chaplain and schoolmaster to the young Earl of Rutland, ii son to the above named Duke of York, scarce of the age of xii years, a fair gentleman, and a maidenlike person, perceiving that flight was more safeguard than tarrying, both for him and his master, secretly conveyed the earl out of the field, by the Lord Clifford's band, toward the town ; but ere he could enter into a house he was by the said Lord Clifford espied, followed, and taken, and by reason of his apparel demanded what he was. The young gentleman, dismayed, had not a word to speak, but kneeled on his knees imploring mercy, and desiring grace, both with holding up his hands and making dolorous countenance, for his speech was gone for fear. Save him, said his chaplain, for he is a prince's son, and peradventure may do you good hereafter. With that word the Lord Clifford marked him, and said, By God's blood, thy father slew mine, and so will I do thee and all thy kin ; and with that word stuck the earl to the heart with his dagger, and bade his chaplain bear the earl's mother and brother word what he had done and said."

This ferocious revenge of Clifford is commented upon with just indignation by Hall :—"In this act the Lord Clifford was accopted a tyrant, and no gentleman." He then proceeds to describe the death of the Duke of York :—"This cruel Clifford and deadly bloodsupper, not content with this homicide, or childkilling, came to the place where the dead corpse of the Duke of York lay, and caused his head to be stricken off, and set on it a crown of paper, and so fixed it on a pole, and presented it to the queen, not lying far from the field, in great despite and much derision, saying, Madam, your war is done, here is your king's ransom : at which present was much joy and great rejoicing : but many laughed then that sore lamented after, as the queen herself, and her son : and many were glad then of other men's deaths, not knowing that their own were near at hand, as the Lord Clifford, and other. But, surely, man's nature is so frail, that things passed be soon forgotten, and mischiefs to come be not foreseen. After this victory by the queen and her party obtained, she caused the Earl of Salisbury, with all the other prisoners, to be sent to Pomfret, and there to be beheaded, and sent all their heads, and the Duke's head of York, to be set upon poles over the gate of the city of York, in despite of them and their lineage."

The circumstances attending the death of York are, however, differently told. Holinshed says :—"Some write that the duke was taken alive, and in derision caused to stand upon a molehill, on whose head they put a garland instead of a crown, which they had fashioned and made of segges or bulrushes, and having so crowned him with that garland they kneeled down afore him as the Jews did to Christ in scorn, saying to him, Hail, king without rule ; hail, king without heritage ; hail, duke and prince without people or possessions. And at length, having thus scorned him with these and divers other the like despiteful words, they stroke off his head, which (as ye have heard) they presented to the queen." The poet has taken the most picturesque parts of the two narratives.

ACT II.

The events which followed the death of the Duke of York are thus described by Hall :—"The Earl of March, so commonly called, but after the death of his father in deed and in right very Duke of York, lying at Gloucester, hearing of the death of his noble father, and loving brother, and trusty friends, was wonderfully amazed ; but after comfort given to him by his faithful lovers and assured allies, he removed to Shrewsbury and other towns upon the river of Severn, declaring to them the murder of his father, the jeopardy of himself, and the unstable state and ruin of the realm. The people on the Marches of Wales, which above measure favoured the lineage of the lord Mortimer, more gladly offered him their aid and assistance than he it either instantly required or heartily desired, so that he had a puissant army, to the number of twenty-three thousand, ready to go against the queen and the murderers of his father. But when he was setting forward news were brought to him that Jasper Earl of Pembroke, half brother to King Henry, and James Butler Earl of Ormond and Wiltshire, had assembled together a great number, both of Welsh and Irish people, suddenly to surprise and take him and his friends, and as a captive to convey him to the queen. The Duke of York, called Earl of March, somewhat spurred and quickened with these novelties, retired back, and met with his enemies in a fair plain near to Mortimer's Cross, not far from Hereford east, on Candlemas-day in the morning, at which time the sun (as some write) appeared to the Earl of March like three suns, and suddenly joined altogether in one, and that upon the sight thereof he took such courage that he fiercely set on his enemies, and them shortly discomfited : for which cause men imagined that he gave the sun in his full brightness for his cognizance or badge."

The poet passes over the battle of Mortimer's Cross, but gives us the incident of the three suns. He also, not crowding the scene with an undramatic succession of events nearly similar, omits all mention of the second battle of St. Alban's, in which the queen was victorious. This battle was fruitless to the cause of Lancaster, for Edward was almost immediately after recognised as king by the Parliament assembled in London. The poet postpones this event, and, after the imaginary interview of the second scene, brings us to the great battle of Towton, which is thus described by Hall :—"This battle was sore fought, for hope of life was set on side on every part, and taking of prisoners was proclaimed as a great offence ; by reason whereof every man determined either to conquer or to die in the field. This deadly battle and bloody conflict continued ten hours in doubtful victory, the one part sometime flowing and sometime ebbing ; but, in conclusion, King Edward so courageously comforted his men, refreshing the weary and helping the wounded, that the other part was discomfited and overcome, and, like men amazed, fled toward Tadcaster bridge to save themselves. This conflict was in manner unnatural, for in it the son fought against the father, the brother against the brother, the nephew against the uncle, and the tenant against his lord."

ACT III.

The first scene exhibits the capture of Henry VI. upon his abandonment of his secure asylum in Scotland. Between that period (1464) and the accession of Edward three years had elapsed—years of unavailing struggle on the part of the Lancastrians. The capture of Henry is thus described by Hall :—"Whatsoever jeopardy or peril might be construed or deemed to have ensued by the means of King Henry, all such doubts were now shortly resolved and determined, and all fear of his doings were clearly put under and extinct. For he himself, whether he were past all fear, or was not well established in his perfect mind, or could not long keep himself secret, in a disguised apparel boldly entered into England. He was no sooner entered but he was known and taken of one Cantlowe, and brought toward the king, whom the Earl of Warwick met on the way, by the king's commandment, and brought him through London to the Tower, and there he was laid in sure hold. Queen Margaret his wife, hearing of the captivity of her husband, mistrusting the chance of her son, all disconsolate and comfortless, departed out of Scotland and sailed into France, where she remained with Duke Reyner her father till she took her unfortunate journey into England again, where she lost both husband and son, and also all her wealth, honour, and worldly felicity."

In the second scene the poet, with great dramatic skill, exhibits the course of that wooing which ended in the marriage of Edward with Elizabeth Woodville—an event altogether unpropitious and finally destructive to his house. Hall (whom we still follow, for Holinshed is almost his literal copyist) tells the story with great quaintness, and Shakspeare clearly follows him :—"But now consider the old proverb to be true that sayeth that marriage is destiny. For during the time that the Earl of Warwick was thus in France concluding a marriage for king Edward, the king, being on hunting in the forest of Wichwood beside Stoney Stratford, came for his recreation to the manor of Grafton, where the duchess of Bedford sojourned, then wife to Sir Richard Woodville, Lord Rivers, on whom then was attending a daughter of hers, called Dame Elizabeth Grey, widow of Sir John Grey, knight, slain at the last battle of Saint Alban's by the power of King Edward. This widow, having a suit to the king, either to be restored by him to something taken from her, or requiring him of pity to have some augmentation to her living, found such grace in the king's eyes that he not only favoured her suit, but much more phantasied her person ; for she was a woman more of formal countenance than of excellent beauty, but yet of such beauty and favour that with her sober demeanour, lovely looking, and feminine smiling (neither too wanton nor too humble), beside her tongue so eloquent, and her wit so pregnant, she was able to ravish the mind of a mean person, when she allured and made subject to her the heart of so great a king. After that King Edward had well considered all the lineaments of her body, and the wise and womanly demeanour that he saw in her, he determined first to attempt if he might provoke her to be his sovereign lady, promising her many gifts and fair rewards ; affirming farther, that, if she would thereunto condescend, she might so fortune of his paramour and concubine to be changed to his wife and lawful bedfellow ; which demand she so wisely and with so covert speech answered and repugned, affirming that, as she was for his honour far unable to be his spouse and bedfellow, so for her own poor honesty she was too good to be either his concubine or sovereign lady; that, where he was a little before heated with the dart of Cupid, he was now set all on a hot burning fire, what for the confidence that he had in her perfect constancy, and the trust that he had in her constant chastity; and without any farther deliberation he determined with himself clearly to marry with her, after that asking counsel of them which he knew neither would nor once durst impugn his concluded purpose. But the Duchess of York, his mother, letted it as much as in her lay, alleging a precontract made by him with the Lady Lucy and divers other lettes; all which doubts were resolved, and all things made clear, and all cavillations avoided. And so, privily in a morning, he married her at Grafton, where he first phantasied her visage."

The contemporary historians, with one exception, make no mention of the suit of Edward, through Warwick, for the hand of the sister of the crafty Lewis XI. But the poet had ample authority for the third scene of this act in the relation of Hall, which Holinshed also adopts:—"The French king and his queen were not a little discontent (as I cannot blame them) to have their sister first demanded and then granted, and in conclusion rejected and apparently mocked, without any cause reasonable. But when the Earl of Warwick had perfect knowledge by the letters of his trusty friends that King Edward had gotten him a new wife, and that all that he had done with King Lewis in his ambassade for the conjoining of this new affinity was both frustrate and vain, he was earnestly moved and sore chafed with the chance, and thought it necessary that King Edward should be deposed from his crown and royal dignity, as an inconstant prince, not worthy of such a kingly office. All men for the most part agree that this marriage was the only cause why the Earl of Warwick bare grudge and made war on King Edward. Other affirm that there were other causes, which, added to this, made the fire to flame which before was but a little smoke."

ACT IV.

The defection of Clarence from the cause of his brother has been worked up by the poet into a sudden resolve;—it was probably the result of much contrivance slowly operating upon a feeble mind, coupled with his own passion for the daughter of Warwick. What is rapid and distinct in the play is slow and obscure in the Chronicles. Warwick and Clarence in the play are quickly transformed into enemies to the brother and the ally; in the Chronicles we have to trace them through long courses of intrigue and deception. When Warwick possessed himself of the person of Edward, it is difficult, from the contemporary historians, to understand his real intentions. Hall, however, who compiles with a picturesque eye, tells the story of his capture and release in a manner which was not unfitted to be expanded into dramatic effect:—"All the king's doings were by espials declared to the Earl of Warwick, which, like a wise and politic captain, intending not to lose so great an advantage to him given, but trusting to bring all his purposes to a final end and determination by only obtaining this enterprise, in the dead of the night, with an elect company of men of war, as secretly as was possible, set on the king's field, killing them that kept the watch, and or the king were ware (for he thought of nothing less than of that chance that happened), at a place called Wolney, four miles from Warwick, he was taken prisoner, and brought to the castle of Warwick. And to the intent that the king's friends might not know where he was, nor what was chanced of him, he caused him by secret journeys in the night to be conveyed to Middleham Castle in Yorkshire, and there to be kept under the custody of the Archbishop of York his brother, and other his trusty friends, which entertained the king like his estate, and served him like a prince. But there was no place so far off but that the taking of the king was shortly known there with the wind, which news made many men to fear and greatly to dread, and many to wonder and lament the chance. King Edward, being thus in captivity, spake ever fair to the archbishop and to the other keepers; but, whether he corrupted them with money or fair promises, he had liberty divers days to go on hunting; and one day on a plain there met with him Sir William Stanley, Sir Thomas of Borogh, and divers other of his friends, with such a great band of men, that neither his keepers would nor once durst move him to return to prison again."

In the beginning of 1471 Edward was a fugitive, almost without a home. The great Earl of Warwick had placed Henry again in the nominal seat of authority; a counter-revolution had been effected. By one of those bold movements which set aside all calculation of consequences Edward leaped once more into the throne of England. In an age when perjury and murder were equally resorted to, Edward, on landing, did not hesitate to disguise his real objects, and to maintain that he was in arms only to enforce his claims as Duke of York. The scene before the walls of York is quite borne out by the contemporary historians, and especially in that most curious "Historie of the arrival of Edward IV. in England," published by the Camden Society. Shakspeare evidently went to Hall as his authority:—"King Edward, without any words spoken to him, came peaceably near to York, of whose coming when the citizens were certified, without delay they armed themselves and came to defend the gates, sending to him two of the chiefest aldermen of the city, which earnestly admonished him on their behalf to come not one foot nearer, nor temerarily to enter into so great a jeopardy, considering that they were fully determined and bent to compel him to retract with dint of sword. King Edward, marking well their message, was not a little troubled and unquieted in his mind, and driven to seek the farthest point of his wit; for he had both two mischievous and perilous chances even before his eyes, which were hard to be evaded or repelled:—one was, if he should go back again he feared lest the rural and common people, for covetousness of prey and spoil, would fall on him, as one that fled away for fear and dread; the other was, if he should proceed any farther in his journey, then might the citizens of York issue out with all their power, and suddenly circumvent him and take him. Wherefore he determined to set forward, neither with army nor with weapon, but with lowly words and gentle entreatings, requiring most heartily the messengers that were sent to declare to the citizens that he came neither to demand the realm of England nor the superiority of the same, but only the duchy of York, his old inheritance; the which duchy if he might by their means readopt and recover, he would never pass out of his memory so great a benefit and so friendly a gratuity to him exhibited. And so, with fair words and flattering speech, he dismissed the messengers; and with good speed he and his followed so quickly after, that they were almost at the gates as soon as the ambassadors. The citizens, hearing his good answer, that he meant nor intended nothing prejudicial to King Henry nor his royal authority, were much mitigated and cooled, and began to commune with him from their walls, willing him to convey himself into some other place without delay, which if he did, they assured him that he should have neither hurt nor damage. But he, gently speaking to all men, and especially to such as were aldermen, whom he called worshipful, and by their proper names them saluted, after many fair promises to them made, exhorted and desired them that, by their favourable friendship and friendly permission, he might enter into his own town, of the which he had both his name and title. All the whole day was consumed in doubtful communication and earnest interlocution. The citizens, partly won by his fair words, and partly by hope of his large promises, fell to this pact and convention, that if King Edward would swear to entertain his citizens of York after a gentle sort and fashion, and hereafter to be obedient and faithful to all King Henry's commandments and precepts, that then they would receive him into their city, and aid and comfort him with money. King Edward (whom the citizens called only Duke of York), being glad of this fortunate chance, in the next morning, at the gate where he should enter, a priest being ready to say mass, in the mass time, receiving the body of our blessed Saviour, solemnly swearing to keep and observe the two articles above mentioned and agreed upon, when it was far unlike that he either intended or purposed to observe any of them, which afterwards was to all men manifest."

ACT V.

Of the battle of Barnet the following is Hall's description:—"When the day began to spring the trumpets blew courageously, and the battle fiercely began. Archers first shot, and bill-men them followed. King Edward, having the greater number of men, valiantly set on his enemies. The earl on the other side, remembering his ancient fame and renown, manfully withstood him. This battle on both sides was sore fought, and many slain, in whose rooms succeeded ever fresh and fresh men. In the mean season, while all men were together by the ears, ever looking to which way fortune would incline, the Earl of Warwick, after long fight, wisely did perceive his men to be over pressed with the multitude of his adversaries; wherefore he caused new men to relieve them that fought in the forward, by reason of which succours King Edward's part gave a little back (which was the cause that some lookers-on, and no fighters, galloped to London, saying that the earl had won the field), which thing when Edward did perceive, he with all diligence sent fresh men to their succours.

"If the battle were fierce and deadly before, now it was crueller, more bloody, more fervent and fiery, and yet they had fought from morning almost to noon without any part getting advantage of other. King Edward, being weary of so long a conflict and willing to see an end, caused a great crew of fresh men (which he had for this only policy kept all day in store) to set on their enemies, in manner being weary and fatigate: but although the earl saw these new succours of fresh and new men to enter the battle, being nothing afraid, but hoping of the victory (knowing perfectly that there was all King Edward's power), comforted his men, being weary, sharply quickening and earnestly desiring them with hardy stomachs to bear out this last and final brunt of the battle, and that the field was even at an end. But when his soldiers, being sore wounded, wearied with so long a conflict, did give little regard to his words, he, being a man of a mind invincible, rushed into the midst of his enemies, where as he (adventured so far from his own company to kill and slay his adversaries that he could not be rescued) was in the middle of his enemies stricken down and slain. The Marquis Montacute, thinking to succour his brother, which he saw was in great jeopardy, and yet in hope to obtain the victory, was likewise overthrown and slain. After the earl was dead his party fled, and many were taken, but not one man of name nor of nobility."

The most curious accounts, both of the battles of Barnet and Tewkesbury, and indeed of all this rapid counter-revolution, which has scarcely a parallel in our English annals, are to be found in a contemporary narrative published by the Camden Society. Neither that narrative, nor the Ghent MS., which is an abridgment of it, was probably accessible to Shakspeare. We must therefore still be content to trace him in Hall and Holinshed. The following graphic account of the battle of Tewkesbury is from Hall:—

"After the field ended King Edward made a proclamation that whosoever could bring Prince Edward to him, alive or dead, should have an annuity of an c l. during his life, and the prince's life to be saved. Sir Richard Croftes, a wise and valiant knight, nothing mistrusting the king's former promise, brought forth his prisoner Prince Edward, being a goodly feminine and a well-featured young gentleman, whom when King Edward had well advised, he demanded of him how he durst so presumptuously into his realm with banner displayed. The prince, being bold of stomach and of a good courage, answered, saying, To recover my father's kingdom and inheritance from his father and grandfather to him, and from him, after him, to me lineally divoluted. At which words, King Edward said nothing, but with his hand thrust him from him (or, as some say, stroke him with his gauntlet), whom incontinent they that strode about, which were George Duke of Clarence, Richard Duke of Gloucester, Thomas Marquis Dorset, and William Lord Hastings, suddenly murdered and piteously mangled. The bitterness of which murder some of the actors after in their latter days tasted and essayed by the very rod of justice and punishment of God. His body was homely interred with the other simple corpses in the church of the monastery of Black Monks in Tewkesbury. This was the last civil battle that was fought in King Edward's days, which was gotten the iii day of May, in the x year of his reign, and in the year of our Lord mcccclxxi then being Saturday. And on the Monday next ensuing was Edmund Duke of Somerset, John Longstrother, Prior of Saint John's, Sir Garveys Clifton, Sir Thomas Tresham, and xii other knights and gentlemen beheaded in the market-place at Tewkesbury."

It is unnecessary for us here to enter upon the disputed question as to whether Richard Duke of Gloster were the actual murderer of Henry VI. The following is Holinshed's account of this event:—

"Poor King Henry VI., a little before deprived (as we have heard) of his realm and imperial crown, was now in the Tower spoiled of his life by Richard Duke of Gloster (as the constant fame ran), who, to the intent that his brother King Edward might reign in more surety, murdered the said King Henry with a dagger, although some writers of that time, favouring altogether the house of York, have recorded that, after he understood what losses had chanced to his friends, and how not only his son but also all other his chief partakers were dead and despatched, he took it so to heart, that of pure displeasure, indignation, and melancholy, he died the three-and-twentieth of May. The dead corpse, on the Ascension even (the 29th), was conveyed with bills and glaives pompously (if you will call that a funeral pomp) from the Tower to the church of St. Paul, and there laid on a bier, where it rested the space of one whole day, and, on the next day after, it was conveyed, without priest or clerk, torch or taper, singing or saying, unto the monastery of Chertsey, distant from London fifteen miles, and there was it first buried; but after, it was removed to Windsor, and there in a new vault newly inhumulate."

THE SECOND PART OF THE CONTENTION

YORK AND LANCASTER,

CONTAINING THE

TRAGEDY OF RICHARD DUKE OF YORK, AND THE GOOD KING HENRY THE SIXTH.

(ACT I.)

(SCENE I.)

Enter RICHARD Duke of York, the EARL OF WARWICK, the DUKE OF NORFOLK, MARQUIS MONTAGUE, EDWARD Earl of March, Crook-back RICHARD, and the young EARL OF RUTLAND, with drum and Soldiers, with white roses in their hats.

War. I wonder how the king escap'd our hands.

York. Whilst we pursued the horsemen of the north, He slyly stole away, and left his men : Whereat the great lord of Northumberland, Whose warlike ears could never brook retreat, Charg'd our main battle's front, and there with<sup>1</sup> him Lord Stafford and lord Clifford, all abreast, Brake in, and were by the hands of common soldiers slain.

Edw. Lord Stafford's father, duke of Buckingham, Is either slain or wounded dangerously : I cleft his beaver with a downright blow : Father, that this is true, behold his blood.

Mont. And, brother, here's the earl of Wiltshire's blood, Whom I encounter'd as the battles join'd.

Rich. Speak thou for me, and tell them what I did.<sup>2</sup>

York. What, is your grace dead, my lord of Somerset ?

Norf. Such hope have all the line of John of Gaunt !

Rich. Thus do I hope to shape king Henry's head.

War. And so do I. Victorious prince of York, Before I see thee seated in that throne, Which now the house of Lancaster usurps, I vow by heaven these eyes shall never close : This is the palace of that fearful king, And that the regal chair : possess it, York, For this is thine, and not king Henry's heirs'.

York. Assist me then, sweet Warwick, and I will : For hither are we broken in by force.

Norf. We'll all assist thee, and he that flies shall die.

York. Thanks, gentle Norfolk. Stay by me, my lords ; And, soldiers, stay you here, and lodge this night.

War. And when the king comes, offer him no violence, Unless he seek to put us out by force.

Rich. Arm'd as we be, let's stay within this house.

War. The bloody parliament shall this be call'd, Unless Plantagenet, duke of York, be king, And bashful Henry be depos'd, whose cowardice Hath made us by-words to our enemies.

York. Then leave me not, my lords : for now I mean To take possession of my right.

War. Neither the king, nor him that loves him best, The proudest bird that holds up Lancaster, Dares stir a wing, if Warwick shake his bells. I'll plant Plantagenet, and root him out who dares ! Resolve thee, Richard ; claim the English crown.

Enter KING HENRY THE SIXTH, with the DUKE OF EXETER, the EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND, the EARL OF WESTMORELAND, and CLIFFORD, the Earl of Cumberland, with red roses in their hats.

King. Look, lordlings, where the sturdy rebel sits, Even in the chair of state ! belike, he means (Back'd by the power of Warwick, that false peer) To aspire unto the crown, and reign as king.

Earl of Northumberland, he slew thy father, And thine ; Clifford : and you both have vow'd revenge, On him, his sons, his favourites, and his friends.

North. And if I be not, heavens be reveng'd on me.

Clif. The hope thereof makes Clifford mourn in steel.

West. What, shall we suffer this ? Let's pull him down. My heart for anger breaks, I cannot speak.

King. Be patient, gentle earl of Westmoreland.

Clif. Patience is for poltroons, such as he ; He durst not sit there had your father liv'd. My gracious lord, here in the parliament Let us assail the family of York.

North. Well hast thou spoken, cousin ; be it so.

King. O, know you not the city favours them, And they have troops of soldiers at their beck ?

Exet. But when the duke is slain they'll quickly fly.

King. Far be it from the thoughts of Henry's heart To make a shambles of the parliament-house : Cousin of Exeter, words, frowns, and threats, Shall be the wars that Henry means to use. Thou factious duke of York, descend my throne ; I am thy sovereign.

York. Thou art deceiv'd, I am thine.

Exet. For shame come down ; he made thee duke of York.

York. 'Twas mine inheritance, as the kingdom is.

Exet. Thy father was a traitor to the crown.

War. Exeter, thou art a traitor to the crown, In following this usurping Henry.

Clif. Whom should he follow but his natural king ?

War. True, Clifford, and that is Richard, duke of York.

King. And shall I stand while thou sittest in my throne ?

York. Content thyself ; it must and shall be so.

War. Be duke of Lancaster, let him be king.

West. Why, he is both king and duke of Lancaster ; And that the earl of Westmoreland shall maintain.

War. And Warwick shall disprove it. You forget That we are those that chas'd you from the field, And slew your father, and with colours spread March'd through the city to the palace gates.

North. No, Warwick, I remember it to my grief : And, by his soul, thou and thy house shall rue it.

West. Plantagenet, of thee, and of thy sons, Thy kinsmen, and thy friends, I'll have more lives, Than drops of blood were in my father's veins.

Clif. Urge it no more, lest, in revenge thereof, I send thee, Warwick, such a messenger As shall revenge his death before I stir.

War. Poor Clifford, how I scorn thy worthless threats !

York. Will ye we show our title to the crown, Or else our swords shall plead it in the field ?

King. What title hast thou, traitor, to the crown ?

Thy father was, as thou art, duke of York ; Thy grandfather, Roger Mortimer, earl of March : I am the son of Henry the Fifth, who tam'd the French, And made the dauphin stoop, and seiz'd upon Their towns and provinces.

War. Talk not of France, since thou hast lost it all.

King. The lord protector lost it, and not I ; When I was crown'd I was but nine months old.

Rich. You're old enough now, and yet methinks you lose : Father, tear the crown from the usurper's head.

<sup>2</sup> It is evident that Richard here either points to the body of Somerset or throws down his head.

Edw. Do so, sweet father ; set it on your head.

Mont. Good brother, as thou lov'st and honour'st arms,
Let's fight it out, and not stand cavilling thus.

Rich. Sound drums and trumpets, and the king will fly.

York. Peace, sons.

North. Peace thou, and give king Henry leave to speak.

King. Ah, Plantagenet, why seekest thou to depose me ?

Are we not both Plantagenets by birth,
And from two brothers lineally descent ?
Suppose by right and equity thou be king ;
Think'st thou that I will leave my kingly seat,
Wherein my father and my grandsire sate ?
No, first shall war unpeople this my realm ;
Ay, and our colours, often borne in France,
And now in England (to our heart's great sorrow),
Shall be my winding-sheet. Why faint you, lords ?
My title's better far than his.

War. Prove it, Henry, and thou shalt be king.

King. Why, Henry the Fourth by conquest got the crown.

York. 'Twas by rebellion 'gainst his sovereign.

King. I know not what to say ; my title's weak.
Tell me, may not a king adopt an heir ?

War. What then ?

King. Then am I lawful king. For Richard
The Second, in the view of many lords,
Resign'd the crown to Henry the Fourth ;
Whose heir my father was, and I am his.

York. I tell thee, he rose against him, being his sovereign,
And made him to resign the crown perforce.

War. Suppose, my lord, he did it unconstrain'd,
Think you that were prejudicial to the crown ?

Exet. No ; for he could not so resign the crown
But that the next heir must succeed and reign.

King. Art thou against us, duke of Exeter ?

Exet. His is the right, and therefore pardon me.

King. All will revolt from me, and turn to him.

North. Plantagenet, for all the claim thou lay'st,
Think not king Henry shall be thus depos'd.

War. Depos'd he shall be, in spite of thee.

North. Tush, Warwick, thou art deceiv'd :

'Tis not thy southern powers of Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk,
And of Kent, that makes thee thus presumptuous and proud,
Can set the duke up in despite of me.

Clif. King Henry, be thy title right or wrong,
Lord Clifford vows to fight in thy defence.

May that ground gape and swallow me alive,
Where I do kneel to him that slew my father.

King. O, Clifford, how thy words revive my soul !

York. Henry of Lancaster, resign thy crown.
What mutter you, or what conspire you, lords ?

War. Do right unto this princely duke of York,
Or I will fill the house with armed men,

Enter Soldiers.

And over the chair of state, where now he sits,
Write up his title with thy usurping blood.

King. O, Warwick, hear me speak
Let me but reign in quiet while I live.

York. Confirm the crown to me, and to mine heirs,
And thou shalt reign in quiet whilst thou liv'st.

King. Convey the soldiers hence, and then I will.

War. Captain, conduct them into Tuthill fields.

Clif. What wrong is this unto the prince your son !

War. What good is this for England and himself !

North. Base, fearful, and despairing Henry !

Clif. How hast thou wronged both thyself and us !

West. I cannot stay to hear these articles.

Clif. Nor I. Come, cousin, let's go tell the queen.

North. Be thou a prey unto the house of York,
And die in bands for this unkingly deed.<sup>1</sup>

Clif. In dreadful war may'st thou be overcome,
Or live in peace, abandon'd and despis'd.

Exet. They seek revenge, and therefore will not yield, my lord.

King. Ah, Exeter !

War. Why should you sigh, my lord ?

King. Not for myself, lord Warwick, but my son,
Whom I unnaturally shall disinherit.

But be it as it may. I here entail the crown

To thee and to thine heirs, conditionally,

That here thou take thine oath,

To cease these civil broils, and whilst I live

To honour me as thy king and sovereign.

York. That oath I willingly take, and will perform.

King. Long live king Henry ! Plantagenet, embrace him.

King. And long live thou, and all thy forward sons.

York. Now York and Lancaster are reconcil'd.

Exet. Accurs'd be he that seeks to make them foes.

[Sound trumpets.]

York. My lord, I'll take my leave, for I'll to Wakefield,
To my castle.

[Exeunt YORK and his Sons.]

War. And I'll keep London, with my soldiers.

[Exit.]

Norf. And I'll to Norfolk, with my followers.

[Exit.]

Mont. And I to the sea, from whence I came.

[Exit.]

Enter the QUEEN and the PRINCE.

Exet. My lord, here comes the queen : I'll steal away.

King. And so will I.

Queen. Nay, stay, or else I'll follow thee.

King. Be patient, gentle queen, and then I'll stay.

Queen. What patience can there be ? ah, timorous man,
Thou hast undone thyself, thy son, and me,
And given our rights unto the house of York.
Art thou a king, and wilt be forc'd to yield ?
Had I been there, the soldiers should have toss'd
Me on their lances' points before I would have Granted to their wills. The duke is made
Protector of the land : stern Faulconbridge
Commands the narrow seas : and think'st thou then
To sleep secure ? I here divorce me, Henry,
From thy bed, until that act of parliament
Be recall'd, wherein thou yieldest to the house of York.
The northern lords that have forsworn thy colours
Will follow mine, if once they see them spread ;
And spread they shall unto thy deep disgrace ;
Come, son, let's away, and leave him here alone.

King. Stay, gentle Margaret, and hear me speak.

Queen. Thou hast spoke too much already, therefore be still.

King. Gentle son Edward, wilt thou stay with me ?

Queen. Ay, to be murder'd by his enemies.

[Exit.]

Prince. When I return with victory from the field,
I'll see your grace : till then I'll follow her.

[Exit.]

King. Poor queen, her love to me and to the prince her son
Makes her in fury thus forget herself.
Revenged may she be on that accursed duke.
Come, cousin of Exeter, stay thou here,
For Clifford and those northern lords be gone,
I fear towards Wakefield, to disturb the duke.

(SCENE II.)

Enter EDWARD, and RICHARD, and MONTAGUE.

Edw. Brother, and cousin Montague, give me leave to speak.

Rich. Nay, I can better play the orator.

Mont. But I have reasons strong and forcible.

Enter the DUKE OF YORK.

York. How now, sons ! what, at a jar amongst yourselves ?

Rich. No, father, but a sweet contention, about that which concerns yourself and us : the crown of England, father.<sup>2</sup>

York. The crown, boy ! Why, Henry's yet alive ;
And I have sworn that he shall reign in quiet
Till his death.

Edw. But I would break an hundred oaths to reign one year.

Rich. An if it please your grace to give me leave,
I'll show your grace the way to save your oath,
And dispossess king Henry from the crown.

York. I prithee, Dick, let me hear thy device.

Rich. Then thus, my lord. An oath is of no moment,
Being not sworn before a lawful magistrate.
Henry is none, but doth usurp your right,
And yet your grace stands bound to him by oath.
Then, noble father, resolve yourself,
And once more claim the crown.

York. Ay, say'st thou so, boy ? Why, then it shall be so.
I am resolv'd to win the crown, or die.

Edward, thou shalt to Edmund Brooke, lord Cobham,
With whom the Kentishmen will willingly rise.

Thou, cousin Montague, shalt to Norfolk straight,
And bid the duke to muster up his soldiers,
And come to me to Wakefield presently.

And Richard, thou to London straight shalt post,

And bid Richard Nevill, earl of Warwick,

To leave the city, and with his men of war

To meet me at Saint Alban's ten days hence.

Myself here, in Sandal castle, will provide

Both men and money to further our attempts.

Now, what news ?

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My lord, the queen with thirty thousand men, accompanied with the earls of Cumberland, Northumberland, and Westmoreland, and others of the house of Lancaster, are marching towards Wakefield, to besiege you in your castle here.

<sup>2</sup> Printed as prose in the edition of 1595.

Enter SIR JOHN and SIR HUGH MORTIMER.

York. A God's name let them come. Cousin Montague, post you hence.
And, boys, stay you with me.
Sir John and sir Hugh Mortimer, mine uncles,
You're welcome to Sandal in a happy hour.
The army of the queen means to besiege us.
Sir John. She shall not need, my lord; we'll meet her in the field.
York. What! with five thousand soldiers, uncle?
Rich. Ay, father, with five hundred for a need.
A woman's general! what should you fear?
York. Indeed, many brave battles have I won in Normandy,
When as the enemy hath been ten to one;
And why should I now doubt of the like success?
I am resolv'd. Come, let's go.
Edw. Let's march away; I hear their drums. [Exit.]

(SCENE III.)

Alarms, and then enter the young EARL OF RUTLAND and his Tutor.

Tutor. Oh, fly, my lord! let's leave the castle,
And fly to Wakefield straight.

Enter CLIFFORD.

Rut. O, tutor, look where bloody Clifford comes.
Clif. Chaplain, away! thy priesthood saves thy life.
As for the brat of that accursed duke,
Whose father slew my father, he shall die.
Tutor. O, Clifford, spare this tender lord, lest heaven
Revenge it on thy head: O, save his life!
Clif. Soldiers, away, and drag him hence perforce:
Away with the villain! [Exit Chaplain.]
How now? what, dead already? or is it fear
That makes him close his eyes? I'll open them.
Rut. So looks the pent-up lion on the lamb,
And so he walks insulting o'er his prey,
And so he turns again to rend his limbs in sunder:
O, Clifford, kill me with thy sword,
And not with such a cruel threat'ning look.
I am too mean a subject for thy wrath;
Be thou reveng'd on men, and let me live.
Clif. In vain thou speakest, poor boy: my father's blood
Hath stopp'd the passage where thy words should enter.
Rut. Then let my father's blood ope it again;
He is a man, and, Clifford, cope with him.
Clif. Had I thy brethren here, their lives and thine
Were not revenge sufficient for me;
Or should I dig up thy forefathers' graves,
And hang their rotten coffins up in chains,
It could not slake mine ire, nor ease my heart.
The sight of any of the house of York
Is as a fury to torment my soul.
Therefore till I root out that cursed line,
And leave not one on earth, I live in hell;
Therefore—
Rut. O, let me pray before I take my death.
To thee I pray: sweet Clifford, pity me.
Clif. Ay, such pity as my rapier's point affords.
Rut. I never did thee hurt; wherefore wilt thou kill me?
Clif. Thy father hath.
Rut. But 'twas ere I was born.
Thou hast one son, for his sake pity me;
Lest in revenge thereof, sith God is just,
He be as miserably slain as I.
O, let me live in prison all my days,
And when I give occasion of offence,
Then let me die, for now thou hast no cause.
Clif. No cause?
Thy father slew my father, therefore die.<sup>1</sup>
Plantagenet, I come, Plantagenet,
And this thy son's blood, cleaving to my blade,
Shall rust upon my weapon, till thy blood,
Congeal'd with his, do make me wipe off both. [Exit.]

(SCENE IV.)

Alarms: enter the DUKE OF YORK, solus.

York. Ah, York, post to thy castle, save thy life!
The goal is lost! Thou house of Lancaster,
Thrice happy chance is it for thee and thine,
That heaven abridg'd my days, and calls me hence.
But God knows what chance hath betide my sons:
But this I know, they have demean'd themselves
Like men born to renown, by life, or death.
Three times this day came Richard to my sight,
And cried "Courage, father: victory or death!"
And twice so oft came Edward to my view,

With purple faulchion, painted to the hilts
In blood of those whom he had slaughtered.
O, hark, I hear the drums. No way to fly;
No way to save my life; and here I stay:
And here my life must end.

Enter the QUEEN, CLIFFORD, NORTHUMBERLAND, and the Soldiers.

Come, bloody Clifford, rough Northumberland,
I dare your quenchless fury to more blood:
This is the butt, and this abides your shot.
North. Yield to our mercies, proud Plantagenet.
Clif. Ay, to such mercy as his ruthless arm
With downright payment lent unto my father.
Now Phaëton hath tumbled from his car,
And made an evening at the noontide prick.
York. My ashes, like the phoenix, may bring forth
A bird that will revenge it on you all:
And in that hope I cast mine eyes to heaven,
Scorning whate'er you can afflict me with.
Why stay you, lords? What! multitudes, and fear?
Clif. So cowards fight when they can fly no longer;
So doves do peck the raven's piercing talons;
So desperate thieves, all hopeless of their lives,
Breathe out invectives 'gainst the officers.
York. O, Clifford, yet bethink thee once again,
And in thy mind o'er-run my former time;
And bite thy tongue, that slander'st him with cowardice,
Whose very look hath made thee quake ere this.
Clif. I will not bandy with thee word for word,
But buckle with thee blows, twice two for one.
Queen. Hold, valiant Clifford! for a thousand causes
I would prolong the traitor's life awhile:—
Wrath makes him deaf;<sup>2</sup> speak thou, Northumberland.
North. Hold, Clifford; do not honour him so much
To prick thy finger, though to wound his heart:
What valour were it when a cur doth grin
For one to thrust his hand between his teeth,
When he might spurn him with his foot away?
'Tis war's prize to take all advantages,
And ten to one is no impeach in wars. [Fight, and take him.]
Clif. Ay, ay, so strives the woodcock with the gin.
North. So doth the coney struggle with the net.
York. So triumph thieves upon their conquer'd booty;
So true men yield, by robbers overmatch'd.
North. What will your grace have done with him?
Queen. Brave warriors, Clifford and Northumberland,
Come, make him stand upon this mole-hill here,
That aim'd at mountains with outstretched arm,
And parted but the shadow with his hand.
Was it you that revell'd in our parliament,
And made a preachment of your high descent?
Where are your mess of sons to back you now?
The wanton Edward, and the lusty George?
Or where is that valiant crook-back'd prodigy,
Dicky, your boy, that, with his grumbling voice,
Was wont to cheer his dad in mutinies?
Or, amongst the rest, where is your darling Rutland?
Look, York, I dipp'd this napkin in the blood
That valiant Clifford, with his rapier's point,
Made issue from the bosom of thy boy:
And, if thine eyes can water for his death,
I give thee this to dry thy cheeks withal.
Alas! poor York: but that I hate thee much,
I should lament thy miserable state.
I prithee grieve to make me merry, York:
Stamp, rave, and fret, that I may sing and dance.
What, hath thy fiery heart so parch'd thine entrails
That not a tear can fall for Rutland's death?
Thou wouldst be fee'd, I see, to make me sport;
York cannot speak unless he wear a crown.—
A crown for York! and, lords, bow low to him.
So, hold you his hands whilst I do set it on.
Ay, now looks he like a king!
This is he that took king Henry's chair,
And this is he was his adopted heir.
But how is it that great Plantagenet
Is crown'd so soon, and broke his holy oath?
As I bethink me, you should not be king
Till our Henry had shook hands with death.
And will you impale your head with Henry's glory?
And rob his temples of the diadem,
Now in his life, against your holy oath?
Oh, 'tis a fault too, too unpardonable.
Off with the crown; and with the crown his head;
And whilst we breathe take time to do him dead.
Clif. That's my office for my father's death.
Queen. Yet stay, and let's hear the orisons he makes.
York. She-wolf of France, but worse than wolves of France,
Whose tongue's more poison'd than the adder's tooth!

How ill beseeming is it in thy sex
To triumph like an Amazonian trull,
Upon his woes whom fortune captivates !
But that thy face is vizard-like, unchanging,
Made impudent by use of evil deeds,
I would assay, proud queen, to make thee blush :
To tell thee of whence thou art, from whom deriv'd,
'Twere shame enough to shame thee, wert thou not shameless.
Thy father bears the type of king of Naples,
Of both the Sicils and Jerusalem,
Yet not so wealthy as an English yoeman.
Hath that poor monarch taught thee to insult ?
It needs not, or it boots thee not, proud queen,
Unless the adage must be verified,
That beggars mounted run their horse to death.
'Tis beauty that oft makes women proud ;
But, God he wots, thy share thereof is small :
'Tis government that makes them most admir'd ;
The contrary doth make thee wonder'd at :
'Tis virtue that makes them seem divine ;
The want thereof makes thee abominable.
Thou art as opposite to every good,
As the Antipodes are unto us,
Or as the south to the septentrion.
O, tiger's heart wrapp'd in a woman's hide !
How couldst thou drain the life-blood of the child,
To bid the father wipe his eyes withal,
And yet be seen to bear a woman's face ?
Women are mild, pitiful, and flexible,
Thou indurate, stern, rough, remorseless.
Bid'st thou me rage ? why, now thou hast thy will.
Wouldst have me weep ? why so, thou hast thy wish.
For raging winds blow up a storm of tears,
And when the rage allays the rain begins.
These tears are my sweet Rutland's obsequies ;
And every drop begs vengeance as it falls,
On thee, fell Clifford, and thee,<sup>1</sup> false Frenchwoman.
North. Beshrew me, but his passions move me so
As hardly I can check mine eyes from tears.
York. That face of his the hungry cannibals
Could not have touch'd, would not have stain'd with blood ;
But you are more inhuman, more inexorable,
O ten times more, than tigers of Arcadia.
See, ruthless queen, a hapless father's tears.
This cloth thou dipp'dst in blood of my sweet boy,
And lo, with tears I wash the blood away.
Keep thou the napkin, and go boast of that ;
And if thou tell the heavy<sup>2</sup> story well,
Upon my soul, the hearers will shed tears ;
Ay, even my foes will shed fast-falling tears,
And say, Alas ! it was a piteous deed.
Here, take the crown, and with the crown my curse ;
And in thy need such comfort come to thee,
As now I reap at thy too cruel hands.
Hard-hearted Clifford, take me from the world ;
My soul to heaven, my blood upon your heads.
North. Had he been slaughterman of all my kin,
I could not choose but weep with him, to see
How inward anger grips his heart.
Queen. What, weeping ripe, my lord Northumberland ?
Think but upon the wrong he did us all,
And that will quickly dry your melting tears.
Clif. There's for my oath, there's for my father's death. [Stabs him.
Queen. And there's to right our gentle-hearted king. [Stabs him.
York. Open thy gates of mercy, gracious God !
My soul flies forth to meet with thee. [Dies.
Queen. Off with his head, and set it on York gates ;
So York may overlook the town of York. [Exeunt omnes.

(ACT II.)

(SCENE I.)

Enter EDWARD and RICHARD, with drum and Soldiers.

Edw. After this dangerous fight and hapless war,
How doth my noble brother Richard fare ?
Rich. I cannot joy until I be resolv'd
Where our right valiant father is become.
How often did I see him bear himself
As doth a lion midst a herd of neat ;
So fled the enemies from our valiant father ;<sup>3</sup>
Methinks 'tis pride enough to be his son. [Three suns appear in the air.
Edw. Lo, how the morning opes her golden gates,
And takes her farewell of the glorious sun !
Dazzle mine eyes, or do I see three suns ?

Rich. Three glorious suns,
Not separated by a racking cloud,
But sever'd in a pale clear-shining sky.
See, see, they join, embrace, and seem to kiss,
As if they vow'd some league inviolate.
Now are they but one lamp, one light, one sun.
In this the heaven doth figure some event.
Edw. I think it cites us, brother, to the field ;
That we, the sons of brave Plantagenet,
Already each one shining by his meed,
May join in one, and overpeer the world
As this the earth ; and, therefore, henceforward,
I'll bear upon my target three fair shining suns.
But what art thou that look'st so heavily ?

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. O, one that was a woeful looker-on
When as the noble duke of York was slain.
Edw. O, speak no more, for I can hear no more.
Rich. Tell on thy tale, for I will hear it all.
Mess. When as the noble duke was put to flight,
And then pursued by Clifford and the queen,
And many soldiers more, who all at once
Let drive at him, and forc'd the duke to yield ;
And then they set him on a mole-hill there,
And crown'd the gracious duke in high despite,
Who then with tears began to wail his fall.
The ruthless queen, perceiving he did weep,
Gave him a handkerchief to wipe his eyes,
Dipp'd in the blood of sweet young Rutland,
By rough Clifford slain : who weeping took it up.
Then through his breast they thrust their bloody swords,
Who like a lamb fell at the butchers' feet.
Then on the gates of York they set his head,
And there it doth remain the piteous spectacle
That e'er mine eyes beheld.
Edw. Sweet duke of York, our prop to lean upon,
Now thou art gone there is no hope for us :
Now my soul's palace is become a prison.
O, would she break from compass of my breast,
For never shall I have more joy.
Rich. I cannot weep, for all my breast's moisture
Scarce serves to quench my furnace burning hate.
I cannot joy till this white rose be dyed
Even in the heart-blood of the house of Lancaster.
Richard, I bear thy name, and I'll revenge thy death,
Or die myself in seeking of revenge.
Edw. His name that valiant duke hath left with thee ;
His chair and dukedom, that remains for me.
Rich. Nay, if thou be that princely eagle's biró,
Show thy descent by gazing 'gainst the sun :
For chair and dukedom, throne and kingdom say ;
For either that is thine, or else thou wert not his.

Enter the EARL OF WARWICK, MONTAGUE, with drum, Ancient, and Soldiers.

War. How now, fair lords : what fare ? What news abroad ?
Rich. Ah, Warwick, should we report
The baleful news, and, at each word's deliverance,
Stab poniards in our flesh till all were told,
The words would add more anguish than the wounds.<sup>4</sup>
Ah, valiant lord, the duke of York is slain.
Edw. Ah, Warwick ! Warwick ! that Plantagenet
Which held thee dear, ay, even as his soul's redemption,
Is by the stern lord Clifford done to death.
War. Ten days ago I drown'd those news in tears :
And now, to add more measure to your woes,
I come to tell you things<sup>5</sup> since then befallen.
After the bloody fray at Wakefield fought,
Where your brave father breath'd his latest gasp,
Tidings, as swiftly as the post could run,
Were brought me of your loss, and his departure.
I then in London, keeper of the king,
Muster'd my soldiers, gather'd flocks of friends,
And very well appointed, as I thought,
March'd to Saint Alban's to intercept the queen,
Bearing the king in my behalf along :
For by my scouts I was advertised
That she was coming, with a full intent
To dash your late decree in parliament
Touching king Henry's heirs, and your succession.
Short tale to make—we at Saint Alban's met,
Our battles join'd, and both sides fiercely fought :
But, whether 'twas the coldness of the king
(He look'd full gently on his warlike queen)
That robb'd my soldiers of their heated spleen ;
Or whether 'twas report of his success,

Or more than common fear of Clifford's rigour,
Who thunders to his captains—blood and death,
I cannot tell: but, to conclude with truth,
Their weapons like to lightnings went and came;
Our soldiers—like the night owl's lazy flight,
Or like an idle thresher with the flail—
Fell gently down, as if they smote their friends:
I cheer'd them up with justice of the cause,
With promise of high pay, and great rewards:
But all in vain; they had no hearts to fight,
Nor we in them no hope to win the day:
So that we fled; the king unto the queen;
Lord George your brother, Norfolk, and myself,
In haste, post haste, are come to join with you;
For in the marches here we heard you were
Making another head to fight again.

Edw. Thanks, gentle Warwick.

How far hence is the duke with his power?
And when came George from Burgundy to England?

War. Some five miles off the duke is with his power.

But as for your brother, he was lately sent
From your kind aunt, duchess of Burgundy,
With aid of soldiers 'gainst this needful war.

Rich. 'Twas odds, belike, when valiant Warwick fled.
Oft have I heard thy praises in pursuit,
But ne'er, till now, thy scandal of retire.

War. Nor now my scandal, Richard, dost thou hear:
For thou shalt know that this right hand of mine
Can pluck the diadem from faint Henry's head,
And wring the awful sceptre from his fist,
Were he as famous and as bold in war
As he is fam'd for mildness, peace, and prayer.

Rich. I know it well, lord Warwick: blame me not;
'Twas love I bear thy glories made me speak.
But in this troublous time, what's to be done?
Shall we go throw away our coats of steel,
And clad our bodies in black mourning gowns,
Numbering our Ave-Maries with our beads?
Or shall we on the helmets of our foes
Tell our devotion with revengeful arms?
If for the last, say Ay, and to it, lords.

War. Why therefore Warwick came to find you out;
And therefore comes my brother Montague.
Attend me, lords. The proud, insulting queen,
With Clifford, and the haught Northumberland,
And of their feather many mo proud birds,
Have wrought the easy melting king like wax.
He sware consent to your succession,
His oath enrolled in the parliament;
But now to London all the crew are gone,
To frustrate his oath, or what besides
May make against the house of Lancaster.
Their power I guess them fifty thousand strong.
Now if the help of Norfolk and myself
Can but amount to eight-and-forty<sup>1</sup> thousand
With all the friends that thou, brave earl of March,
Among the loving Welshmen canst procure,
Why, via, to London will we march amain,
And once again bestride our foaming steeds,
And once again cry charge upon the foe,
But never once again turn back and fly.

Rich. Ay, now, methinks, I hear great Warwick speak;
Ne'er may he live to see a sunshine day,
That cries retire, when Warwick bids him stay!

Edw. Lord Warwick, on thy shoulder will I lean,
And when thou faint'st,
Must Edward fall, which peril heaven forefend!

War. No longer earl of March, but duke of York;
The next degree is England's royal king;
And king of England shalt thou be proclaim'd
In every borough as we pass along:
And he that casts not up his cap for joy
Shall for the offence make forfeit of his head.
King Edward, valiant Richard, Montague,
Stay we no longer dreaming of renown,
But forward to effect these resolutions.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. The duke of Norfolk sends you word by me,
The queen is coming with a puissant power,
And craves your company for speedy counse.

War. Why, then it sorts, brave lords; let's march away. [Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE II.)

Enter the KING and QUEEN, PRINCE EDWARD, and the northern Earls, with drum and Soldiers.

Queen. Welcome, my lord, to this brave town of York.

Yonder's the head of that ambitious enemy
That sought to be impaled with your crown.
Doth not the object please your eye, my lord?

King. Even as the rocks please them that fear their wrack.
Withhold revenge, dear God! 'tis not my fault,
Nor wittingly have I infring'd my vow.

Clif. My gracious iord, this too much lenity
And harmful pity must be laid aside.
To whom do lions cast their gentle looks?
Not to the beasts that would usurp his (their) den,
Whose hand is that the savage bear doth lick?
Not his that spoils his young before his face.
Who 'scapes the lurking serpent's mortal sting?
Not he that sets his foot upon her back.
The smallest worm will turn being trodden on,
And doves will peck in rescue of their brood.
Ambitious York did level at thy crown,
Thou smiling, while he knit his angry brows:
He, but a duke, would have his son a king,
And raise his issue like a loving sire.
Thou, being a king, bless'd with a goodly son,
Didst give consent to disinherit him,
Which argued thee a most unnatural father.
Unreasonable creatures feed their young;
And though man's face be fearful to their eyes,
Yet, in protection of their tender ones,
Who hath not seen them (even with those same wings
Which they have sometimes used in fearful flight)
Make war with him that climbs unto their nest,
Offering their own lives in their young's defence?
For shame, my lord! make them your precedent!
Were it not pity that this goodly boy
Should lose his birthright through his father's fault;
And long hereafter say unto his child,
"What my great-grandfather and grandsire got,
My careless father fondly gave away?"
Look on the boy, and let his manly face,
Which promiseth successful fortune to us all,
Steel thy melting thoughts,
To keep thine own, and leave thine own with him.

King. Full well hath Clifford play'd the orator,
Inferring arguments of mighty force.
But tell me, didst thou never yet hear tell
That things evil<sup>2</sup> got had ever bad success?
And happy ever was it for that son,
Whose father for his hoarding went to hell?
I leave my son my virtuous deeds behind;
And would my father had left me no more;
For all the rest is held at such a rate
As asks a thousand times more care to keep
Than may the present profit countervail.
Ah, cousin York, would thy best friends did know
How it doth grieve me that thy head stands there.

Queen. My lord, this harmful pity makes your followers faint,
You promis'd knighthood to your princely son;
Unsheathe your sword, and straightway<sup>3</sup> dub him knight.
Kneel down, Edward.

King. Edward Plantagenet, arise a knight:
And learn this lesson, boy,<sup>4</sup>—draw thy sword in right.

Prince. My gracious father, by your kingly leave,
I'll draw it as apparent to the crown,
And in that quarrel use it to the death.

North. Why, that is spoken like a toward prince.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Royal commanders, be in readiness;
For, with a band of fifty thousand men,
Comes Warwick backing of the duke of York;
And in the towns whereas they pass along,
Proclaims him king, and many fly to him:
Prepare your battles, for they be at hand.

Clif. I would your highness would depart the field;
The queen hath best success when you are absent.

Queen. Do, good my lord, and leave us to our fortunes.

King. Why, that's my fortune, therefore I'll stay still.

Clif. Be it with resolution then to fight.

Prince. Good father, cheer these noble lords;
Unsheathe your sword, sweet father; cry Saint George.

Clif. Pitch we our battle here, for hence we will not move.

Enter the House of YORK.

Edw. Now, perjurd Henry, wilt thou yield thy crown,
And kneel for mercy at thy sovereign's feet?

Queen. Go rate thy minions, proud insulting boy!
Becomes it thee to be thus malapert
Before thy king and lawful sovereign?

Straightway. So in the quarto of 1619; in that of 1595, straight do.

Edw. I am his king, and he should bend his knee ;
I was adopted heir by his consent.

George. Since when he hath broke his oath ; for, as we hear,
You that are king, though he do wear the crown,
Have caus'd him by new act of parliament
To blot our brother out, and put his own son in.

Clif. And reason, George :
Who should succeed the father but the son ?

Rich. Are you there, butcher ?

Clif. Ay, crook-back, here I stand to answer thee,
Or any of your sort.

Rich. 'Twas you that kill'd young Rutland, was it not ?

Clif. Yes, and old York too, and yet not satisfied.

Rich. For God's sake, lords, give signal to the fight.

War. What say'st thou, Henry, wilt thou yield thy crown ?

Queen. What, long-tongued Warwick, dare you speak ?

When you and I met at Saint Alban's last,

Your legs did better service than your hands.

War. Ay, then 'twas my turn to flee,<sup>1</sup> but now 'tis thine.

Clif. You said so<sup>2</sup> much before, and yet you fled.

War. 'Twas not your valour, Clifford, that<sup>3</sup> drove me thence.

North. No, nor your manhood, Warwick, that could make you stay.

Rich. Northumberland, Northumberland, we hold Thee reverently.

Break off the parley, for scarce I can refrain

The execution of my big swollen heart,

Against that Clifford there, that cruel child-killer.<sup>4</sup>

Clif. Why, I kill'd thy father ; call'st thou him a child ?

Rich. Ay, like a villain, and a treacherous coward,

As thou didst kill our tender brother Rutland ;

But ere sunset I'll make thee curse the deed.

King. Have done with words, great lords, and hear me speak.

Queen. Defy them then, or else hold close thy lips.

King. I prithee give no limits to my tongue ;

I am a king, and privileg'd to speak.<sup>5</sup>

Clif. My lord, the wound that bred this meeting here

Cannot be cur'd with words ; therefore be still.

Rich. Then, executioner, unsheathe thy sword :

By Him that made us all, I am resolv'd

That Clifford's manhood hangs upon his tongue.

Edw. What say'st thou, Henry, shall I have my right or no ?

A thousand men have broke their fast to-day,

That ne'er shall dine unless thou yield the crown.

War. If thou deny, their bloods be on thy head ;

For York in justice puts his armour on.

Prince. If all be right that Warwick says is right,

There is no wrong, but all things must be right.

Rich. Whosoever got thee, there thy mother stands ;

For well I wot thou hast thy mother's tongue.

Queen. But thou art neither like thy sire nor dam,

But like a foul misshapen stigmatic,

Mark'd by the destinies to be avoided,

As venom toads, or lizards' fainting looks.

Rich. Iron of Naples, hid with English gilt,

Thy father bears the title of a king,

As if a channel should be call'd the sea :

Sham'st thou not, knowing from whence thou art deriv'd,

To parley thus with England's lawful heirs ?

Edw. A wisp of straw were worth a thousand crowns,

To make that shameless callet know herself.

Thy husband's father revell'd in the heart of France,

And tam'd the French, and made the Dauphin stoop :

And had he match'd according to his state,

He might have kept that glory till this day.

But when he took a beggar to his bed,

And grac'd thy poor sire with his bridal day,

Then that sunshine bred a shower for him,

Which wash'd his father's fortunes out of France,

And heap'd seditions on his crown at home.

For what hath mov'd these tumults but thy pride ?

Hadst thou been meek, our title yet had slept ;

And we, in pity of the gentle king,

Had slipp'd our claim until another age.

Geo. But when we saw our summer brought thee gain,

And that the harvest brought us no increase,

We set the axe to thy usurping root :

And though the edge have something hit ourselves,

Yet know thou we will never cease to strike

Till we have hewn thee down,

Or bath'd thy growing with our heated bloods.

Edw. And, in this resolution, I defy thee ;

Nor willing any longer conference,

Since thou deniest the gentle king to speak.

Sound trumpets ! let our bloody colours wave !

And either victory, or else a grave.

Queen. Stay, Edward, stay :

Edw. Hence, wrangling woman ; I'll no longer stay :

Thy words will cost ten thousand lives to-day.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE III.)

Alarms. Enter WARWICK.

War. Sore spent with toil, as runners with the race,
I lay me down a little while to breathe :
For strokes receiv'd, and many blows repaid,
Hath robb'd my strong-knit sinews of their strength,
And, force perforce, needs must I rest myself.

Enter EDWARD.

Edw. Smile, gentle heavens ! or strike, ungentle death !
That we may die unless we gain the day :
What fatal star malignant frowns from heaven,
Upon the harmless line of York's true house ?

Enter GEORGE.

Geo. Come, brother, come ; let's to the field again,
For yet there's hope enough to win the day :
Then let us back to cheer our fainting troops,
Lest they retire now we have left the field.

War. How now, my lords, what hap ? what hope of good ?

Enter RICHARD, running.

Rich. Ah, Warwick, why hast thou withdrawn thyself ?
Thy noble father in the thickest throngs
Cried still for Warwick, his thrice valiant son,
Until with thousand swords he was beset,
And many wounds made in his aged breast ;
And as he tottering sate upon his steed,
He wail'd his hand to me, and cried aloud,
" Richard, commend me to my valiant son ;"
And still he cried, " Warwick, revenge my death ;"
And with those words he tumbled off his horse,
And so the noble Salisbury gave up the ghost.

War. Then let the earth be drunken with his blood :
I'll kill my horse, because I will not fly :
And here to God of heaven I make a vow,
Never to pass from forth this bloody field
Till I am full revenged for his death.

Edw. Lord Warwick, I do bend my knees with thine,
And in that vow now join my soul to thee.
Thou setter up and puller down of kings,
Vouchsafe a gentle victory to us,
Or let us die before we lose the day !

Geo. Then let us haste to cheer the soldiers' hearts,
And call them pillars that will stand to us,
And highly promise to remunerate
Their trusty service in these dangerous wars.

Rich. Come, come away, and stand not to debate,
For yet is hope of fortune good enough.

Brothers, give me your hands, and let us part
And take our leaves, until we meet again,
Where'er it be, in heaven or in earth.
Now I, that never wept, now melt in woe,
To see these dire mishaps continue so.

Warwick, farewell.

War. Away, away ! once more, sweet lords, farewell.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE IV.)

Alarms, and then enter RICHARD at one door, and CLIFFORD at the other.

Rich. A Clifford, a Clifford !

Clif. A Richard, a Richard !

Rich. Now, Clifford, for York and young Rutland's death,
This thirsty sword, that longs to drink thy blood,
Shall lop thy limbs, and slice thy cursed heart,
For to revenge the murders thou hast made.

Clif. Now, Richard, I am with thee here alone :
This is the hand that stabb'd thy father York ;
And this the hand that slew thy brother Rutland ;
And here's the heart that triumphs in their deaths,
And cheers these hands that slew thy sire and brother,
To execute the like upon thyself :
And so, have at thee.

Alarms. They fight, and then enters WARWICK and rescues RICHARD, and then exeunt omnes.

<sup>4</sup> This metrical arrangement, which is that of the quarto of 1619, is confused in that of 1595.

<sup>5</sup> So the quarto of 1595. In that of 1619 it is—

" I being a king am privileged to speak."

That, in quarto of 1595, is omitted in that of 1619.

(SCENE V.)

Alarms still, and then enter HENRY solus.

Hen. O gracious God of heaven, look down on us,
And set some ends to these incessant griefs!
How like a mastless ship upon the seas
This woeful battle doth continue still!
Now leaning this way, now to that side driven,
And none doth know to whom the day will fall.
Oh, would my death might stay these civil jars!
Would I had never reign'd, nor ne'er been king!
Margaret and Clifford chide me from the field,
Swearing they had best success when I was thence.
Would God that I were dead, so all were well:
Or would my crown suffice, I were content
To yield it them, and live a private life.

Enter a Soldier with a dead man in his arms.

Sol. Ill blows the wind that profits nobody.
This man, that I have slain in fight to-day,
May be possessed of some store of crowns;
And I will search to find them if I can.
But stay; methinks it is my father's face:
Oh, I! 'tis he whom I have slain in fight.
From London was I press'd out by the king;
My father he came on the part of York;
And in this conflict I have slain my father.
Oh pardon, God! I knew not what I did!
And pardon, father, for I knew thee not!

Enter another Soldier with a dead man.

2 Sol. Lie there, thou that fought'st with me so stoutly;
Now let me see what store of gold thou hast.
But stay, methinks this is no famous face:
Oh no, it is my son that I have slain in fight!
Oh, monstrous times, begetting such events;
How cruel, bloody, and ironous,<sup>1</sup>
This deadly quarrel daily doth beget!
Poor boy, thy father gave thee life too late,
And hath bereav'd thee of thy life too soon!

King. Woe above woe! grief more than common grief!
Whilst lions war and battle for their dens,
Poor lambs do feel the rigour of their wraths:
The red rose and the white are on his face,
The fatal colours of our striving houses.
Wither one rose, and let the other flourish,
For if you strive, ten thousand lives must perish.

1 Sol. How will my mother, for my father's death,
Take on with me, and ne'er be satisfied!

2 Sol. How will my wife, for slaughter of my son,
Take on with me, and ne'er be satisfied!

King. How will the people now misdeem their king!
Oh, would my death their minds could satisfy!

1 Sol. Was ever son so rude his father's blood to spill?

2 Sol. Was ever father so unnatural his son to kill?

King. Was ever king thus griev'd and vexed still?

1 Sol. I'll bear thee hence from this accursed place,
For woe is me to see my father's face.

[Exit with his Father.]

2 Sol. I'll bear thee hence, and let them fight that will,
For I have murder'd where I should not kill.

[Exit with his Son.]

King. Weep, wretched man, I'll lay thee tear for tear:
Here sits a king, as woebegone as thee.

Alarms, and enter the QUEEN.

Queen. Away, my lord, to Berwick presently!
The day is lost, our friends are murdered;
No help is left for us, therefore away.

Enter PRINCE EDWARD.

Prince. Oh father, fly; our men have left the field;
Take horse, sweet father, let us save ourselves.

Enter EXETER.

Exet. Away, my lord, for vengeance comes along with him:
Nay, stand not to expostulate; make haste,
Or else come after: I'll away before.

King. Nay, stay, good Exeter, for I'll along with thee.

(SCENE VI.)

Enter CLIFFORD, wounded, with an arrow in his neck.

Clif. Here burns my candle out,
That, whilst it lasted, gave king Henry light.
Ah, Lancaster, I fear thine overthrow,

More than my body's parting from my soul.
My love, and fear, glued many friends to thee;
And now I die, that tough commixture melts.
Impairing Henry strengthen'd misproud York:
The common people swarm like summer flies,
And whither fly the gnats but to the sun?
And who shines now but Henry's enemy?
Oh, Phœbus! hadst thou never given consent
That Phaëton should check thy fiery steeds,
Thy burning car had never scorch'd the earth.
And, Henry, hadst thou liv'd as kings should do,
And as thy father and his father did,
Giving no foot unto the house of York,
I and ten thousand in this woeful land
Had left no mourning widows for our deaths,
And thou this day hadst kept thy throne in peace.
For what doth cherish weeds but gentle air?
And what makes robbers bold but lenity?
Bootless are plaints, and cureless are my wounds:
No way to fly, no strength to hold out flight;
The foe is merciless and will not pity me,
And at their hands I have deserv'd no pity.
The air is got into my bleeding wounds,
And much effuse of blood doth make me faint.
Come, York and Richard, Warwick and the rest;
I stabb'd your fathers, now come, split my breast.

Enter EDWARD, RICHARD, WARWICK, and Soldiers.

Edw. Thus far our fortunes keep an upward course,
And we are grac'd with wreaths of victory.
Some troops pursue the bloody-minded queen,
That now towards Berwick doth post amain.
But think you that Clifford is fled away with them?

War. No, 'tis impossible he should escape;
For though before his face I speak the words,
Your brother Richard mark'd him for the grave,
And, wheresoe'er he be, I warrant him dead. [CLIFFORD groans, and then dies.]

Edw. Hark! what soul is this that takes his heavy leave?

Rich. A deadly groan, like life and death's departure.

Edw. See who it is: and now the battle's ended,
Friend, or foe, let him be friendly used.

Rich. Reverse that doom of mercy, for 'tis Clifford,
Who kill'd our tender brother Rutland,
And stabb'd our princely father, duke of York.

War. From off the gates of York fetch down the head,
Your father's head, which Clifford placed there:
Instead of that, let his supply the room.
Measure for measure must be answered.

Edw. Bring forth that fatal screech-owl to our house,
That nothing sung to us but blood and death;
Now his evil-boding tongue no more shall speak.

War. I think his understanding is bereft.
Say, Clifford, dost thou know who speaks to thee?
Dark cloudy death o'ershades his beams of life,
And he nor sees, nor hears us what we say.

Rich. Oh, would he did! and so, perhaps, he doth;
And 'tis his policy, that in the time of death
He might avoid such bitter storms as he
In his hour of death did give unto our father.

Geo. Richard, if thou think'st so, vex him with eager words.

Rich. Clifford, ask mercy and obtain no grace.

Edw. Clifford, repent in bootless penitence.

War. Clifford, devise excuses for thy fault.

Geo. Whilst we devise fell tortures for thy fault.

Rich. Thou pitied'st York, and I am son to York.

Edw. Thou pitied'st Rutland, and I will pity thee.

Geo. Where's Captain Margaret to fence you now?

War. They mock thee, Clifford; swear as thou wast wont.

Rich. What, not an oath? Nay, then I know he's dead:

'Tis hard when Clifford cannot 'ford his friend an oath:

By this I know he's dead: And by my soul,

Would this right hand buy but an hour's life,

(That I in all contempt might rail at him,)

I'd cut it off, and with the issuing blood

Stifle the villain, whose instanced thirst

York and young Rutland could not satisfy.

War. Ay, but he's dead: Off with the traitor's head,

And rear it in the place your father's stands.

And now to London with triumphant march,

There to be crowned England's lawful king.

From thence shall Warwick cross the seas to France,

And ask the lady Bona for thy queen.

So shalt thou sinew both these lands together,

And having France thy friend, thou need'st not dread

The scattered foe that hopes to rise again.

And though they cannot greatly sting to hurt,

Yet look to have them busy to offend thine ears.

First, I'll see the coronation done,

And afterward I'll cross the seas to France,

To effect this marriage, if it please my lord.

Edw. Even as thou wilt, good Warwick, let it be.

Ironous in the quarto of 1619; ironious in that of 1595.

But first before we go, George, kneel down.
We here create thee duke of Clarence,
And girt thee with the sword;
Our younger brother, Richard, duke of Gloster,
Warwick as myself shall do and undo as himself pleaseth best.
Rich. Let me be duke of Clarence, George of Gloster,
For Gloster's dukedom is too ominous.
War. Tush! that's a childish observation.
Richard, be duke of Gloster: Now to London,
To see these honours in possession.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(ACT III.)

(SCENE I.)

Enter Two Keepers with bow and arrows.

Keep. Come, let's take our stands upon this hill;
And by and by the deer will come this way.
But stay, here comes a man, let's listen him awhile.

Enter KING HENRY disguised.

King. From Scotland am I stolen, even of pure love,
And thus disguis'd, to greet my native land.
No, Henry, no, it is no land of thine;
No bending knee will call thee Cæsar now,
No humble suitors sue to thee for right;
For how canst thou help them, and not thyself?
Keep. Ay, marry, sir, here's a deer, his skin is a keeper's fee. Sirrah, stand close, for, as I think, this is the king King Edward hath deposed.
King. My queen and son, poor souls, are gone to France;
And, as I hear, the great commanding Warwick,
To entreat a marriage with the lady Bona.
If this be true, poor queen and son,
Your labour is but spent in vain;
For Lewis is a prince soon won with words,
And Warwick is a subtle orator.
He laughs, and says his Edward is install'd;
She weeps, and says her Henry is depos'd:
He, on his right hand, asking a wife for Edward;
She, on his left side, craving aid for Henry.
Keep. What art thou that talk'st of kings and queens?
King. More than I seem, for less I should not be:
A man at least, and more I cannot be:
And men may talk of kings, and why not I?
Keep. Ay, but thou talk'st as if thou wert a king thyself.
King. Why, so I am in mind, though not in show.
Keep. And if thou be a king, where is thy crown?
King. My crown is in my heart, not on my head;
My crown is call'd content,
A crown that kings do seldom times enjoy.
Keep. And if thou be a king crown'd with content,
Your crown content and you must be content
To go with us unto the officer,
For, as we think, you are our quondam king,
King Edward hath depos'd;
And therefore we charge you, in God's name and the king's,
To go along with us unto the officers.
King. God's name be fulfill'd, your king's name be obey'd;
And be you kings; command, and I'll obey.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE II.)

Enter KING EDWARD, CLARENCE, and GLOSTER, MONTAGUE, HASTINGS, and the LADY GREY.

K. Edw. Brothers of Clarence and of Gloucester,
This lady's husband here, sir Richard Grey,
At the battle of Saint Alban's did lose his life:
His lands then were seiz'd on by the conqueror.
Her suit is now to repossess those lands:
And sith in quarrel of the house of York
The noble gentleman did lose his life,
In honour we cannot deny her suit.
Glo. Your highness shall do well to grant it then.
K. Edw. Ay, so I will; but yet I'll make a pause.
Glo. Ay? is the wind in that door?
Cl. I see the lady hath some thing to grant
Before the king will grant her humble suit.
Glo. He knows the game: how well he keeps the wind!
K. Edw. Widow, come some other time to know our mind.
Lady G. May it please your grace, I cannot brook delays;
I beseech your highness to despatch me now.
K. Edw. Lords, give us leave; we mean to try this widow's wit.

Cl. Ay, good leave have you.
Glo. For you will have leave,
Till youth take leave, and leave you to your crutch.
K. Edw. Come hither, widow; how many children hast thou?
Cl. I think he means to beg a child on her.
Glo. Nay, whip me then, he'll rather give her two.
Lady G. Three, my most gracious lord.
Glo. You shall have four an<sup>1</sup> you will be rul'd by him.
K. Edw. Were't not pity they should lose their father's lands?
Lady G. Be pitiful then, dread lord, and grant it them.
K. Edw. I'll tell thee how these lands are to be got.
Lady G. So shall you bind me to your highness' service.
K. Edw. What service wilt thou do me, if I grant it them?
Lady G. Even what your highness shall command.
Glo. Nay, then, widow, I'll warrant you all your husband's lands,
If you grant to do what he commands.
Fight close, or in good faith you catch a clap.
Cl. Nay, I fear her not unless she fall.
Glo. Marry, gods forbot, man, for he'll take 'vantage then.
Lady G. Why stops my lord? shall I not know my task?
K. Edw. An easy task, 'tis but to love a king.
Lady G. That's soon perform'd, because I am a subject.
K. Edw. Why, then thy husband's lands I freely give thee.
Lady G. I take my leave with many thousand thanks.
Cl. The match is made; she seals it with a curtsy.
K. Edw. Stay, widow, stay; what love dost thou think
I sue so much to get?
Lady G. My humble service,
Such as subjects owe, and the laws command.
K. Edw. No, by my troth, I meant no such love,
But to tell thee the truth, I aim to lie with thee.
Lady G. To tell you plain, my lord, I had rather lie in prison.
K. Edw. Why, then thou canst not get thy husband's lands.
Lady G. Then mine honesty shall be my dower,
For by that loss I will not purchase them.
K. Edw. Herein thou wrong'st thy children mightily.
Lady G. Herein your highness wrongs both them and me.
But, mighty lord, this merry inclination
Agrees not with the sadness of my suit.
Please it your highness to dismiss me, either with ay or no.
K. Edw. Ay, if thou say ay to my request;
No, if thou say no to my demand.
Lady G. Then no, my lord; my suit is at an end.
Glo. The widow likes him not; she bends the brow.
Cl. Why, he is the bluntest wooer in Christendom.
K. Edw. Her looks are all replete with majesty:
One way, or other, she is for a king;
And she shall be my love, or else my queen.
Say, that king Edward took thee for his queen.
Lady G. 'Tis better said than done, my gracious lord;
I am a subject fit to jest withal,
But far unfit to be a sovereign.
K. Edw. Sweet widow, by my state I swear,
I speak no more than what my heart intends,
And that is, to enjoy thee for my love.
Lady G. And that is more than I will yield unto;
I know I am too bad to be your queen,
And yet too good to be your concubine.
K. Edw. You cavil, widow; I did mean my queen.
Lady G. Your grace would be loath my sons should call you father.
K. Edw. No more than when my daughters call thee mother.
Thou art a widow, and thou hast some children,
And, by God's mother, I, being but a bachelor,
Have other some: Why, 'tis a happy thing
To be the father of many children.
Argue no more, for thou shalt be my queen.
Glo. The ghostly father now hath done his shrift.
Cl. When he was made a shriver, 'twas for shift.
K. Edw. Brothers, you muse what talk the widow and I have had.
You would think it strange if I should marry her.
Cl. Marry her, my lord! to whom?
K. Edw. Why, Clarence, to myself.
Glo. That would be ten days' wonder at the least.
Cl. Why, that's a day longer than a wonder lasts.
Glo. And so much more are the wonders in extremes.
K. Edw. Well, jest on, brothers; I can tell you
Her suit is granted for her husband's lands.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. An it please your grace, Henry your foe is taken,
And brought as prisoner to your palace gates.
K. Edw. Away with him, and send him to the Tower;
And let's go question with the man about
His apprehension. Lords, along, and use
This lady honourably.

[Exeunt omnes.]

Manet GLOSTER, and speaks.

Glo. Ay, Edward will use women honourably.
Would he were wasted, marrow, bones, and all,

<sup>1</sup> An in the quarto of 1595; if in that of 1619.

That from his loins no issue might succeed,
To hinder me from the golden time I look for!
For I am not yet look'd on in the world:
First is there Edward, Clarence, and Henry,
And his son, and all they look for issue
Of their loins, ere I can plant myself:
A cold premeditation for my purpose!
What other pleasure is there in the world beside?
I will go clad my body in gay ornaments,
And lull myself within a lady's lap,
And witch sweet ladies with my words and looks.
Oh monstrous man, to harbour such a thought!
Why, love did scorn me in my mother's womb;
And, for I should not deal in her affairs,
She did corrupt frail nature in the flesh,
And plac'd an envious mountain on my back,
Where sits deformity to mock my body;
To dry mine arm up like a wither'd shrimp;
To make my legs of an unequal size.
And am I then a man to be belov'd;
Easier for me to compass twenty crowns.
Tut! I can smile, and murder when I smile;
I cry content to that which grieves me most;
I can add colours to the chameleon;
And for a need change shapes with Proteus,
And set the aspiring Catiline to school.
Can I do this, and cannot get the crown?
Tush! were it ten times higher, I'll pull it down.

[Exit.]

(SCENE III.)

Enter KING LEWIS, and the LADY BONA, QUEEN MARGARET, PRINCE EDWARD, and OXFORD, with others.

Lew. Welcome, queen Margaret, to the court of France.
It fits not Lewis to sit while thou dost stand;
Sit by my side, and here I vow to thee,
Thou shalt have aid to repossess thy right,
And beat proud Edward from his usurped seat,
And place king Henry in his former rule.

Queen. I humbly thank your royal majesty;
And pray the God of heaven to bless thy state,
Great king of France, that thus regards our wrongs.

Enter WARWICK.

Lew. How now! who is this?

Queen. Our earl of Warwick, Edward's chiefest friend.

Lew. Welcome, brave Warwick; what brings thee to France

War. From worthy Edward, king of England,
My lord and sovereign, and thy vowed friend,
I come in kindness and unfeigned love;
First to do greetings to thy royal person,
And then to claim a league of amity,
And lastly to confirm that amity
With nuptial knot, if thou vouchsafe to grant
That virtuous lady Bona, thy fair sister,
To England's king in lawful marriage.

Queen. And if this go forward all our hope is done.

War. And, gracious madam, in our king's behalf,
I am commanded, with your love and favour,
Humbly to kiss your hand, and with my tongue
To tell the passions of my sovereign's heart,
Where fame, late entering at his heedful ears,
Hath plac'd thy glorious image and thy virtues.

Queen. King Lewis and lady Bona, hear me speak,
Before you answer Warwick or his words,
For he it is hath done us all these wrongs.

War. Injurious Margaret!

Prince. And why not queen?

War. Because thy father Henry did usurp,
And thou no more art prince than she is queen.

Oxf. Then Warwick disannuls great John of Gaunt,
That did subdue the greatest part of Spain;
And after John of Gaunt, wise Henry the Fourth,
Whose wisdom was a mirror to the world;
And after this wise prince Henry the<sup>1</sup> Fifth,
Who with his prowess conquered all France:—
From these our Henry's lineally descent.

War. Oxford, how haps that in this smooth discourse
You told not how Henry the Sixth had lost
All that Henry the Fifth had gotten?
Methinks these peers of France should smile at that!
But for the rest, you tell a pedigree
Of threescore and two years, a silly time
To make prescription for a kingdom's worth.

Oxf. Why, Warwick, canst thou deny thy king,

Whom thou obeyedst thirty and eight years,
And (not) bewray thy treasons with a blush?

War. Can Oxford, that did ever fence the right,
Now buckler falsehood with a pedigree?
For shame! leave Henry, and call Edward king.

Oxf. Call him my king, by whom mine elder brother,
The lord Aubrey Vere, was done to death;
And more than so, my father
Even in the downfall of his mellow'd years,
When age did call him to the door of death?
No, Warwick, no; whilst life upholds this arm,
This arm upholds the house of Lancaster.

War. And I the house of York.

Lew. Queen Margaret, prince Edward, and Oxford,
Vouchsafe to forbear awhile, till I do talk
A word with Warwick.

Now, Warwick, even upon thy honour tell me true;
Is Edward lawful king or no? for I were loath
To link with him that is not lawful heir.

War. Thereon I pawn mine honour and my credit.

Lew. What, is he gracious in the people's eyes?

War. The more that Henry is unfortunate.

Lew. What is his love to our sister Bona?

War. Such it seems

As may beseem a monarch like himself.
Myself have often heard him say and swear,
That this his love was an eternal plant,
The root whereof was fix'd in virtue's ground,
The leaves and fruit maintain'd with beauty's sun;
Exempt from envy, but not from disdain,
Unless the lady Bona quite his pain.

Lew. Then, sister, let us hear your firm resolve.

Bona. Your grant or your<sup>2</sup> denial shall be mine.

But ere this day I must confess,
When I have heard your king's deserts recounted,
Mine ears have tempted judgment to desire.

Lew. Then draw near, queen Margaret, and be a witness
That Bona shall be wife to the English king.

Prince. To Edward, but not the English king.

War. Henry now lives in Scotland, at his ease;
Where, having nothing, nothing can he lose.
And as for you yourself, our quondam queen,
You have a father able to maintain your state,
And better 'twere to trouble him than France.

Sound for a Post within.

Lew. Here comes some post, Warwick, to thee or us.

Post. My lord ambassador, this letter is for you,
Sent from your brother, marquess Montague.
This from our king, unto your majesty.

And these to you, madam, from whom I know not.

Oxf. I like it well that our fair queen and mistress
Smiles at her news, when Warwick frets at his.

Prince. And mark how Lewis stamps as he were nettled.

Lew. Now, Margaret and Warwick, what are your news?

Queen. Mine is such as fills my heart with joy.

War. Mine full of sorrow and heart's discontent.

Lew. What, hath your king married the lady Grey,
And now, to excuse himself, sends us a post of papers?
How dares he presume to use us thus?

Queen. This proveth Edward's love, and Warwick's honesty.

War. King Lewis, I here protest, in sight of heaven,
And by the hope I have of heavenly bliss,
That I am clear from this misdeed of Edward's.
No more my king, for he dishonours me;
And most himself, if he could see his shame.
Did I forget, that by the house of York
My father came untimely to his death?<sup>3</sup>
Did I let pass the abuse done to my niece?
Did I impale him with the regal crown,
And thrust king Henry from his native home?
And (most ungrateful) doth he use me thus?
My gracious queen, pardon what is past,
And henceforth I am thy true servitor:
I will revenge the wrongs done to lady Bona,
And replant Henry in his former state.

Queen. Yes, Warwick, I'll<sup>4</sup> quite forget thy former faults,
If now thou wilt become king Henry's friend.

War. So much his friend, ay, his unfeigned friend,
That if king Lewis vouchsafe to furnish us
With some few bands of chosen soldiers,
I'll undertake to land them on our coast,
And force the tyrant from his seat by war.
'Tis not his new-made bride shall succour him.

Lew. Then at the last I firmly am resolv'd,
You shall have aid:

And, English messenger, return in post,
And tell false Edward, thy supposed king,

<sup>1</sup> The. So the quarto of 1595; omitted in that of 1619.

<sup>4</sup> I'll in the quarto of 1619; that of 1595, I do.

That Lewis of France is sending over maskers
To revel it with him and his new bride.

Bona. Tell him, in hope he'll be a widower shortly,
I'll wear the willow garland for his sake.

Queen. Tell him, my mourning weeds be laid aside,
And I am ready to put armour on.

War. Tell him from me, that he hath done me wrong;
And therefore I'll uncrown him ere 't be long.
There's thy reward; be gone.

[Exit Messenger.]

Lew. But now tell me, Warwick, what assurance
I shall have of thy true loyalty?

War. This shall assure my constant loyalty:
If that our queen and this young prince agree,
I'll join mine eldest daughter and my joy
To him forthwith in holy wedlock bands.

Queen. With all my heart; that match I like full well:
Love her, son Edward, she is fair and young;
And give thy hand to Warwick for thy love.

Lew. It is enough; and now we will prepare
To levy soldiers for to go with you.

And you, lord Bourbon, our high admiral,
Shall waft them safely to the English coast;
And chase proud Edward from his slum'ring trance,
For mocking marriage with the name of France.

War. I came from Edward as ambassador,
But I return his sworn and mortal foe:
Matter of marriage was the charge he gave me,
But dreadful war shall answer his demand.
Had he none else to make a stale but me?
Then none but I shall turn his jest to sorrow.
I was the chief that rais'd him to the crown,
And I'll be chief to bring him down again:
Not that I pity Henry's misery,
But seek revenge on Edward's mockery.

[Exeunt.]

(ACT IV.)

(SCENE I.)

Enter KING EDWARD, the QUEEN, CLARENCE, GLOSTER, MONTAGUE, HASTINGS, and PEMBROKE, with Soldiers.

K. Edw. Brothers of Clarence and of Gloster, what think you of our marriage with the lady Grey?

Cla. My lord, we think as Warwick and Lewis, that are so slack in judgment that they will take no offence at this sudden marriage.

K. Edw. Suppose they do, they are but Lewis and Warwick; and I am both<sup>1</sup> your king and Warwick's, and will be obeyed.

Glo. And shall, because our king; but yet such sudden marriages seldom prove well.

K. Edw. Yea, brother Richard, are you against us, too?

Glo. Not I, my lord; no, God forefend that I Should once gainsay your highness' pleasure;

Ay, an 'twere pity
To sunder them that yoke so well together.

K. Edw. Setting your scorns and your dislikes aside,
Show me some reasons why the lady Grey
May not be my love, and England's queen?

Speak freely, Clarence, Gloster, Montague, and Hastings.

Cla. My lord, then this is mine opinion,—that Warwick,
Being dishonour'd in his embassy,
Doth seek revenge to quite his injuries.

Glo. And Lewis, in regard of his sister's wrongs,
Doth join with Warwick to supplant your state.

K. Edw. Suppose that Lewis and Warwick be appeas'd
By such means as I can best devise.

Mont. But yet to have join'd with France in this alliance
Would more have strengthen'd this our commonwealth,
'Gainst foreign storms, than any home-bred marriage.

Hast. Let England be true within itself,
We need not France, nor any alliance with them.

Cla. For this one speech, the lord Hastings well deserves
To have the daughter and heir of the lord Hungerford.

K. Edw. And what then? It was our will it should be so.

Cla. Ay, and for such a thing, too, the lord Scales
Did well deserve at your hands

To have the daughter of the lord Bonfield,
And left your brothers to go seek elsewhere;

But in your madness you bury brotherhood.

K. Edw. Alas, poor Clarence! is it for a wife
That thou art malcontent?

Why, man, be of good cheer, I'll provide thee one.

Cla. Nay, you play'd the broker so ill for yourself,
That you shall give me leave to make my choice

As I think good: and to that intent
I shortly mean to leave you.

K. Edw. Leave me, or tarry, I am full resolv'd
Edward will not be tied to his brothers' wills.

Queen. My lords, do me but right,
And you must confess, before it pleas'd his highness
To advance my state to title of a queen,
That I was not ignoble from my birth.

K. Edw. Forbear, my love, to fawn upon their frowns;
For thee they must obey, nay, shall obey,
An if they look for favour at my hands.

Mont. My lord, here is the messenger return'd from France.

Enter Messenger.

K. Edw. Now, sirrah, what letters? or what news?

Mess. No letters, my lord, and such news as without your highness' special<sup>2</sup> pardon I dare not relate.

K. Edw. We pardon thee, and (as near as thou canst) tell me,
What said Lewis to our letters?

Mess. At my departure these were his very words:
"Go, tell false Edward, thy supposed king,
That Lewis of France is sending over maskers
To revel it with him and his new bride."

K. Edw. Is Lewis so brave? Belike he thinks me Henry.
But what said lady Bona to these wrongs?

Mess. "Tell him," quoth she, "in hope he'll prove a widower shortly,
I'll wear the willow garland for his sake."

K. Edw. She had the wrong;
Indeed she could say little less. But what said Henry's queen?
For, as I hear, she was then in place.

Mess. "Tell him," quoth she, "my mourning weeds be done,
And I am ready to put armour on."

K. Edw. Then belike she means to play the Amazon.
But what said Warwick to these injuries?

Mess. He, more incensed than the rest, my lord,
"Tell him," quoth he, "that he hath done me wrong,
And therefore I'll uncrown him ere 't be long."

K. Edw. Ha! durst the traitor breathe out such proud words!
But I will arm me to prevent the worst.

But what, is Warwick friends with Margaret?

Mess. Ay, my good lord, they are so link'd in friendship,
That young prince Edward marries Warwick's daughter.

Cla. The elder, belike; Clarence shall have the younger.
All you that love me and Warwick follow me.

[Exeunt CLA. and SOM.]

K. Edw. Clarence and Somerset fled to Warwick?
What say you, brother Richard, will you stand to us?

Glo. Ay, my lord, in despite of all that shall withstand you.
For why hath nature made me halt downright,
But that I should be valiant and stand to it?
For if I would I cannot run away.

K. Edw. Pembroke, go raise an army presently.

Pitch up my tent; for in the field this night
I mean to rest, and on the morrow morn
I'll march to meet proud Warwick, ere he land
Those straggling troops which he hath got in France.
But ere I go, Montague and Hastings,
You above all the rest are near allied<sup>3</sup>

In blood to Warwick; therefore tell me
If you favour him more than me, or not. Speak truly,
For I had rather have you open enemies
Than hollow friends.

Mont. So God help Montague, as he proves true.

Hast. And Hastings, as he favours Edward's cause.

K. Edw. It shall suffice; come then, let's march away.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE II.)

Enter WARWICK and OXFORD, with Soldiers.

War. Trust me, my lords, all hitherto goes well;
The common people by numbers swarm to us.
But see, where Somerset and Clarence come;
Speak suddenly, my lords; are we all friends?

Cla. Fear not that, my lord.

War. Then, gentle Clarence, welcome unto Warwick,
And welcome, Somerset: I hold it cowardice
To rest mistrustful, where a noble heart
Hath pawn'd an open hand in sign of love;
Else might I think that Clarence, Edward's brother,
Were but a feigned friend to our proceedings:
But welcome, sweet Clarence, my daughter shall be thine.
And now what rests, but in night's coverture,
Thy brother being carelessly encamp'd,
His soldiers lurking in the town about,
And but attended by a simple guard,
We may surprise and take him at our pleasure?
Our scouts have found the adventure very easy.

<sup>3</sup> So in the quarto of 1619; in that of 1595—

"You, of all the rest, are near allied."

Then cry king Henry with resolved minds,
And break we presently into his tent.

Cla. Why, then let's on our way in silent sort:
For Warwick and his friends, God, and Saint George!

War. This is his tent, and see where his guard doth stand:

Courage, my soldiers, now or never;
But follow me now, and Edward shall be ours.

All. A Warwick, a Warwick!

(SCENE III.)

Alarms, and GLOSTER and HASTINGS fly.

Oxf. Who goes there?

War. Richard and Hastings: let them go, here's the duke.

K. Edw. The duke! why, Warwick, when we parted last
Thou call'st me king.

War. Ay, but the case is alter'd now.

When you disgrac'd me in my embassy,
Then I disgrac'd you from being king,
And now am come to create you duke of York.

Alas! how should you govern any kingdom,
That know not how to use ambassadors;
Nor how to use your brothers brotherly;
Nor how to shroud yourself from enemies?

K. Edw. Well, Warwick, let fortune do her worst,
Edward in mind will bear himself a king.

War. Then, for his mind, be Edward England's king;
But Henry now shall wear the English crown.
Go, convey him to our brother, archbishop of York;
And when I have fought with Pembroke and his followers,
I'll come and tell thee what the lady Bona says;
And so for awhile farewell, good duke of York.

[Exeunt some with KING EDWARD.]

Cla. What follows now? all hitherto goes well:
But we must despatch some letters into France,
To tell the queen of our happy fortune,
And bid her come with speed to join with us.

War. Ay, that's the first thing that we have to do;
And free king Henry from imprisonment,
And see him seated in his regal throne.
Come, let us haste away, and having pass'd these cares,
I'll post to York, and see how Edward fares.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE IV.<sup>1</sup>)

Enter GLOSTER, HASTINGS, and SIR WILLIAM STANLEY.

Glo. Lord Hastings, and sir William Stanley,
Know that the cause I sent for you is this:
I look my brother, with a slender train,
Should come a hunting in this forest here.
The bishop of York befriends him much,
And lets him use his pleasure in the chase.
Now I have privily sent him word,
How I am come with you to rescue him:
And see where the huntsman and he doth come.

Enter EDWARD and a Huntsman.

Hunt. This way, my lord, the deer is gone.

K. Edw. No, this way, huntsman;
See where the keepers stand. Now, brother, and the rest,
What, are you provided to depart?

Glo. Ay, ay, the horse stands at the park corner;
Come, to Lynn, and so take shipping into Flanders.

K. Edw. Come, then.

Hastings and Stanley, I will requite your loves.
Bishop, farewell: shield thee from Warwick's frown,
And pray that I may repossess the crown.
Now, huntsman, what will you do?

Hunt. Marry, my lord, I think I had as good go with you as tarry here to be hanged.

K. Edw. Come then, let's away with speed.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE V.<sup>2</sup>)

Enter the QUEEN and the LORD RIVERS.

Riv. Tell me, good madam,
Why is your grace so passionate of late?

Queen. Why, brother Rivers, hear ye not the news
Of that success king Edward had of late?

Riv. What! loss of some pitch'd battle against Warwick?

Tush! fear not, fair queen, but cast those cares aside.
King Edward's noble mind his honours doth display;
And Warwick may lose, though then he got the day.

Queen. If that were all, my griefs were at an end;
But greater troubles will I fear befall.

Riv. What, is he taken prisoner by the foe,
To the danger of his royal person, then?

Queen. Ay, there's my grief; king Edward is surpris'd,
And led away as prisoner unto York.

Riv. The news is passing strange, I must confess;
Yet comfort yourself, for Edward hath more friends:
Then Lancaster at this time must perceive
That some will set him in his throne again.

Queen. God grant they may; but, gentle brother, come,
And let me lean upon thine arm awhile,
Until I come unto the sanctuary,
There to preserve the fruit within my womb,
King Edward's seed, true heir to England's crown.

[Exeunt.]

(SCENE VI.<sup>3</sup>)

Enter EDWARD, and RICHARD, and HASTINGS, with a troop of Hollanders.

K. Edw. Thus far from Belgia have we pass'd the seas,
And march'd from Raunspur haven unto York:
But soft, the gates are shut; I like not this.

Rich. Sound up the drum, and call them to the walls.

Enter the Lord Mayor of York, upon the walls.

Mayor. My lords, we had notice of your coming,
And that's the cause we stand upon our guard,
And shut the gates for to preserve the town.
Henry now is king, and we are sworn to him.

K. Edw. Why, my lord mayor, if Henry be your king, Edward I am sure at least is duke of York.

Mayor. Truth, my lord, we know you for no less.

K. Edw. I crave nothing but my dukedom.

Rich. But when the fox hath gotten in his head,
He'll quickly make the body follow after.

Hast. Why, my lord mayor, what stand you upon points?<sup>2</sup>
Open the gates, we are king Henry's friends.

Mayor. Say you so? then I'll open them presently.

[Exit Mayor.]

Rich. By my faith, a wise stout captain, and soon persuaded.

The Mayor opens the door, and brings the keys in his hand.

K. Edw. So, my lord mayor, these gates must not be shut,
But in the time of war; give me the keys:
What, fear not, man, for Edward will defend
The town and you, despite of all your foes.

Enter SIR JOHN MONTGOMERY, with drum and Soldiers.

How now, Richard, who is this?

Rich. Brother, this is sir John Montgomery,
A trusty friend, unless I be deceiv'd.

K. Edw. Welcome, sir John. Wherefore come you in arms?
Sir John. To help king Edward in this time of storms,
As every loyal subject ought to do.

K. Edw. Thanks, brave Montgomery; but I only claim
My dukedom, till it please God to send the rest.

Sir John. Then fare you well. Drum, strike up, and let us march away;
I came to serve a king, and not a duke.

K. Edw. Nay, stay, sir John, and let us first debate
With what security we may do this thing.

Sir John. What stand you on debating! To be brief,
Except you presently proclaim yourself
Our king, I'll hence again, and keep them back
That come to succour you; why should we fight,
When you pretend no title?

Rich. Fie, brother, fie!<sup>4</sup> stand you upon terms?
Resolve yourself, and let us claim the crown.

K. Edw. I am resolv'd once more to claim the crown,
And win it too, or else to lose my life.

Sir John. Ay, now my sovereign speaketh like<sup>5</sup> himself,
And now will I be Edward's champion.
Sound trumpets, for Edward shall be proclaim'd.

Edward the Fourth, by the grace of God, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland:
And whosoe'er gainsays king Edward's right,
By this I challenge him to single fight.

Long live Edward the Fourth!

All. Long live Edward the Fourth!

K. Edw. We thank you all. Lord mayor, lead on the way.

For this night we'll harbour here in York,
And then as early as the morning sun
Lifts up his beams above this horizon,
We'll march to London, to meet with Warwick,
And pull false Henry from the regal throne.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE VII.<sup>1</sup>)

Enter WARWICK and CLARENCE with the crown, and then KING HENRY,
OXFORD, SOMERSET, and the young EARL OF RICHMOND.

King. Thus from the prison to this princely seat,
By God's great mercies am I brought again.
Clarence and Warwick, do you keep the crown,
And govern and protect my realm in peace,
And I will spend the remnant of my days
To sin's rebuke, and my Creator's praise.

War. What answers Clarence to his sovereign's will?

Clare. Clarence agrees to what king Henry likes.

King. My lord of Somerset, what pretty boy
Is that you seem to be so careful of?

Som. If it please your grace, it is young Henry,
Earl of Richmond.

King. Henry of Richmond,
Come hither, pretty lad. If heav'nly powers
Do aim aright to my divining thoughts,
Thou, pretty boy, shalt prove this country's bliss.
Thy head is made to wear a princely crown;
Thy looks are all replete with majesty;
Make much of him, my lords, for this is he Shall help you more than you are hurt by me.

Enter One with a letter to WARWICK.

War. What counsel, lords? Edward from Belgia,
With hasty Germans, and blunt Hollanders,
Is pass'd in safety through the narrow seas,
And with his troops doth march amain towards London,
And many giddy-headed<sup>2</sup> people follow him.

Oxf. 'Tis best to look to this betimes,
For if this fire do kindle any further,
It will be hard for us to quench it out.

War. In Warwickshire I have true-hearted friends,
Not mutinous in peace, yet bold in war;
Them will I muster up; and thou, son Clarence,
Shalt in Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, and in Kent,
Stir up the knights and gentlemen to come with thee.
And thou, brother Montague, in Leicestershire,
Buckingham, and Northamptonshire, shalt find
Men well inclin'd to do what thou command'st;
And thou, brave Oxford, wondrous well below'd,
Shalt in thy countries muster up thy friends.
My sovereign, with his loving citizens,
Shall rest in London till we come to him.
Fair lords, take leave, and stand not to reply.
Farewell, my sovereign.

King. Farewell, my Hector, my Troy's true hope.

War. Farewell, sweet lords; let's meet at Coventry.

All. Agreed.

[Exeunt omnes.]

Enter EDWARD and his Train.

K. Edw. Seize on the shame-fac'd Henry,
And once again convey him to the Tower.
Away with him, I will not hear him speak.
And now towards Coventry let us bend our course,
To meet with Warwick and his confederates.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(ACT V.)

(SCENE I.)

Enter WARWICK, on the walls.

War. Where is the post that came from valiant Oxford?

How far hence is thy lord, my honest fellow?

Oxf. Post. By this at Daintry, marching hitherward.

War. Where is our brother Montague?

Where is the post that came from Montague?

Post. I left him at Dunsmore with his troops.

War. Say, Somerville,<sup>3</sup> where is my loving son?

And by thy guess, how far is Clarence hence?

Som. At Southam, my lord, I left him with his force,

And do expect him two hours hence.

War. Then Oxford is at hand; I hear his drum.

Enter EDWARD and his power.

Glo. See, brother, where the surly Warwick mans the wall.

War. O, unbid spite! is sportful Edward come?

Where slept our scouts, or how are they seduc'd,
That we could have no news of their repair?

K. Edw. Now, Warwick, wilt thou be sorry for thy faults,
And call Edward king? and he will pardon thee.

War. Nay, rather wilt thou draw thy forces back,
Confess who set thee up and pull'd thee down,
Call Warwick patron, and be penitent?

And thou shalt still remain the duke of York.

Glo. I had thought at least he would have said the king.
Or did he make the jest against his will?

War. 'Twas Warwick gave the kingdom to thy brother.

K. Edw. Why, then 'tis mine, if but by Warwick's gift.

War. Ay, but thou art no Atlas for so great a weight,

And, weakling, Warwick takes his gift again;

Henry is my king, Warwick his subject.

K. Edw. I prithee, gallant Warwick, tell me this,—

What is the body when the head is off?

Glo. Alas! that Warwick had no more foresight,

But whilst he sought to steal the single ten,

The king was finely finger'd from the deck.

You left poor Henry in the bishop's palace,

And ten to one you'll meet him in the Tower.

K. Edw. 'Tis even so, and yet you are old Warwick still.

War. O, cheerful colours! see where Oxford comes.

Enter OXFORD, with drum and Soldiers, and all cry,—

Oxf. Oxford, Oxford, for Lancaster!

[Exit.]

K. Edw. The gates are open; see, they enter in.

Let us follow them, and bid them battle in the streets.

Glo. No, so some other might set upon our backs;
We'll stay till all be enter'd, and then follow them.

Enter SOMERSET, with drum and Soldiers.

Som. Somerset, Somerset, for Lancaster!

[Exit.]

Glo. Two of thy name, both dukes of Somerset,
Have sold their lives unto the house of York,
And thou shalt be the third, if my sword hold.

Enter MONTAGUE, with drum and Soldiers.

Mont. Montague, Montague, for Lancaster!

[Exit.]

K. Edw. Traitorous Montague, thou and thy brother
Shall dearly aby this rebellious act.

Enter CLARENCE, with drum and Soldiers.

War. And lo where George of Clarence sweeps along,
Of power enough to bid his brother battle.

Clare. Clarence, Clarence, for Lancaster!

K. Edw. Et tu, Brute! wilt thou stab Cæsar too?
A parley, sirrah, to George of Clarence.

Sound a parley, and RICHARD and CLARENCE whisper together, and then
CLARENCE takes his red rose out of his hat, and throws it at WARWICK.

War. Come, Clarence, come, thou wilt if Warwick call.

Clare. Father of Warwick, know you what this means?

I throw mine infamy at thee;
I will not ruin my father's house,
Who gave his blood to lime the stones together,
And set up Lancaster. Thinkest thou
That Clarence is so harsh, unnatural,
To lift his sword against his brother's life?
And so, proud-hearted Warwick, I defy thee;
And to my brothers turn my blushing cheeks.
Pardon me, Edward, for I have done amiss;
And, Richard, do not frown upon me;
For henceforth I will prove no more unconstant.

K. Edw. Welcome, Clarence, and ten times more welcome,
Than if thou never hadst deserv'd our hate.

Glo. Welcome, good Clarence, this is brotherly.

War. O, passing traitor, perjurd and unjust!

K. Edw. Now, Warwick, wilt thou leave the town and fight?
Or shall we beat the stones about thine ears?

War. Why, I am not coop'd up here for defence:
I will away to Barnet presently,

And bid thee battle, Edward, if thou dar'st.

K. Edw. Yes, Warwick, he dares, and leads the way:
Lords, to the field; Saint George and victory.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE II.)

Alarms, and then enter WARWICK wounded.

War. Ah, who is nigh? Come to me, friend or foe,
And tell me who is victor, York or Warwick?
Why ask I that? my mangled body shows
That I must yield my body to the earth,
And by my fall the conquest of my foes.
Thus yields the cedar to the axe's edge,
Whose arms gave shelter to the princely eagle,
Under whose shade the ramping<sup>1</sup> lion slept,
Whose top branch overpeer'd Jove's spreading tree.
The wrinkles in my brows, now fill'd with blood,
Were liken'd oft to kingly sepulchres;
For who liv'd king but I could dig his grave;
And who durst smile when Warwick bent his brow?
Lo, now my glory smear'd in dust and blood;
My parks, my<sup>2</sup> walks, my manors that I had,
Even now forsake me, and of all my lands
Is nothing left me but my body's length.

Enter OXFORD and SOMERSET.

Oxf. Ah, Warwick, Warwick! cheer up thyself and live,
For yet there's hope enough to win the day.
Our warlike queen with troops is come from France,
And at Southampton landed all her train,
And might'st thou live, then would we never fly.

War. Why, then I would not fly; nor have I now,
But Hercules himself must yield to odds;
For many wounds receiv'd, and many more repaid,
Have robb'd my strong-knit sinews of their strength,
And, spite of spites, needs must I yield to death.

Som. Thy brother Montague hath breath'd his last,
And at the pangs of death I heard him cry
And say, "Commend me to my valiant brother;"
And more he would have spoke, and more he said
Which sounded like a clamour in a vault,
That could not be distinguish'd for the sound;
And so the valiant Montague gave up the ghost.

War. What is pomp, rule, reign, but earth and dust?
And live we how we can, yet die we must.
Sweet rest his soul! fly, lords, and save yourselves,
For Warwick bids you all farewell to meet in heaven.

[He dies.]

Oxf. Come, noble Somerset, let's take our horse,
And cause retreat be sounded through the camp,
That all our friends that yet remain alive
May be forewarn'd, and save themselves by flight.
That done, with them we'll post unto the queen,
And once more try our fortune in the field.

[Exeunt.]

(SCENE III.)

Enter EDWARD, CLARENCE, and GLOSTER, with Soldiers.

K. Edw. Thus still our fortune gives us victory,
And girts our temples with triumphant joys.
The big-bon'd traitor, Warwick, hath breath'd his last,
And heaven this day hath smil'd upon us all.
But in this clear and brightsome day,
I see a black, suspicious cloud appear,
That will encounter with our glorious sun,
Before he gain his easeful western beams;
I mean, those powers which the queen hath got in France
Are landed, and mean once more to menace us.

Glo. Oxford and Somerset have fled to her;
And 'tis likely, if she have time to breathe,
Her faction will be full as strong as ours.

K. Edw. We are advertis'd by our loving friends,
That they do hold their course towards Tewkesbury.
Thither will we, for willingness rids way:
And in every county as we pass along
Our strengths shall be augmented.
Come, let's go, for if we slack this fair bright summer's day,
Sharp winter's showers will mar our hope for hay.

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE IV.)

Enter the QUEEN, PRINCE EDWARD, OXFORD, and SOMERSET, with drum and Soldiers.

Queen. Welcome to England, my loving friends of France;
And welcome Somerset and Oxford too.
Once more have we spread our sails abroad,
And though our tackling be almost consum'd,
And Warwick as our mainmast overthrown,
Yet, warlike lords, raise you that sturdy post
That bears the sails to bring us unto rest,
And Ned and I, as willing pilots should,
For once, with careful minds guide on the stern,
To bear us through that dangerous gulf
That heretofore hath swallow'd up our friends.

Prince. And if there be (as God forbid there should)
Amongst us a timorous or fearful man,
Let him depart before the battles join,
Lest he in time of need entice another,
And so withdraw the soldiers' hearts from us.
I will not stand aloof and bid you fight,
But with my sword press in the thickest throngs,
And single Edward from his strongest guard,
And hand to hand enforce him for to yield,
Or leave my body as witness of my thoughts.

Oxf. Women and children of so high resolve,
And warriors faint! why, 'twere perpetual shame.
Oh, brave young prince, thy noble grandfather
Doth live again in thee; long may'st thou live
To bear his image, and to renew his glories!

Som. And he that turns and flies when such do fight,
Let him to bed, and like the owl by day
Be hiss'd and wonder'd at if he arise.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My lords, duke Edward with a mighty power
Is marching hitherwards to fight with you.

Oxf. I thought it was his policy to take us unprovided;
But here will we stand, and fight it to the death.

Enter KING EDWARD, CLARENCE, GLOSTER, HASTINGS, and Soldiers.

K. Edw. See, brothers, yonder stands the thorny wood,
Which, by God's assistance and your prowess,
Shall with our swords ere night be clean cut down.

Queen. Lords, knights, and gentlemen, what I should say
My tears gainsay. For, as you see, I drink
The water of mine eyes. Then no more but this;
Henry your king is prisoner in the Tower;
His land, and all our friends, are quite distress'd;
And yonder stands the wolf that makes all this;
Then on God's name, lords, together cry, Saint George!

All. Saint George for Lancaster!

(SCENE V.)

Alarms to the battle: YORK flies; then the chamber be discharged. Then enter the KING, CLARENCE, GLOSTER, and the rest, making a great shout, and cry, "For York! For York!" and then the QUEEN, PRINCE, OXFORD, and SOMERSET are taken; and then sound and enter all again.

K. Edw. Lo! here a period of tumultuous broils.
Away with Oxford to Hammes castle straight:
For Somerset, off with his guilty head.
Away! I will not hear them speak.

Oxf. For my part, I'll not trouble thee with words.[Exit OXFORD.]Som. Nor I, but stoop with patience to my death.[Exit SOMERSET.]

K. Edw. Now, Edward, what satisfaction canst thou make
For stirring up my subjects to rebellion?

Prince. Speak like a subject, proud ambitious York;
Suppose that I am now my father's mouth;
Resign thy chair, and, where I stand, kneel thou,
Whilst I propose the self-same words to thee,
Which, traitor, thou wouldst have me answer to.

Queen. Oh, that thy father had been so resolv'd!

Glo. That you might still have kept your petticoat,
And ne'er have stol'n the breech from Lancaster.

Prince. Let Æsop fable in a winter's night;
His currish riddles sort not with this place.

Glo. By heaven, brat, I'll plague you for that word!Queen. Ay, thou wast born to be a plague to men.Glo. For God's sake, take away this captive scold.Prince. Nay, take away this scolding crook-back rather.K. Edw. Peace, wilful boy, or I will tame your tongue.Cla. Untutor'd lad, thou art too malapert.

Prince. I know my duty, you are all undutiful.
Lascivious Edward, and thou perjurd George,
And thou misshapen Dick, I tell you all
I am your better, traitors as you be.

K. Edw. Take that, thou likeness of this railer here.[St. to him]Queen. Oh, kill me too!Glo. Marry, and shall.K. Edw. Hold, Richard, hold, for we have done too much already.Glo. Why should she live to fill the world with words?K. Edw. What, doth she swoon? Make means for her recovery.

Glo. Clarence, excuse me to the king my brother;
I must to London on a serious matter;
Ere you come there you shall hear more news.

Cla. About what, prithee tell me?Glo. The Tower, man, the Tower: I'll root them out.[Exit.]

Queen. Ah, Ned, speak to thy mother, boy:
Ah, thou canst not speak.
Traitors, tyrants, bloody homicides,
They that stabb'd Cæsar shed no blood at all,
For he was a man; this, in respect, a child;
And men ne'er spend their fury on a child.

<sup>1</sup> Ramping in the edition of 1595; rampant in that of 1619.<sup>2</sup> My in the edition of 1595; and in that of 1619.

What's worse than tyrant that I may not name?
You have no children, devils; if you had,
The thought of them would then have stopp'd your rage:
But if you ever hope to have a son,
Look in his youth to have him so cut off,
As, traitors, you have done this sweet young prince.

K. Edw. Away, and bear her hence.

Queen. Nay, never bear me hence, despatch me here;
Here sheathe thy sword; I'll pardon thee my death.
Wilt thou not? Then, Clarence, do thou do it.

Cl. By heaven, I would not do thee so much ease.

Queen. Good Clarence, do; sweet Clarence, kill me too.

Cl. Didst thou not hear me swear I would not do it?

Queen. Ay, but thou usest to forswear thyself.

'Twas sin before, but now 'tis charity.

Where's the devil's butcher, hard-favour'd Richard?

Richard, where art thou?

He is not here: Murder is his alms-deed;

Petitioners for blood he'll ne'er put back.

K. Edw. Away, I say, and take her hence perforce.

Queen. So come to you and yours, as to this prince.

K. Edw. Clarence, whither is Gloster gone?

Cl. Marry, my lord, to London; and, as I guess,
To make a bloody supper in the Tower.

K. Edw. He is sudden, if a thing come in his head.

Well, discharge the common soldiers with pay and thanks;

And now let's toward London,

To see our gentle queen how she doth fare;

For by this I hope she hath a son for us.

[Exit.]

[Exeunt omnes.]

(SCENE VI.)

Enter GLOSTER to KING HENRY in the Tower.

Glo. Good day, my lord. What, at your book so hard?

King. Ay, my good lord. Lord, I should say rather;

'Tis sin to flatter, good was little better;

Good Gloster, and good devil, were all alike.

What scene of death hath Roscius now to act?

Glo. Suspicion always haunts a guilty mind.

King. The bird once lim'd doth fear the fatal bush;

And I, the hapless male to one poor bird,

Have now the fatal object in mine eye,

Where my poor young was lim'd, was caught, and kill'd.

Glo. Why, what a fool was that of Crete,

That taught his son the office of a bird!

And yet, for all that, the poor fowl was drown'd.

King. I, Dædalus; my poor son, Icarus;

Thy father, Minos, that denied our course;

Thy brother Edward the sun that sear'd his wings;

And thou the enviest gulf that swallow'd him.

Oh, better can my breast abide thy dagger's point,

Than can mine ears that tragic history.

Glo. Why, dost thou think I am an executioner?

King. A persecutor, I am sure thou art;

And if murdering innocents be executions,

Then I know thou art an executioner.

Glo. Thy son I kill'd for his presumption.

King. Hadst thou been kill'd when first thou didst presume,

Thou hadst not liv'd to kill a son of mine.

And thus I prophesy of thee:

That many a widow for her husband's death,

And many an infant's water-standing eye,

Widows for their husbands, children for their fathers,

Shall curse the time that ever thou wert born.

The owl shriek'd at thy birth, an evil sign;

The night-crow cried, a boding luckless tune;

Dogs howl'd, and hideous tempests shook down trees;

The raven rook'd her on the chimney's top,

And chattering pies in dismal discord sung;

Thy mother felt more than a mother's pain,

And yet brought forth less than a mother's hope;

To wit, an undigest created lump,

Not like the fruit of such a goodly tree.

Teeth hadst thou in thy head when thou wast born,

To signify thou cam'st to bite the world

And if the rest be true that I have heard,

Thou cam'st into the world—

Glo. Die, prophet, in thy speech; I'll hear no more:

For this amongst the rest was I ordain'd.

King. Ay, and for much more slaughter after this.

O, God! forgive my sins, and pardon thee.

Glo. What! will the aspiring blood of Lancaster

Sink into the ground? I had thought it would have mounted.

[Stabs him.]

[He dies.]

See how my sword weeps for the poor king's death.

Now may such purple tears be always shed

For such as seek the downfall of our house.

If any spark of life remain in thee,<sup>1</sup>

Down, down to hell, and say I sent thee thither:

I, that have neither pity, love, nor fear.

Indeed, 'twas true that Henry told me of,

For I have often heard my mother say

I came into the world with my legs forward:

And had I not reason, think you, to make haste,

And seek their ruins that usurp'd our rights?

The women wept, and the midwife cried,<sup>2</sup>

"O, Jesus bless us, he is born with teeth!"

And so I was, indeed; which plainly signified

That I should snarl, and bite, and play the dog.

Then, since heaven hath made my body so,

Let hell make crook'd my mind to answer it.

I had no father, I am like no father;

I have no brothers, I am like no brothers;

And this word love, which greybeards term divine,

Be resident in men like one another,

And not in me; I am myself alone.

Clarence, beware; thou keep'st me from the light,

But I will sort a pitchy day for thee:

For I will buzz abroad such prophecies,

Under pretence of outward seeming ill,<sup>3</sup>

As Edward shall be fearful of his life,

And then, to purge his fear, I'll be thy death.

King Henry, and the prince his son, are gone;

And, Clarence, thou art next must follow them:

So by one and one despatching all the rest,<sup>4</sup>

Counting myself but bad, till I be best.

I'll drag thy body in another room,

And triumph, Henry, in thy day of doom.

[Stabs him again.]

[Exit.]

(SCENE VII.)

Enter KING EDWARD, QUEEN ELIZABETH, and a Nurse with the young Prince, and CLARENCE, GLOSTER, HASTINGS, and others.

K. Edw. Once more we sit in England's royal<sup>5</sup> throne,
Repurchas'd with the blood of enemies.

What valiant foemen, like to autumn's corn,

Have we mow'd down in tops of all their pride!

Three dukes of Somerset, threefold renown'd

For hardy and undoubted champions;

Two Cliffords, as the father and the son;

And two Northumberlands; two braver men

Ne'er spur'd their coursers at the trumpet's sound.

With them the two rough bears, Warwick and Montague,

That in their chains fetter'd the kingly lion,

And made the forest tremble when they roar'd.

Thus have we swept suspicion from our seat,

And made our footstool of security.

Come hither, Bess, and let me kiss my boy:

Young Ned, for thee, thine uncles and myself

Have in our armours watch'd the winter's night;

March'd all afoot in summer's scalding heat,

That thou might'st repossess the crown in peace;

And of our labours thou shalt reap the gain.

Glo. I'll blast his harvest, if your head were laid;

For yet I am not look'd on in the world.

This shoulder was ordain'd so thick, to heave;

And heave it shall some weight, or break my back.

Work thou the way, and thou shalt execute.

K. Edw. Clarence and Gloster, love my lovely queen,

Aud kiss your princely nephew, brothers, both.<sup>6</sup>

Cl. The duty that I owe unto your majesty,

I seal upon the roseate lips of this sweet babe.

Queen. Thanks, noble Clarence; worthy brother, thanks.

Glo. And that I love the fruit from whence thou sprang'st,

Witness the loving kiss I give the child.

To say the truth, so Judas kiss'd his master,

And so he cried All hail, and meant all harm.

K. Edw. Now am I seated as my soul delights,

Having my country's peace and brothers' loves.<sup>7</sup>

Cl. What will your grace have done with Margaret?

Reignier, her father, to the king of France

Hath pawn'd the Sicils and Jerusalem,

And hither have they sent it for her ransom.

K. Edw. Away with her, and waft her hence to France.

And now what rests, but that we spend the time

With stately triumphs and mirthful comic shows,

Such as befits the pleasures of the court?

Sound drums and trumpets! farewell to sour annoy!

For here, I hope, begins our lasting joy.

[Exeunt omnes.]

KING RICHARD III.

INTRODUCTORY NOTICE.

THIS history was originally published in 1597, under the following title:—"The Tragedy of King Richard the Third. Containing his treacherous Plots against his brother Clarence: the pittieful Murther of his innocent Nephewes: his tyrannical Usurpation: with the whole Course of his detested Life and most deserved Death. As it hath been lately acted by the Right Honourable the Lord Chamberlaine his servants. Printed by Valentine Sims, for William Wise, 1597." It is thus entered in the Stationers' Register:—"Oct. 20, 1597. Andrew Wise. The Tragedie of Kinge Richard the Third, with the Death of the Duke of Clarence." The same Andrew Wise enters the Richard II. on the previous 29th of August. This play was reprinted four times in quarto previous to its appearance in the folio of 1623, in which edition it bears the following title:—"The Tragedy of Richard the Third: with the Landing of Earle Richmond, and the Battell at Bosworth Field." The running head of the play in the folio is "The Life and Death of Richard the Third."

The question of the date when the Richard III. was written will be discussed in our "Essay on the Three Parts of King Henry VI. and King Richard III.;" and the very curious elder play, "The True Tragedie of Richard the Third," reprinted by Boswell in 1821, is there noticed. We shall at present confine ourselves to some observations on the state of the text.

The mode in which the modern text of the Richard III. has been constructed is thus stated by Malone:—"In this play the variations between the original copy in quarto, and the folio, are more numerous than, I believe, in any other of our author's pieces. The alterations, it is highly probable, were made, not by Shakspeare, but by the players, many of them being very injudicious." This would appear a sufficient reason for the modern editors rejecting the text of the folio altogether. But they have not followed this course, which would at least have the merit of consistency. They have adopted these alterations made "by the players" in by far the greater number of cases. For example: there are about one hundred and twenty new lines introduced in the folio—"by the players," of course; in one case there is a single passage amounting to fifty-five lines. These new lines are all adopted; and they are most important lines. In a great number of minute instances the text of the folio is preferred by them; and Steevens says unhesitatingly that it is the best text. On the other hand, there is a remarkable passage, most thoroughly Shaksperian (Act IV. Sc. II.), which is not found in the folio; and the modern text very properly adopts it. This is the only instance in which, to our minds, any advantage has resulted from the collation of the quartos; and this passage was restored by Pope. We will give one or two examples of the mode in which the text of the folio has been preferred by the modern editors to that of the quartos, in addition to their adoption of all the new lines:—

FOLIO OF 1623.

And the queen's sons and brothers, haught and proud.
A dream of what thou wast; a garish flag,
To be the aim of every dangerous shot;
A sign of dignity, a breath, a bubble.
Thy school-days, frightful, desperate, wild, and furious;
Thy prime of manhood, daring, bold, and venturous;
Thy age confirm'd, proud, subtle, sly, and bloody.

QUARTO OF 1597.

And the queen's kindred, haughty and proud.
A dream of what thou wert, a breath, a bubble,
A sign of dignity, a garish flag,
To be the aim of every dangerous skot.
Thy school-days, frightful, desperate, wild, and furious;
Thy age confirm'd, proud, subtle, bloody, treacherous.

Taking, then, the authority of the folio in part, and rejecting it in part, the modern editors have proceeded to manufacture a text upon the principle which has been thus stated by Malone:—"The text has been formed out of the two copies, the folio and the early quarto; from which the preceding editors have in every scene selected such readings as appeared to them fit to be adopted. To enumerate every variation between the copies would encumber the page, with little use." Nothing, we think, can be more unsatisfactory than this mode of proceeding; and Malone gets out of the difficulty by depreciating the folio at every turn, whilst he in reality adopts all its more important readings. He says, "Several alterations were made in this play, evidently unauthorised by Shakspeare." These are the alterations which, no doubt, he passes over sub silentio. We adopt, once for all, the text of the folio, with the exception of three or four passages, where we follow the quarto, and state our reasons for this course. In our foot-notes we have not, adopting the text of the folio, indicated all the variations in the quartos; but we have indicated every passage in which our text is a variation from the received text, and this for the purpose that, when the critical student encounters a reading different from that to which he is accustomed, he may compare and judge for himself.

COSTUME.

The Monk of Croyland informs us that "the new fashion" Edward IV. "chose for his last state dresses was to have very full hanging sleeves like a monk's, lined with most sumptuous furs, and so rolled over his shoulders as to give his tall person an air of peculiar grandeur." This fashion was continued during the remainder of the century, and was not altogether abandoned in the reign of Henry VIII. By a sumptuary law enacted in the last year of Edward's reign we find also that purple cloth of gold and silk of a purple colour were confined to the use of the royal family, while none under the degree of a duke might wear cloth of gold of tissue. Inferior noblemen were restricted to plain cloth of gold, knights to velvet, esquires to satin, &c. Short gowns and upper-dresses of various descriptions were worn at this time, with long sleeves, having an opening in front, through which the arm came, leaving the outer sleeve to hang as an ornament from the shoulder. Feathers became more frequent towards the close of this reign, one or more being worn in the cap behind, and jewelled up the stem. The hair was worn in large square masses on each side of the head, and low on the forehead.

There are two portraits of Richard III., painted on a board, in the meeting-room of the Society of Antiquaries at Somerset House. Both were bequeathed to the Society by the late Mr. Kerrich. The first has been lithographed for the fifth volume of the Paston Letters. It represents the king attired in a robe of cloth of gold over a close dress of scarlet, and a black cap with a pearl ornament. His hair brown and long. His right hand is engaged in placing a ring upon, or drawing it off, the third finger of the left hand. This portrait is evidently by the same painter as that of Edward IV., described at page 72. In the other Richard is portrayed with a short sword or dagger in his hand, dressed in a black robe, with sleeves of black and crimson, an under-dress of cloth of gold, and a small black cap. In the absence of any well-authenticated portrait or effigy of Richard these paintings are certainly very interesting, as there can be little doubt that they were executed during or immediately subsequent to his reign, and may therefore be presumed to convey a general idea of the style of person and dress, if not an absolute likeness. In both he is represented as a hard-featured man, with rather a forbidding countenance, and certainly not bearing out the flattering description of the old Countess of Desmond, who had danced with him when Duke of Gloster, and is stated to have declared that he was the handsomest man in the room except his brother, King Edward IV.* Sir Thomas More, however, says "his face was hard-favoured or warly," which latter word Grafton renders "warlike;" and unless these pictures were painted purposely with the view of creating or confirming a popular prejudice, they may be considered as fully warranting the historian's description.†

Richard and the Duke of Buckingham were both remarkable for their love of finery. A list of the king's dresses exists amongst the Harleian MSS. (No. 433, p. 126), which was sent by Richard himself from York to the keeper of his wardrobe in London, August 31st, 1483; and in the "Antiquarian Repertory" is published a wardrobe account of the first year of his reign, in which there is a detailed description of the magnificent dresses worn by the king, queen, and court, at the coronation. On the day preceding that gorgeous ceremony the Duke of Buckingham, in the royal progress through the city, rode a courser caparisoned with blue velvet, embroidered with axles or wheels in gold (a badge of the Stafford family), the trappings being held out by pages for the better display of them.‡

In the Warwick Roll is a figure of Richard in armour, and surrounded by the crests of France, England, Ireland, Gascony, and Wales; the latter being a greyhound in a cradle—a curious allusion to the well-known legend of "Beth-Gellert." In the same most interesting document is a drawing of Richard's queen, Anne, which presents us with the peculiar head-dress characterizing this period, namely, a cap or caul of gold embroidery, covered by a veil of some very transparent material, stiffened out in the form of wings.

Of Henry Earl of Richmond we know no representation previous to his ascending the throne.

Two portraits of John, the first Howard Duke of Norfolk, and one of his son the Earl of Surrey, are given in the privately printed work, "Memorials of the Howard Family," a copy of which is in the library of the Society of Antiquaries.

Sir Thos. Vaughan lies buried in Westminster Abbey, and the brass plate on his tomb presents us with a good specimen of the armour of this period, with its large pauldrons, elbow-plates, and genouillères. A portrait of Lord Stanley (as Earl of Derby) is to be found in Lodge's "Series of Illustrious Personages."

The livery colours of the Tudor family were white and green. One of the standards of Henry Earl of Richmond at Bosworth field was a red dragon upon white and green sarcenet. Another was a dun cow upon "yellow tarterne." Richard's armorial supporters were white boars. A white boar was also his favourite badge. In his letter from York he orders "four standards of sarcenet and thirteen gonfanons of fustian, with boars." Richard's favourite badge of cognizance was worn by the higher order of his partisans appendant to a collar of roses and suns. Such a collar decorates the monumental figure of Ralph, second Earl of Westmoreland, in the church of Brancepeth, in the county of Durham. This is probably the only contemporary representation of Richard's collar and device now remaining.

* Walpole's Hist. Doubts, p. 102.

† It is said by Polydore Virgil that Richard had a trick of fidgeting with his dagger, continually half drawing and sheathing it again, while in conversation. One might imagine the painter of the second picture had intended to represent this peculiarity. The opinion of Mr. Sharon Turner also, that this habit was but "the mark of a restless impatience of spirit which would not let even the fingers be quiet," is singularly supported by the first portrait, in which Richard appears to be playing in the same manner with his ring by drawing it off and on his finger.

SCENE,—ENGLAND.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—London. A Street.

Enter GLOSTER.

Glo. Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by this sun of York;<sup>1</sup>
And all the clouds that low'r'd upon our house
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.
Now are our brows bound with victorious wreaths;
Our bruised arms hung up for monuments;
Our stern alarums chang'd to merry meetings;
Our dreadful marches to delightful measures.
Grim-visag'd war hath smooth'd his wrinkled front;
And now, instead of mounting barbed<sup>2</sup> steeds,
To fright the souls of fearful adversaries,
He capers nimbly in a lady's chamber,
To the lascivious pleasing of a lute.
But I, that am not shap'd for sportive tricks,
Nor made to court an amorous looking-glass;—
I, that am rudely stamp'd, and want love's majesty
To strut before a wanton ambling nymph;—
I, that am curtail'd of this fair proportion,
Cheated of feature by dissembling nature,
Deform'd, unfinish'd, sent before my time
Into this breathing world, scarce half made up,
And that so lamely and unfashionable
That dogs bark at me as I halt by them;—
Why I, in this weak piping time of peace,
Have no delight to pass away the time,
Unless to see<sup>3</sup> my shadow in the sun,
And descant on mine own deformity.
And therefore, since I cannot prove a lover
To entertain these fair well-spoken days,<sup>4</sup>
I am determin'd to prove a villain,
And hate the idle pleasures of these days.

“Dazzle mine eyes, or do I see three suns?”

Barbed. Barbed and barbed appear to have been indifferently applied to a caparisoned horse. In Hall we have, “About the time of prime came to the barriers of the lists the duke of Hereford, mounted on a white courser barbed with Plots have I laid, inductions dangerous,

By drunken prophecies, libels, and dreams,
To set my brother Clarence and the king
In deadly hate the one against the other:
And, if king Edward be as true and just
As I am subtle, false, and treacherous,
This day should Clarence closely be mew'd up,
About a prophecy, which says, that G
Of Edward's heirs the murderer shall be.
Dive, thoughts, down to my soul! here Clarence comes.

Enter CLARENCE, guarded, and BRAKENBURY.

Brother, good day: What means this armed guard
That waits upon your grace?

Clar. His majesty,
Tendering my person's safety, hath appointed
This conduct to convey me to the Tower.

Glo. Upon what cause?

Clar. Because my name is George.

Glo. Alack, my lord, that fault is none of yours;
He should, for that, commit your godfathers:—
O, belike, his majesty hath some intent
That you should<sup>5</sup> be new christen'd in the Tower.
But what's the matter, Clarence? may I know?

Clar. Yea, Richard, when I know; for I protest
As yet I do not: But, as I can learn,
He hearkens after prophecies and dreams;
And from the cross-row plucks the letter G,
And says, a wizard told him, that by G
His issue disinherited should be;
And, for my name of George begins with G,
It follows in his thought that I am he:
These, as I learn, and such like toys as these,
Have mov'd his highness to commit me now.

Glo. Why, this it is when men are rul'd by women:

blue and green velvet.” In Lord Berners' Froissart we read, “It was a great beauty to behold the banners and standards waving in the wind, and horses barbed, and knights and squires richly armed.”

<sup>5</sup> Should in the folio; the quartos, shall.

'Tis not the king that sends you to the Tower ;
My lady Grey his wife, Clarence, 'tis she
That tempers<sup>1</sup> him to this extremity.
Was it not she and that good man of worship
Antony Woodville, her brother there,
That made him send lord Hastings to the Tower,
From whence this present day he is deliver'd?
We are not safe, Clarence, we are not safe.

Cl. By heaven, I think there is no man secure
But the queen's kindred, and night-walking heralds
That trudge betwixt the king and mistress Shore.
Heard you not what an humble suppliant
Lord Hastings was to her for his delivery?<sup>2</sup>

Glo. Humbly complaining to her deity
Got my lord chamberlain his liberty.
I'll tell you what,—I think it is our way,
If we will keep in favour with the king,
To be her men and wear her livery :
The jealous o'er-worn widow, and herself,
Since that our brother dubb'd them gentlewomen,
Are mighty gossips in our<sup>3</sup> monarchy.

Brak. I beseech your graces both to pardon me ;
His majesty hath straitly given in charge
That no man shall have private conference,
Of what degree soever, with his brother.

Glo. Even so ; an please your worship, Brakenbury,
You may partake of anything we say :
We speak no treason, man :—we say, the king
Is wise and virtuous ; and his noble queen
Well struck in years, fair, and not jealous :—
We say, that Shore's wife hath a pretty foot,
A cherry lip, a bonny eye, a passing pleasing tongue :
And the queen's kindred are made gentlefolks :
How say you, sir ? can you deny all this ?

Brak. With this, my lord, myself have naught to do.

Glo. Naught to do with mistress Shore ? I tell thee, fellow,

He that doth naught with her, excepting one,
Were best to do it secretly, alone.

Brak. What one, my lord ?

Glo. Her husband, knave :—Wouldst thou betray me ?

Brak. I do beseech your grace to pardon me ; and,
withal,

Forbear your conference with the noble duke.

Clar. We know thy charge, Brakenbury, and will obey.

Glo. We are the queen's objects, and must obey.

Brother, farewell : I will unto the king ;
And whatsoever you will employ me in,—
Were it to call king Edward's widow sister,—
I will perform it, to enfranchise you.
Meantime, this deep disgrace in brotherhood
Touches me deeper than you can imagine.

Clar. I know it pleaseth neither of us well.

Glo. Well, your imprisonment shall not be long ;
I will deliver you or else lie<sup>4</sup> for you :
Meantime, have patience.

Clar. I must perforce ; farewell.

[Exeunt CLARENCE, BRAKENBURY, and Guard.]

Glo. Go, tread the path that thou shalt ne'er return, Simple, plain Clarence ! I do love thee so,
That I will shortly send thy soul to heaven,
If heaven will take the present at our hands.
But who comes here ? the new-deliver'd Hastings.

Enter HASTINGS.

Hast. Good time of day unto my gracious lord !

Glo. As much unto my good lord chamberlain !
Well are you welcome to this open air.
How hath your lordship brook'd imprisonment ?

Hast. With patience, noble lord, as prisoners must :
But I shall live, my lord, to give them thanks
That were the cause of my imprisonment.

Glo. No doubt, no doubt, and so shall Clarence too ;
For they that were your enemies are his,
And have prevail'd as much on him as you.

Hast. More pity that the eagle should be mew'd,
While kites and buzzards prey at liberty.

Glo. What news abroad ?

Hast. No news so bad abroad as this at home ;
The king is sickly, weak, and melancholy,
And his physicians fear him mightily.

Glo. Now, by Saint Paul,<sup>5</sup> this news is bad indeed.
O, he hath kept an evil diet long,
And over-much consum'd his royal person ;
'Tis very grievous to be thought upon.

Where is he ? in his bed ?<sup>6</sup>

Hast. He is.

Glo. Go you before, and I will follow you.

[Exit HASTINGS.]

He cannot live, I hope ; and must not die
Till George be pack'd with posthorse up to heaven.
I'll in, to urge his hatred more to Clarence,
With lies well steel'd with weighty arguments :
And, if I fail not in my deep intent,
Clarence hath not another day to live :
Which done, God take king Edward to his mercy,
And leave the world for me to bustle in !
For then I'll marry Warwick's youngest daughter.
What though I kill'd her husband and her father,
The readiest way to make the wench amends
Is to become her husband and her father :
The which will I : not all so much for love
As for another secret close intent,
By marrying her, which I must reach unto.
But yet I run before my horse to market :
Clarence still breathes ; Edward still lives and reigns ;
When they are gone then must I count my gains.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The same. Another Street.

*Enter the corpse of KING HENRY VI., borne in an open coffin, Gentlemen bearing halberds, to guard it ; and LADY
ANNE as mourner.*

Anne. Set down, set down, your honourable load,—
If honour may be shrouded in a hearse,—
Whilst I awhile obsequiously<sup>7</sup> lament
The untimely fall of virtuous Lancaster.
Poor key-cold<sup>8</sup> figure of a holy king !
Pale ashes of the house of Lancaster !
Thou bloodless remnant of that royal blood !
Be it lawful that I invoke thy ghost,
To hear the lamentations of poor Anne,
Wife to thy Edward, to thy slaughter'd son,
Stabb'd by the self-same hand that made these wounds !
Lo, in these windows that let forth thy life,

<sup>1</sup> Tempers. We print this line as in the quarto of 1597. In the folio we read—
“That tempts him to this harsh extremity.”

<sup>2</sup> This line is the reading of the quartos. The folio has—

<sup>6</sup> So the folio ; the quartos—

“What, is he in his bed ?”

<sup>8</sup> Key-cold. This epithet is common in the old writers. Shakspeare himself has it in the Lucrece :—

“And then in key-cold Lucrece' bleeding stream
He falls.”

But surely Steevens's explanation that the epithet is derived from the application of a cold key to stop bleeding is very forced. In Gurnall's “Christian in Complete Armour”—a popular work of the seventeenth century—we have, “But for Christ, and obtaining an interest in him, O how key-cold are they.”

I pour the helpless balm of my poor eyes :
 O, cursed be the hand that made these holes !
 Cursed the heart that had the heart to do it !
 Cursed the blood that let this blood from hence !
 More direful hap betide that hated wretch,
 That makes us wretched by the death of thee,
 Than I can wish to adders, spiders, toads,<sup>1</sup>
 Or any creeping venom'd thing that lives !
 If ever he have child, abortive be it,
 Prodigious, and untimely brought to light,
 Whose ugly and unnatural aspect
 May fright the hopeful mother at the view ;
 And that be heir to his unhappiness !
 If ever he have wife, let her be made
 More miserable by the death of him,
 Than I am made by my young lord, and thee !
 Come now, toward Chertsey with your holy load,<sup>2</sup>
 Taken from Paul's to be interred there :
 And, still as you are weary of the weight,
 Rest you, whiles I lament king Henry's corse.

[The Bearers take up the corpse, and advance.]

Enter GLOSTER.

Glo. Stay, you that bear the corse, and set it down.

Anne. What black magician conjures up this fiend,
 To stop devoted charitable deeds ?

Glo. Villains, set down the corse ; or, by Saint Paul,
 I'll make a corse of him that disobeys.

1 Gent. My lord, stand back, and let the coffin pass.

Glo. Unmanner'd dog ! stand thou when I command :
 Advance thy halberd higher than my breast,
 Or, by Saint Paul, I'll strike thee to my foot,
 And spurn upon thee, beggar, for thy boldness.

[The Bearers set down the coffin.]

Anne. What, do you tremble ? are you all afraid ?
 Alas, I blame you not ; for you are mortal,
 And mortal eyes cannot endure the devil.
 Avaunt, thou dreadful minister of hell !
 Thou hadst but power over his mortal body,
 His soul thou canst not have ; therefore be gone.

Glo. Sweet saint, for charity, be not so curst.

Anne. Foul devil, for God's sake, hence, and trouble us not ;

For thou hast made the happy earth thy hell,
 Fill'd it with cursing cries, and deep exclams.
 If thou delight to view thy heinous deeds,
 Behold this pattern of thy butcheries.
 O, gentlemen, see, see ! dead Henry's wounds
 Open their congeal'd mouths and bleed afresh !<sup>b</sup>
 Blush, blush, thou lump of foul deformity ;
 For 'tis thy presence that exhales this blood
 From cold and empty veins, where no blood dwells ;
 Thy deed, inhuman and unnatural,
 Provokes this deluge most unnatural.
 O God, which this blood mad'st, revenge his death !
 O earth, which this blood drink'st, revenge his death !
 Either, heaven, with lightning strike the murderer dead,
 Or, earth, gape open wide and eat him quick,
 As thou dost swallow up this good king's blood,
 Which his hell-govern'd arm hath butchered !

Glo. Lady, you know no rules of charity,
 Which renders good for bad, blessings for curses.

Anne. Villain, thou know'st no law of God nor man ;
 No beast so fierce but knows some touch of pity.

Glo. But I know none, and therefore am no beast.

Anne. O wonderful, when devils tell the truth !

Glo. More wonderful, when angels are so angry !
 Vouchsafe, divine perfection of a woman,
 Of these supposed crimes<sup>2</sup> to give me leave,
 By circumstance, but to acquit myself.

Anne. Vouchsafe, diffus'd infection of a man,
 For these known evils but to give me leave,
 By circumstance, to curse thy cursed self.

Glo. Fairer than tongue can name thee, let me have
 Some patient leisure to excuse myself.

Anne. Fouler than heart can think thee, thou canst make
 No excuse current, but to hang thyself.

Glo. By such despair I should accuse myself.

Anne. And by despairing shalt thou stand excus'd,
 For doing worthy vengeance on thyself,
 That didst unworthy slaughter upon others.

Glo. Say, that I slew them not.

Anne. Then say, they were not slain.<sup>3</sup>
 But dead they are, and, devilish slave, by thee.

Glo. I did not kill your husband.

Anne.

Why, then he is alive.

Glo. Nay, he is dead ; and slain by Edward's hand.

Anne. In thy foul<sup>4</sup> throat thou liest ; queen Margaret saw

Thy murderous faulchion smoking in his blood ;
 The which thou once didst bend against her breast,
 But that thy brothers beat aside the point.

Glo. I was provoked by her slanderous tongue,
 That laid their guilt upon my guiltless shoulders.

Anne. Thou wast provoked by thy bloody mind,
 That never dream'st on aught but butcheries :
 Didst thou not kill this king ?

Glo. I grant ye.

Anne. Dost grant me, hedgehog ? then God grant me too,

Thou may'st be damned for that wicked deed !
 O, he was gentle, mild, and virtuous.

Glo. The fitter for the King of heaven that hath him.

Anne. He is in heaven, where thou shalt never come.

Glo. Let him thank me that help to send him thither ;
 For he was fitter for that place than earth.

Anne. And thou unfit for any place but hell.

Glo. Yes, one place else, if you will hear me name it.

Anne. Some dungeon.

Glo. Your bed-chamber.

Anne. Ill rest betide the chamber where thou liest !

Glo. So will it, madam, till I lie with you.

Anne. I hope so.

Glo. I know so.—But, gentle lady Anne,
 To leave this keen encounter of our wits,
 And fall somewhat into a slower method,
 Is not the causer of the timeless deaths
 Of these Plantagenets, Henry and Edward,
 As blameful as the executioner ?

Anne. Thou wast the cause, and most accurs'd effect.

Glo. Your beauty was the cause of that effect ;
 Your beauty that did haunt me in my sleep,
 To undertake the death of all the world,
 So I might live one hour in your sweet bosom.

Anne. If I thought that, I tell thee, homicide,
 These nails should rend that beauty from my cheeks.

Glo. These eyes could not endure that beauty's wrack ;
 You should not blemish it if I stood by :
 As all the world is cheered by the sun,
 So I by that ; it is my day, my life.

Anne. Black night o'ershade thy day, and death thy life !

Glo. Curse not thyself, fair creature ; thou art both.

Anne. I would I were, to be reveng'd on thee.

Glo. It is a quarrel most unnatural,
 To be reveng'd on him that loveth thee.

<sup>3</sup> So the folio ; the quartos—

"Why, then, they are not dead."

<sup>4</sup> Foul throat. So the folio and quartos. It has been printed "soul's throat."

Anne. It is a quarrel just and reasonable,
To be reveng'd on him that kill'd my husband.

Glo. He that bereft thee, lady, of thy husband,
Did it to help thee to a better husband.

Anne. His better doth not breathe upon the earth.

Glo. He lives that loves thee better than he could.

Anne. Name him.

Glo. Plantagenet.

Anne. Why, that was he.

Glo. The self-same name, but one of better nature.

Anne. Where is he?

Glo. Here: [She spits at him.] Why dost thou spit at me?

Anne. 'Would it were mortal poison, for thy sake

Glo. Never came poison from so sweet a place.

Anne. Never hung poison on a fouler toad.

Out of my sight! thou dost infect mine eyes.

Glo. Thine eyes, sweet lady, have infected mine.

Anne. 'Would they were basilisks, to strike thee dead!

Glo. I would they were, that I might die at once;
For now they kill me with a living death.

Those eyes of thine from mine have drawn salt tears;

Sham'd their aspects with store of childish drops:

These eyes, which never shed remorseful tear,

No, when my father York and Edward wept

To hear the piteous moan that Rutland made,

When black-fac'd Clifford shook his sword at him:

Nor when thy warlike father, like a child,

Told the sad story of my father's death,

And twenty times made pause, to sob and weep,

That all the standers-by had wet their cheeks,

Like trees bedash'd with rain: in that sad time

My manly eyes did scorn an humble tear;

And what these sorrows could not thence exhale,

Thy beauty hath, and made them blind with weeping.<sup>1</sup>

I never sued to friend, nor enemy;

My tongue could never learn sweet smoothing<sup>2</sup> word;

But now thy beauty is propos'd my fee,

My proud heart sues, and prompts my tongue to speak.

[She looks scornfully at him.]

Teach not thy lip such scorn; for it was made

For kissing, lady, not for such contempt.

If thy revengeful heart cannot forgive,

Lo! here I lend thee this sharp-pointed sword;

Which if thou please to hide in this true breast,

And let the soul forth that adareth thee,

I lay it naked to the deadly stroke,

And humbly beg the death upon my knee.

[He lays his breast open; she offers at it with his sword.]

Nay, do not pause; for I did kill king Henry:—

But 'twas thy beauty that provoked me.

Nay, now despatch; 'twas I that stabb'd young Edward:—

[She again offers at his breast.]

But 'twas thy heavenly face that set me on.

[She lets fall the sword.]

Take up the sword again, or take up me.

Anne. Arise, dissembler: though I wish thy death,
I will not be thy executioner.

Glo. Then bid me kill myself, and I will do it.

Anne. I have already.

Glo. That was in thy rage:

Speak it again, and even with the word,

This hand, which for thy love did kill thy love,

Shall for thy love kill a far truer love;

To both their deaths shalt thou be accessory.

Anne. I would I knew thy heart.

Glo. 'Tis figur'd in my tongue.

Anne. I fear me, both are false.

Glo. Then never man was true.

Anne. Well, well, put up your sword.

Glo. Say then, my peace is made.

Anne. That shalt thou know hereafter.

Glo. But shall I live in hope?

Anne. All men, I hope, live so.

Glo. Vouchsafe to wear this ring.

Anne. To take is not to give.<sup>3</sup>

[She puts on the ring.]

Glo. Look, how my ring<sup>4</sup> encompasseth thy finger,

Even so thy breast encloseth my poor heart;

Wear both of them, for both of them are thine.

And if thy poor devoted servant may

But beg one favour at thy gracious hand,

Thou dost confirm his happiness for ever.

Anne. What is it?

Glo. That it may please you leave these sad designs

To him that hath most<sup>5</sup> cause to be a mourner,

And presently repair to Crosby-house:<sup>6</sup>

Where, after I have solemnly interr'd,

At Chertsey monastery, this noble king,

And wet his grave with my repentant tears,

I will with all expedient<sup>7</sup> duty see you:

For divers unknown reasons, I beseech you

Grant me this boon.

Anne. With all my heart; and much it joys me too

To see you are become so penitent.

Tressel, and Berkley, go along with me.

Glo. Bid me farewell.

Anne. 'Tis more than you deserve:

But, since you teach me how to flatter you,

Imagine I have said farewell already.

[Exeunt LADY ANNE, TRESSEL, and BERKLEY.]

Glo. Take up the corse, sirs.<sup>8</sup>

Gent. Towards Chertsey, noble lord?

Glo. No, to White-Friars; there attend my coming.

[Exeunt the rest, with the corse.]

Was ever woman in this humour woo'd?

Was ever woman in this humour won?

I'll have her, but I will not keep her long.

What! I, that kill'd her husband and his father,

To take her in her heart's extremest hate;

With curses in her mouth, tears in her eyes,

The bleeding witness of her hatred by;

Having<sup>9</sup> God, her conscience, and these bars against me,

And I no friends to back my suit withal,

But the plain devil, and dissembling looks,

And yet to win her, all the world to nothing!

Ha!

Hath she forgot already that brave prince,

Edward, her lord, whom I, some three months since,

Stabb'd in my angry mood at Tewkesbury?

A sweeter and a lovelier gentleman,

Fram'd in the prodigality of nature,

Young, valiant, wise, and, no doubt, right royal,

The spacious world cannot again afford:

And will she yet abase her eyes on me,

That cropp'd the golden prime of this sweet prince,

And made her widow to a woeful bed?

On me, whose all not equals Edward's moiety?

On me, that halt, and am mis-shapen thus?

<sup>3</sup> This rapid interchange of speech is wonderfully helped in its effect by the short lines of six syllables; but Steevens, by the aid of some transpositions, has contrived to manufacture these ten lines into six of the vilest resemblances to the eye of blank verse that his botching ever achieved. In the quartos Lady Anne concludes with the line which the folio omits—

My dukedom to a beggarly denier,
I do mistake my person all this while :
Upon my life, she finds, although I cannot,
Myself to be a marvellous proper man.
I'll be at charges for a looking-glass ;
And entertain a score or two of tailors
To study fashions to adorn my body :
Since I am crept in favour with myself,
I will maintain it with some little cost.
But, first, I'll turn yon' fellow in<sup>1</sup> his grave ;
And then return lamenting to my love.
Shine out, fair sun, till I have bought a glass,
That I may see my shadow as I pass. [Exit.

SCENE III.—The same. A Room in the Palace.

Enter QUEEN ELIZABETH, LORD RIVERS, and LORD GREY.

Riv. Have patience, madam ; there's no doubt his majesty

Will soon recover his accustom'd health.

Grey. In that you brook it ill it makes him worse :
Therefore, for God's sake, entertain good comfort,
And cheer his grace with quick and merry eyes.<sup>2</sup>

Q. Eliz. If he were dead, what would betide on me ?

Grey. No other harm but loss of such a lord.

Q. Eliz. The loss of such a lord includes all harms.

Grey. The heavens have bless'd you with a goodly son,
To be your comforter when he is gone.

Q. Eliz. Ah, he is young ; and his minority
Is put unto the trust of Richard Gloster,
A man that loves not me, nor none of you.

Riv. Is it concluded he shall be protector ?

Q. Eliz. It is determin'd, not concluded yet :
But so it must be if the king miscarry.

Enter BUCKINGHAM and STANLEY.

Grey. Here come the lords of Buckingham and Stanley.<sup>3</sup>

Buck. Good time of day unto your royal grace !

Stan. God make your majesty joyful as you have been !

Q. Eliz. The countess Richmond, good my lord of Stanley,

To your good prayer will scarcely say amen.
Yet, Stanley, notwithstanding she's your wife,
And loves not me, be you, good lord, assur'd
I hate not you for her proud arrogance.

Stan. I do beseech you, either not believe
The envious slanders of her false accusers ;
Or, if she be accus'd on true report,
Bear with her weakness, which, I think, proceeds
From wayward sickness, and no grounded malice.

Q. Eliz. Saw you the king to-day, my lord of Stanley ?

Stan. But now, the Duke of Buckingham and I
Are come from visiting his majesty.

Q. Eliz. What likelihood of his amendment, lords ?

Buck. Madam, good hope ; his grace speaks cheerfully.

Q. Eliz. God grant him health ! did you confer with him ?

Buck. Ay, madam : he desires to make atonement
Between the duke of Gloster and your brothers,
And between them and my lord chamberlain ;
And sent to warn<sup>4</sup> them to his royal presence.

Q. Eliz. 'Would all were well !—but that will never be !
I fear our happiness is at the height.

Enter GLOSTER, HASTINGS, and DORSET.

Glo. They do me wrong, and I will not endure it :
Who are they that complain unto the king,
That I, forsooth, am stern and love them not ?
By holy Paul, they love his grace but lightly
That fill his ears with such dissensious rumours.
Because I cannot flatter, and look<sup>5</sup> fair,
Smile in men's faces, smooth, deceive, and cog,
Duck with French nods and apish courtesy,
I must be held a rancorous enemy.
Cannot a plain man live, and think no harm,
But thus his simple truth must be abus'd
By silken, sly, insinuating Jacks ?

Grey. To whom in all this presence speaks your grace ?

Glo. To thee, that hast nor honesty nor grace.
When have I injur'd thee ? when done thee wrong ?—
Or thee ?—or thee ?—or any of your faction ?
A plague upon you all ! His royal grace,
Whom God preserve better than you would wish !—
Cannot be quiet scarce a breathing-while,
But you must trouble him with lewd complaints.

Q. Eliz. Brother of Gloster, you mistake the matter :
The king, of his own royal disposition,
And not provok'd by any suitor else ;
Aiming, belike, at your interior hatred,
That in your outward action shows itself
Against my children, brothers, and myself,
Makes him to send ; that thereby he may gather
The ground of your ill-will, and so remove it.<sup>6</sup>

Glo. I cannot tell :—The world is grown so bad
That wrens make prey<sup>7</sup> where eagles dare not perch :
Since every Jack became a gentleman,
There's many a gentle person made a Jack.

Q. Eliz. Come, come, we know your meaning, brother
Gloster ;

You envy my advancement, and my friends'
God grant we never may have need of you !

Glo. Meantime, God grants that we have need of you :
Our brother is imprison'd by your means,
Myself disgrac'd, and the nobility
Held in contempt ; while great promotions
Are daily given, to ennoble those
That scarce, some two days since, were worth a noble.

Q. Eliz. By Him that rais'd me to this careful height
From that contented hap which I enjoy'd,
I never did incense his majesty
Against the duke of Clarence, but have been
An earnest advocate to plead for him.
My lord, you do me shameful injury
Falsely to draw me in these vile suspects.

Glo. You may deny that you were not the mean<sup>8</sup>
Of my lord Hastings' late imprisonment.

Riv. She may, my lord ; for—

Glo. She may, lord Rivers ?—why, who knows not so ?
She may do more, sir, than denying that :
She may help you to many fair preferments ;
And then deny her aiding hand therein,
And lay those honours on your high desert.

What may she not ? She may,—ay, marry, may she,—

Riv. What, marry, may she ?

Glo. What, marry, may she ? marry with a king,

<sup>3</sup> Stanley. In the early part of this play, Lord Stanley, who is named such in the fourth and fifth acts, is called Derby. He was not created Earl of Derby till after the accession of Henry VII. The necessary correction throughout was made by Theobald.

<sup>6</sup> We print the passage as in the quartos. The folio has only one line, instead of the amplified reading of the quartos ; it is—

“ Makes him to send, that he may learn the ground.”

<sup>7</sup> Make prey. So in the folio and the two first quartos. The reading of many modern reprints was may prey.

<sup>8</sup> Mean in the folio ; the quartos, cause.

A bachelor, and a handsome stripling too :
I wis your grandam had a worsor match.

Q. Eliz. My lord of Gloster, I have too long borne
Your blunt upbraidings and your bitter scoffs :
By heaven, I will acquaint his majesty
Of those gross taunts that oft I have endur'd.
I had rather be a country servant-maid
Than a great queen, with this condition,
To be so baited, scorn'd, and stormed at :
Small joy have I in being England's queen.

Enter QUEEN MARGARET, behind.

Q. Mar. And lessen'd be that small, God, I beseech him !
Thy honour, state, and seat, is due to me.

Glo. What ? threat you me with telling of the king ?
Tell him, and spare not : look, what I have said<sup>2</sup>
I will avouch, in presence of the king :
I dare adventure to be sent to the Tower.
'Tis time to speak, my pains are quite forgot.

Q. Mar. Out, devil ! I do remember them too well :
Thou kill'dst my husband Henry in the Tower,
And Edward, my poor son, at Tewkesbury.

Glo. Ere you were queen, ay, or your husband king,
I was a pack-horse in his great affairs ;
A weeder out of his proud adversaries,
A liberal rewarder of his friends ;
To royalize his blood I spilt mine own.

Q. Mar. Ay, and much better blood than his, or thine.

Glo. In all which time, you, and your husband Grey,
Were factious for the house of Lancaster ;—
And, Rivers, so were you :—Was not your husband
In Margaret's battle at Saint Alban's slain ?
Let me put in your minds, if you forget,
What you have been ere this,<sup>3</sup> and what you are ;
Withal, what I have been, and what I am.

Q. Mar. A murtherous villain, and so still thou art.

Glo. Poor Clarence did forsake his father Warwick,
Ay, and forswore himself,—which Jesu pardon !—

Q. Mar. Which God revenge !

Glo. To fight on Edward's party, for the crown ;
And, for his meed, poor lord, he is mew'd up :
I would to God my heart were flint like Edward's,
Or Edward's soft and pitiful like mine ;
I am too childish-foolish for this world.

Q. Mar. Hie thee to hell for shame, and leave this world,
Thou cacodæmon ! there thy kingdom is.

Riv. My lord of Gloster, in those busy days,
Which here you urge to prove us enemies,
We follow'd then our lord, our sovereign<sup>4</sup> king ;
So should we you, if you should be our king.

Glo. If I should be ?—I had rather be a pedlar :
Far be it from my heart, the thought thereof !

Q. Eliz. As little joy, my lord, as you suppose
You should enjoy, were you this country's king ;
As little joy you may suppose in me
That I enjoy, being the queen thereof.

Q. Mar. A little joy enjoys the queen thereof !
For I am she, and altogether joyless.
I can no longer hold me patient.—

[Advancing.
Hear me, you wrangling pirates, that fall out
In sharing that which you have pill'd from me :
Which of you trembles not that looks on me ?
If not, that I being queen you bow like subjects,
Yet that by you depos'd you quake like rebels ?—
Ah, gentle villain, do not turn away !

Glo. Foul wrinkled witch, what mak'st thou in my sight ?

Q. Mar. But repetition of what thou hast marr'd ;
That will I make, before I let thee go.<sup>5</sup>

Glo. Wert thou not banished on pain of death ?

Q. Mar. I was ; but I do find more pain in banishment
Than death can yield me here by my abode.
A husband, and a son, thou ow'st to me,—
And thou, a kingdom ;—all of you, allegiance.
This sorrow that I have by right is yours ;
And all the pleasures you usurp are mine.

Glo. The curse my noble father laid on thee,
When thou didst crown his warlike brows with paper,
And with thy scorns drew'st rivers from his eyes,
And then, to dry them, gav'st the duke a clout,
Steep'd in the faultless blood of pretty Rutland ;—
His curses, then from bitterness of soul
Denounc'd against thee, are all fallen upon thee ;
And God, not we, hath plagued thy bloody deed.

Q. Eliz. So just is God, to right the innocent.

Hast. O, 'twas the foulest deed, to slay that babe,
And the most merciless, that e'er was heard of.

Riv. Tyrants themselves wept when it was reported.

Dor. No man but prophesied revenge for it.

Buck. Northumberland, then present, wept to see it.

Q. Mar. What ! were you snarling all, before I came,
Ready to catch each other by the throat,
And turn you all your hatred now on me ?
Did York's dread curse prevail so much with heaven
That Henry's death, my lovely Edward's death,
Their kingdom's loss, my woful banishment,
Should all but answer for that peevish brat ?

Can curses pierce the clouds, and enter heaven ?—
Why, then give way, dull clouds, to my quick curses !
Though not by war, by surfeit die your king,
As ours by murther, to make him a king !
Edward, thy son, that now is prince of Wales,
For Edward, our son, that was prince of Wales,
Die in his youth by like untimely violence !
Thyself a queen, for me that was a queen,
Outlive thy glory, like my wretched self !

Long may'st thou live, to wail thy children's death,<sup>6</sup>
And see another, as I see thee now,
Deck'd in thy rights, as thou art stall'd in mine !
Long die thy happy days before thy death ;
And, after many lengthen'd hours of grief,
Die neither mother, wife, nor England's queen !
Rivers, and Dorset, you were standers by,—
And so wast thou, lord Hastings,—when my son
Was stabb'd with bloody daggers : God, I pray him,
That none of you may live your natural age,
But by some unlook'd accident cut off !

Glo. Have done thy charm, thou hateful wither'd hag.

Q. Mar. And leave out thee ? stay, dog, for thou shalt hear me.

If heaven have any grievous plague in store,
Exceeding those that I can wish upon thee,
O, let them keep it, till thy sins be ripe,
And then hurl down their indignation
On thee, the troubler of the poor world's peace !
The worm of conscience still be-gnaw thy soul !
Thy friends suspect for traitors while thou liv'st,
And take deep traitors for thy dearest friends !
No sleep close up that deadly eye of thine,
Unless it be while some tormenting dream
Affrights thee with a hell of ugly devils !
Thou elvish-mark'd, abortive, rooting hog !

<sup>4</sup> Sovereign in the folio ; the quartos, lawful. The correction of the folio was certainly necessary ; for Rivers would scarcely have ventured to use the epithet lawful (legitimate) in the presence of Gloster.

<sup>5</sup> The double acceptance of the verb make is also exemplified in As You Like It :—

“ Now, sir, what make you here ?
Nothing : I am not taught to make anything.”

<sup>6</sup> Death in the folio ; the quartos, loss.

Thou that wast seal'd in thy nativity
The slave of nature, and the son of hell!
Thou slander of thy heavy mother's womb!<sup>1</sup>
Thou loathed issue of thy father's loins!
Thou rag of honour! thou detested—

Glo. Margaret.

Q. Mar. Richard!

Glo. Ha?

Q. Mar. I call thee not.

Glo. I cry thee mercy then; for I did think
That thou hadst call'd me all these bitter names.

Q. Mar. Why, so I did; but look'd for no reply.

O, let me make the period to my curse.

Glo. 'Tis done by me; and ends in—Margaret.

Q. Eliz. Thus have you breath'd your curse against yourself.

Q. Mar. Poor painted queen, vain flourish of my fortune!
Why strew'st thou sugar on that bottled spider,
Whose deadly web ensnareth thee about?
Fool, fool! thou whet'st a knife to kill thyself.
The day will come that thou shalt wish for me
To help thee curse this pois'nous bunch-back'd toad.

Hast. False-boding woman, end thy frantic curse,
Lest to thy harm thou move our patience.

Q. Mar. Foul shame upon you! you have all mov'd mine.

Riv. Were you well serv'd, you would be taught your duty.

Q. Mar. To serve me well, you all should do me duty,
Teach me to be your queen, and you my subjects:
O, serve me well, and teach yourselves that duty.

Dor. Dispute not with her, she is lunatic.

Q. Mar. Peace, master marquis, you are malapert
Your fire-new stamp of honour is scarce current:
O, that your young nobility could judge
What 'twere to lose it, and be miserable!

They that stand high have many blasts to shake them;
And if they fall they dash themselves to pieces.

Glo. Good counsel, marry; learn it, learn it, marquis.

Dor. It touches you, my lord, as much as me.

Glo. Ay, and much more: But I was born so high,
Our aiery buildeth in the cedar's top,
And dallies with the wind, and scorns the sun.

Q. Mar. And turns the sun to shade;—alas! alas!
Witness my son, now in the shade of death;
Whose bright out-shining beams thy cloudy wrath
Hath in eternal darkness folded up.

Your aiery buildeth in our aiery's nest:

O God, that seest it, do not suffer it;

As it was won with blood, lost be it so!

Buck. Peace, peace, for shame, if not for charity.

Q. Mar. Urge neither charity nor shame to me;
Uncharitably with me have you dealt,
And shamefully my hopes by you<sup>2</sup> are butcher'd.
My charity is outrage, life my shame,—
And in that shame still live my sorrow's rage!

Buck. Have done, have done.

Q. Mar. O princely Buckingham, I'll kiss thy hand,
In sign of league and amity with thee:
Now fair befall thee and thy noble house!
Thy garments are not spotted with our blood,
Nor thou within the compass of my curse.

Buck. Nor no one here; for curses never pass
The lips of those that breathe them in the air.

Q. Mar. I will not think<sup>3</sup> but they ascend the sky,
And there awake God's gentle-sleeping peace.
O Buckingham, take heed<sup>4</sup> of yonder dog;
Look, when he fawns, he bites; and, when he bites,

His venom tooth will rankle to the death:
Have not to do with him, beware of him;
Sin, death, and hell, have set their marks on him;
And all their ministers attend on him.

Glo. What doth she say, my lord of Buckingham?

Buck. Nothing that I respect, my gracious lord.

Q. Mar. What, dost thou scorn me for my gentle counsel,
And soothe the devil that I warn thee from?

O, but remember this another day,
When he shall split thy very heart with sorrow;
And say, poor Margaret was a prophetess.

Live each of you the subjects to his hate,
And he to yours, and all of you to God's! [Exit.]

Hast. My hair doth stand on end to hear her curses.

Riv. And so doth mine; I muse why she's at liberty.

Glo. I cannot blame her, by God's holy mother;
She hath had too much wrong, and I repent
My part thereof, that I have done to her.

Q. Eliz. I never did her any, to my knowledge.

Glo. Yet you have all the vantage of her wrong.

I was too hot to do somebody good,
That is too cold in thinking of it now.

Marry,—as for Clarence, he is well repaid;
He is frank'd up to fattening for his pains;
God pardon them that are the cause thereof!

Riv. A virtuous and a Christian-like conclusion,
To pray for them that hath done scath to us.

Glo. So do I ever, being well advis'd:—

For had I curs'd now, I had curs'd myself. [Aside.]

Enter CATESBY.

Cates. Madam, his majesty doth call for you,—
And for your grace,—and you, my noble lord.

Q. Eliz. Catesby, I come:—Lords, will you go with me?

Riv. We wait<sup>5</sup> upon your grace.

[Exeunt all but GLOSTER.]

Glo. I do the wrong, and first begin to brawl.
The secret mischiefs that I set abroad
I lay unto the grievous charge of others.
Clarence,—whom I, indeed, have cast<sup>6</sup> in darkness,—
I do beweepe to many simple gulls;
Namely, to Stanley, Hastings, Buckingham;
And tell them, 'tis the queen and her allies
That stir the king against the duke my brother.
Now they believe it; and withal whet me
To be reveng'd on Rivers, Dorset,<sup>7</sup> Grey:
But then I sigh, and, with a piece of scripture,
Tell them, that God bids us do good for evil:
And thus I clothe my naked villainy
With odd old ends, stolen forth of holy writ;
And seem a saint, when most I play the devil.

Enter Two Murderers.

But soft, here come my executioners.
How now, my hardy, stout resolved mates?
Are you now going to despatch this thing?
<sup>1</sup> Murd. We are, my lord; and come to have the warrant,
That we may be admitted where he is.

Glo. Well thought upon, I have it here about me:

[Gives the warrant.]

When you have done, repair to Crosby-place.
But, sirs, be sudden in the execution,
Withal obdurate, do not hear him plead;

<sup>1</sup> So the folio; the quartos, "mother's heavy womb."

<sup>2</sup> We print the passage as in the folio; in the quartos we read—

"And shamefully by you my hopes are butcher'd."

<sup>4</sup> Take heed in the folio; the quartos, beware. The correction was evidently made to avoid the repetition of the word three lines below.

<sup>5</sup> We wait. So the folio. The passage in the quarto is—

"Madam, we will attend upon your grace."

For Clarence is well spoken, and, perhaps,
May move your hearts to pity, if you mark him.

<sup>1</sup> Murd. Tut, tut, my lord, we will not stand to prate;
Talkers are no good doers; be assur'd
We go to use our hands, and not our tongues.

Glo. Your eyes drop millstones, when fools' eyes fall tears:

I like you, lads;—about your business straight;
Go, go, despatch.

<sup>2</sup> Murd. We will, my noble lord. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The same. A Room in the Tower.

Enter CLARENCE and BRAKENBURY.

Brak. Why looks your grace so heavily to-day?

Clar. O, I have pass'd a miserable night,
So full of fearful dreams, of ugly sights,
That, as I am a Christian faithful man,
I would not spend another such a night,
Though 'twere to buy a world of happy days;
So full of dismal terror was the time.

Brak. What was your dream, my lord? I pray you, tell me.

Clar. Methought that I had broken from the Tower,
And was embark'd to cross to Burgundy;
And in my company my brother Gloster:
Who from my cabin tempted me to walk
Upon the hatches; there we look'd toward England,
And cited up a thousand heavy times,
During the wars of York and Lancaster
That had befall'n us. As we pac'd along
Upon the giddy footing of the hatches,
Methought that Gloster stumbled; and, in falling,
Struck me, that thought to stay him, overboard,
Into the tumbling billows of the main.
O Lord! methought what pain it was to drown!
What dreadful noise of water in mine ears!
What sights of ugly death within mine eyes!
Methought I saw a thousand fearful wracks:
A thousand men that fishes gnaw'd upon;
Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl,
Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels,
All scatter'd in the bottom of the sea.
Some lay in dead men's skulls; and in those holes
Where eyes did once inhabit there were crept,
As 'twere in scorn of eyes, reflecting gems,
That woo'd the slimy bottom of the deep,
And mock'd the dead bones that lay scatter'd by.

Brak. Had you such leisure in the time of death,
To gaze upon these secrets of the deep?

Clar. Methought I had; and often did I strive
To yield the ghost: but still the envious flood
Stopt<sup>2</sup> in my soul, and would not let it forth
To find<sup>3</sup> the empty, vast, and wand'ring air;
But smother'd it within my panting bulk,
Which almost burst to belch it in the sea.

Brak. Awak'd you not in<sup>4</sup> this sore agony?

Clar. No,<sup>5</sup> no, my dream was lengthen'd after life;
O, then began the tempest to my soul!

I pass'd, methought, the melancholy flood
With that sour<sup>6</sup> ferryman which poets write of,
Unto the kingdom of perpetual night.
The first that there did greet my stranger soul
Was my great father-in-law, renowned Warwick;
Who spake<sup>7</sup> aloud,—“What scourge for perjury
Can this dark monarchy afford false Clarence?”
And so he vanish'd: Then came wandering by
A shadow like an angel, with bright hair
Dabbled in blood; and he shriek'd out aloud,— “Clarence is come,—false, fleeting, perjur'd Clarence,—
That stabb'd me in the field by Tewkesbury;—
Seize on him, furies, take him unto torment!”<sup>8</sup>
With that, methought, a legion of foul fiends
Environ'd me, and howled in mine ears
Such hideous cries, that, with the very noise,
I trembling wak'd, and, for a season after,
Could not believe but that I was in hell;
Such terrible impression made my dream.

Brak. No marvel, lord, though it affrighted you;
I am afraid, methinks, to hear you tell it.

Clar. O, Brakenbury,<sup>9</sup> I have done these things,—
That now give evidence against my soul,—
For Edward's sake; and see how he requites me!
O God! if my deep prayers cannot appease thee,
But thou wilt be aveng'd on my misdeeds,
Yet execute thy wrath on me alone:
O, spare my guiltless wife and my poor children!<sup>10</sup>
I pray thee, gentle keeper, stay by me;<sup>11</sup>
My soul is heavy, and I fain would sleep.

Brak. I will, my lord: God give your grace good rest!—
[CLARENCE retires.]

Sorrow breaks seasons and reposing hours,—
Makes the night morning, and the noontide night.
Princes have but their titles for their glories,
An outward honour for an inward toil;
And, for unfelt imaginations,
They often feel a world of restless cares:
So that, between their titles, and low name,
There's nothing differs but the outward fame.

Enter the Two Murderers.

<sup>1</sup> Murd. Ho! who's here?

Brak. What wouldst thou, fellow? and how cam'st thou hither?

<sup>1</sup> Murd. I would speak with Clarence, and I came hither on my legs.

Brak. What, so brief?

<sup>2</sup> Murd. 'Tis better, sir, than to be tedious:—let him see our commission, and talk no more.<sup>12</sup>

[A paper is delivered to BRAKENBURY, who reads it.]

Brak. I am in this, commanded to deliver
The noble duke of Clarence to your hands:
I will not reason what is meant hereby,
Because I will be guiltless of the meaning.
There lies the duke asleep,—and there, the keys.<sup>13</sup>
I'll to the king; and signify to him
That thus I have resign'd to you my charge.

<sup>1</sup> Murd. You may, sir; 'tis a point of wisdom:
Fare you well. [Exit BRAKENBURY.]

<sup>9</sup> In the quarto this scene commences with Clarence addressing the description of his dream to Brakenbury; but in the folio the stage direction is, “Enter Clarence and Keeper.” This change was probably designed, for in the passage before us the reading of the quartos, “O, Brakenbury,” is altered to “O, keeper, keeper.” Brakenbury subsequently enters, in the folio, when Clarence is sleeping. There does not appear any reason for deviating from the arrangement of the quartos.

<sup>11</sup> So the quartos. In the folio we read—

“Keeper, I prithee sit by me awhile.”

<sup>12</sup> We give the passage as in the plain prose of the folio. In the quartos the speech has a metrical appearance, which has been generally polished, most unnecessarily, into very smooth verse.

<sup>13</sup> In some modern editions, when Clarence says, “I fain would sleep,” we had a stage direction, “Clarence reposes himself in a chair.” This direction is founded upon the line of the quartos, which stands in the place of the line before us,—

“Here are the keys, there sits the duke asleep.”

We have no doubt that it was intended that Clarence should retire to the secondary stage, and there lie upon a couch.

2 Murd. What, shall we stab him as he sleeps?

1 Murd. No; he'll say 'twas done cowardly, when he wakes.

2 Murd. Why, he shall never wake until the great judgment day.

1 Murd. Why, then he'll say we stabb'd him sleeping.

2 Murd. The urging of that word, judgment, hath bred a kind of remorse in me.

1 Murd. What! art thou afraid?

2 Murd. Not to kill him, having a warrant; but to be damned for killing him, from the which no warrant can defend me.

1 Murd. I thought thou hadst been resolute.

2 Murd. So I am, to let him live.

1 Murd. I'll back to the duke of Gloster, and tell him so.

2 Murd. Nay, I prithee, stay a little: I hope this passionate humour of mine will change: it was wont to hold me but while one tells twenty.

1 Murd. How dost thou feel thyself now?

2 Murd. Some certain dregs of conscience are yet within me.

1 Murd. Remember our reward, when the deed's done.

2 Murd. Come, he dies; I had forgot the reward.

1 Murd. Where's thy conscience now?

2 Murd. Oh, in the duke of Gloster's purse.

1 Murd. When he opens his purse to give us our reward, thy conscience flies out.

2 Murd. 'Tis no matter; let it go; there's few, or none, will entertain it.

1 Murd. What, if it come to thee again?

2 Murd. I'll not meddle with it, [it is a dangerous thing,] it makes a man a coward; a man cannot steal but it accuseth him; a man cannot swear but it checks him; a man cannot lie with his neighbour's wife but it detects him: 'Tis a blushing shame-faced spirit that mutinies in a man's bosom; it fills one full of obstacles: it made me once restore a purse of gold that by chance I found; it beggars any man that keeps it: it is turned out of towns and cities for a dangerous thing; and every man that means to live well endeavours to trust to himself, and live without it.

1 Murd. It is now even at my elbow, persuading me not to kill the duke.

2 Murd. Take the devil in thy mind, and believe him not: he would insinuate with thee, but to make thee sigh.

1 Murd. I am strong framed, he cannot prevail with me.

2 Murd. Spoken like a tall fellow that respects his reputation. Come, shall we fall to work?

1 Murd. Take him on the costard with the hilts of thy sword, and then throw him into the malmsey-butt, in the next room.

2 Murd. O excellent device! and make a sop of him.

1 Murd. Soft! he wakes.

2 Murd. Strike.

1 Murd. No, we'll reason with him.<sup>1</sup>

Clar. Where art thou, keeper? give me a cup of wine.

1 Murd. You shall have wine enough, my lord, anon.

Clar. In God's name, what art thou?

1 Murd. A man, as you are.

Clar. But not, as I am, royal.

1 Murd. Nor you, as we are, loyal.

Clar. Thy voice is thunder, but thy looks are humble.

1 Murd. My voice is now the king's, my looks mine own.

Clar. How darkly and how deadly dost thou speak!

Your eyes do menace me: Why look you pale?

Who sent you hither? Wherefore do you come?

2 Murd. To, to, to——

Clar. To murder me?

Both Murd. Ay, ay.

Clar. You scarcely have the hearts to tell me so, And therefore cannot have the hearts to do it.

Wherein, my friends, have I offended you?

1 Murd. Offended us you have not, but the king.

Clar. I shall be reconcil'd to him again.

2 Murd. Never, my lord; therefore, prepare to die.

Clar. Are you drawn forth among a world of men,<sup>2</sup> To slay the innocent? What is my offence?

Where is the evidence that doth accuse me?

What lawful quest have given their verdict up

Unto the frowning judge? or who pronounc'd

The bitter sentence of poor Clarence's death?

Before I be convict by course of law,

To threaten me with death is most unlawful.

I charge you, as you hope for any goodness,<sup>3</sup>

That you depart, and lay no hands on me;

The deed you undertake is damnable.

1 Murd. What we will do we do upon command.

2 Murd. And he that hath commanded is our king

Clar. Erroneous vassal! the great King of kings

Hath in the table of his law commanded,

That thou shalt do no murder: Will you then

Spurn at his edict, and fulfil a man's?

Take heed; for he holds vengeance in his hand,

To hurl upon their heads that break his law.

2 Murd. And that same vengeance doth he hurl on thee,

For false forswearing, and for murder too:

Thou didst receive the sacrament to fight

In quarrel of the house of Lancaster.

1 Murd. And, like a traitor to the name of God,

Didst break that vow; and with thy treacherous blade

Unripp'dst the bowels of thy sovereign's son.

2 Murd. Whom thou wast sworn to cherish and defend.

1 Murd. How canst thou urge God's dreadful law to us, When thou hast broke it in such dear degree?

Clar. Alas! for whose sake did I that ill deed?

For Edward, for my brother, for his sake:

He sends you not to murder me for this;

For in that sin he is as deep as I.

If God will be avenged for the deed,

O, know you, yet he doth it publicly;

Take not the quarrel from his powerful arm;

He needs no indirect or lawless course,

To cut off those that have offended him.

1 Murd. Who made thee then a bloody minister,

When gallant-springing, brave Plantagenet,

That princely novice, was struck dead by thee?

Clar. My brother's love, the devil, and my rage.

1 Murd. Thy brother's love, our duty, and thy faults,

Provoke us hither now to slaughter thee.

Clar. If you do love my brother, hate not me;

I am his brother, and I love him well.

If you are hir'd for meed, go back again,

And I will send you to my brother Gloster;

Who shall reward you better for my life

Than Edward will for tidings of my death.

2 Murd. You are deceiv'd, your brother Gloster hates you.

Clar. O, no; he loves me, and he holds me dear;

Go you to him from me.

Both Murd. Ay, so we will.

Clar. Tell him, when that our princely father York

Bless'd his three sons with his victorious arm,

And charg'd us from his soul to love each other,<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In the previous dialogue between the two murderers we have adhered to the text of the folio. There are several minute differences between this text and that of the quartos, which it is scarcely necessary to point out.

“Are you call'd forth from out a world of men.”

Johnson proposed to read cull'd.

<sup>3</sup> A line is here omitted in the folio, which it is unnecessary to retain in a modern text. It was properly omitted under the statute of James, as introducing the most sacred things unnecessarily into a work of imagination. The quartos read—

“I charge you, as you hope to have redemption
By Christ's dear blood shed for our grievous sins.”

<sup>4</sup> This line is not in the folio.

He little thought of this divided friendship :
Bid Gloster think on this, and he will weep.

1 Murd. Ay, millstones ; as he lesson'd us to weep.

Clar. O, do not slander him, for he is kind.

1 Murd. Right, as snow in harvest.—Come, you deceive yourself :

'Tis he that sends us to destroy you here.

Clar. It cannot be, for he bewept my fortune,
And hugg'd me in his arms, and swore, with sobs,
That he would labour my delivery.

1 Murd. Why, so he doth, when he delivers you
From this earth's thralldom to the joys of heaven.

2 Murd. Make peace with God, for you must die, my lord.

Clar. Have you that holy feeling in your souls,
To counsel me to make my peace with God,
And are you yet to your own souls so blind,
That you will war with God, by murdering me ?
Oh, sirs, consider, they that set you on
To do this deed will hate you for the deed.

2 Murd. What shall we do ?

Clar. Relent, and save your souls.
Which of you, if you were a prince's son,
Being pent from liberty, as I am now,
If two such murderers as yourselves came to you,
Would not entreat for life ?

1 Murd. Relent ! No. 'Tis cowardly and womanish.

Clar. Not to relent, is beastly, savage, devilish.—
My friend, I spy some pity in thy looks ;
O, if thine eye be not a flatterer,
Come thou on my side, and entreat for me,
As you would beg, were you in my distress :<sup>1</sup>
A begging prince, what beggar pities not ?

2 Murd. Look behind you, my lord.

1 Murd. Take that, and that ; if all this will not do,
[Stabs him.]

I'll drown you in the malmsey-butt within.

[Exit, with the body.]

2 Murd. A bloody deed, and desperately despatch'd !
How fain, like Pilate, would I wash my hands
Of this most grievous murder !

Re-enter First Murderer.

1 Murd. How now ? what mean'st thou, that thou help'st me not ?

By heaven, the duke shall know how slack you have been.

2 Murd. I would he knew that I had sav'd his brother !
Take thou the fee, and tell him what I say ;
For I repent me that the duke is slain. [Exit.]

1 Murd. So do not I ; go, coward as thou art.
Well, I'll go hide the body in some hole,
Till that the duke give order for his burial ;
And when I have my meed, I will away ;
For this will out, and then I must not stay. [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same. A Room in the Palace.

*Enter KING EDWARD, (led in sick,) QUEEN ELIZABETH, DORSET, RIVERS, HASTINGS, BUCKINGHAM, GREY,
and others.*

K. Edw. Why, so :—now have I done a good day's work ;—

<sup>1</sup> In the folio these words, "As you would beg, were you in my distress," occur at the end of Clarence's former speech. Tyrwhitt first suggested that the five lines added to the text of the quartos properly belong to the duke's last speech. This suggestion has been adopted by most modern editors. We, however, prefer, wherever possible, to adhere to the folio. The text of the quartos is as follows :—

You peers, continue this united league :
I every day expect an embassy
From my Redeemer to redeem me hence ;
And now in peace<sup>2</sup> my soul shall part to heaven,
Since I have made my friends at peace on earth.
Rivers and Hastings, take each other's hand ;
Dissemble not your hatred, swear your love.

Riv. By heaven, my soul is purg'd from grudging hate ;
And with my hand I seal my true heart's love.

Hast. So thrive I, as I truly swear the like !

K. Edw. Take heed you dally not before your king ;
Lest He that is the supreme King of kings
Confound your hidden falsehood, and award
Either of you to be the other's end.

Hast. So prosper I, as I swear perfect love !

Riv. And I, as I love Hastings with my heart !

K. Edw. Madam, yourself are not exempt in this,— Nor you, son Dorset,—Buckingham, nor you ;—
You have been factious one against the other.
Wife, love lord Hastings, let him kiss your hand ;
And what you do, do it unfeignedly.

Q. Eliz. There, Hastings ;—I will never more remember
Our former hatred, so thrive I and mine !

K. Edw. Dorset, embrace him,—Hastings, love lord marquis.

Dor. This interchange of love, I here protest,
Upon my part shall be inviolable.

Hast. And so swear I. [Embraces DORSET.]

K. Edw. Now, princely Buckingham, seal thou this league,

With thy embracements to my wife's allies,
And make me happy in your unity.

Buck. Whenever Buckingham doth turn his hate
Upon your grace, [to the QUEEN] but with all duteous love
Doth cherish you, and yours, God punish me
With hate in those where I expect most love !
When I have most need to employ a friend,
And most assured that he is a friend,
Deep, hollow, treacherous, and full of guile,
Be he unto me ! this do I beg of heaven,
When I am cold in love to you or yours.

[Embracing RIVERS, &c.]

K. Edw. A pleasing cordial, princely Buckingham,
Is this thy vow unto my sickly heart.
There wanteth now our brother Gloster here,
To make the blessed period of this peace.

Buck. And, in good time, here comes the noble duke.<sup>3</sup>

Enter GLOSTER.

Glo. Good morrow to my sovereign king and queen ;
And, princely peers, a happy time of day !

K. Edw. Happy, indeed, as we have spent the day :
Gloster,<sup>4</sup> we have done deeds of charity ;
Made peace of enmity, fair love of hate,
Between these swelling wrong-incensed peers.

Glo. A blessed labour, my most sovereign lord.<sup>5</sup>—
Among this princely heap, if any here,
By false intelligence or wrong surmise,
Hold me a foe ;

"Clar. Relent, and save your souls.

1 M. Relent ! 'tis cowardly and womanish.

Clar. Not to relent, is beastly, savage, and devilish.

My friend, I spy some pity in thy looks ;

O, if thine eye be not a flatterer,

Come thou on my side and entreat for me :

A begging prince what beggar pities not ?"

<sup>2</sup> So the quarto ; the folio has, more to peace.

<sup>3</sup> So the quartos ; the folio—

"And, in good time,
Here comes Sir Richard Ratcliffe and the duke."

<sup>4</sup> Gloster in the folio ; the quartos, brother.

<sup>5</sup> Lord in the folio ; the quartos, liege.

If I unwittingly, or in my rage,
Have aught committed that is hardly borne
By any in this presence, I desire
To reconcile me to his friendly peace;
'Tis death to me to be at enmity;
I hate it, and desire all good men's love.
First, madam, I entreat true peace of you,
Which I will purchase with my duteous service;
Of you, my noble cousin Buckingham,
If ever any grudge were lodg'd between us;
Of you, and you, lord Rivers, and of Dorset—
That all without desert have frown'd on me;—
Of you, lord Woodville, and lord Scales, of you,<sup>1</sup>—
Dukes, earls, lords, gentlemen; indeed, of all,
I do not know that Englishman alive
With whom my soul is any jot at odds,
More than the infant that is born to-night;
I thank my God for my humility.

Q. Eliz. A holy-day shall this be kept hereafter:
I would to God all strifes were well compounded.
My sovereign lord, I do beseech your highness
To take our brother Clarence to your grace.

Glo. Why, madam, have I offer'd love for this,
To be so flouted in this royal presence?
Who knows not that the gentle duke is dead?

[They all start.]

You do him injury to scorn his corse.

K. Edw. Who knows not he is dead! who knows he is?

Q. Eliz. All-seeing heaven, what a world is this!

Buck. Look I so pale, lord Dorset, as the rest?

Dor. Ay, my good lord; and no man in the presence,
But his red colour hath forsook his cheeks.

K. Edw. Is Clarence dead? the order was revers'd.

Glo. But he, poor man, by your first order died,
And that a winged Mercury did bear;
Some tardy cripple bore the countermand,
That came too lag to see him buried:
God grant that some, less noble and less loyal,
Nearer in bloody thoughts, and not in blood,
Deserve not worse than wretched Clarence did,
And yet go current from suspicion!

Enter STANLEY.

Stan. A boon, my sovereign, for my service done!

K. Edw. I prithee, peace; my soul is full of sorrow.

Stan. I will not rise unless your highness hear me.

K. Edw. Then say at once, what is it thou request'st.

Stan. The forfeit, sovereign, of my servant's life:
Who slew to-day a riotous gentleman,
Lately attendant on the duke of Norfolk.

K. Edw. Have I a tongue to doom my brother's death,
And shall that tongue give pardon to a slave?
My brother kill'd no man, his fault was thought,
And yet his punishment was bitter death.
Who sued to me for him? who, in my wrath,
Kneel'd at my feet, and bade me be advis'd?
Who spoke of brotherhood? who spoke of love?
Who told me how the poor soul did forsake
The mighty Warwick, and did fight for me?
Who told me in the field at Tewkesbury,
When Oxford had me down, he rescu'd me,
And said, "Dear brother, live, and be a king"?
Who told me, when we both lay in the field,
Frozen almost to death, how he did lap me
Even in his garments; and did give himself,
All thin and naked, to the numb-cold night?
All this from my remembrance brutish wrath
Sinfully pluck'd, and not a man of you

Had so much grace to put it in my mind.
But, when your carters, or your waiting-vassals,
Have done a drunken slaughter, and defac'd
The precious image of our dear Redeemer,
You straight are on your knees for pardon, pardon;
And I unjustly, too, must grant it you:—
But for my brother not a man would speak,
Nor I (ungracious) speak unto myself
For him, poor soul. The proudest of you all
Have been beholden to him in his life;
Yet none of you would once plead for his life.
O God! I fear thy justice will take hold
On me, and you, and mine, and yours, for this.
Come, Hastings, help me to my closet.
Ah! poor Clarence!

[Exeunt KING, QUEEN, HASTINGS, RIVERS, DORSET, and GREY.]

Glo. This is the fruit of rashness! Mark'd you not How that the guilty kindred of the queen
Look'd pale, when they did hear of Clarence' death?
O! they did urge it still unto the king:
God will revenge it. Come, lords; will you go,
To comfort Edward with our company?

Buck. We wait upon your grace.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The same.

Enter the DUCHESS OF YORK, with a Son and Daughter of CLARENCE.

Son. Good grandam, tell us, is our father dead?

Duch. No, boy.

Daugh. Why do you weep so oft? and beat your breast;
And cry—"O Clarence, my unhappy son!"

Son. Why do you look on us, and shake your head,
And call us orphans, wretches, cast-aways,
If that our noble father were alive?

Duch. My pretty cousins,<sup>2</sup> you mistake me both:
I do lament the sickness of the king,
As loath to lose him, not your father's death;
It were lost sorrow to wail one that's lost.

Son. Then you conclude, my grandam, he is dead.
The king my uncle is to blame for this:
God will revenge it; whom I will importune
With earnest prayers all to that effect.

Daugh. And so will I.

Duch. Peace, children, peace! the king doth love you
well:

Incapable and shallow innocents,
You cannot guess who caus'd your father's death.

Son. Grandam, we can: for my good uncle Gloster
Told me, the king, provok'd to 't by the queen,
Devis'd impeachments to imprison him
And when my uncle told me so, he wept,
And pitied me, and kindly kiss'd my cheek;
Bade me rely on him as on my father,
And he would love me dearly as his child.

Duch. Ah, that deceit should steal such gentle shapes,
And with a virtuous visor hide deep vice!
He is my son, ay, and therein my shame,
Yet from my dugs he drew not this deceit.

Son. Think you my uncle did dissemble, grandam?

Duch. Ay, boy.

Son. I cannot think it. Hark! what noise is this?

Enter QUEEN ELIZABETH, distractedly; RIVERS and DORSET following her.

Q. Eliz. Ah! who shall hinder me to wail and weep?

<sup>1</sup> We print this passage as in the folio. The line in which Lord Woodville and Lord Scales are named is not in the quartos.

To chide my fortune, and torment myself?
I'll join with black despair against my soul,
And to myself become an enemy.

Duch. What means this scene of rude impatience?

Q. Eliz. To make an act of tragic violence.
Edward, my lord, thy son, our king, is dead.
Why grow the branches when the root is gone?
Why wither not the leaves that want their sap?
If you will live, lament; if die, be brief;
That our swift-winged souls may catch the king's;
Or, like obedient subjects, follow him
To his new kingdom of ne'er-changing night.<sup>1</sup>

Duch. Ah, so much interest have I in thy sorrow,
As I had title in thy noble husband!
I have bewept a worthy husband's death,
And liv'd by looking on his images:
But now, two mirrors of his princely semblance
Are crack'd in pieces by malignant death;
And I for comfort have but one false glass,
That grieves me when I see my shame in him.
Thou art a widow; yet thou art a mother,
And hast the comfort of thy children left;<sup>2</sup>
But death hath snatch'd my husband from mine arms,
And pluck'd two crutches from my feeble hands,
Clarence and Edward. O, what cause have I
(Thine being but a moiety of my moan,<sup>3</sup>)
To over-go thy woes,<sup>4</sup> and drown thy cries?

Son. Ah, aunt! you wept not for our father's death;
How can we aid you with our kindred tears?

Daugh. Our fatherless distress was left unmoan'd;
Your widow-dolour likewise be unwept!

Q. Eliz. Give me no help in lamentation;
I am not barren to bring forth complaints:<sup>5</sup>
All springs reduce their currents to mine eyes,
That I, being govern'd by the watery moon,
May send forth plenteous tears to drown the world!
Ah, for my husband, for my dear lord Edward!

Chil. Ah, for our father, for our dear lord Clarence!

Duch. Alas, for both, both mine, Edward and Clarence!

Q. Eliz. What stay had I but Edward? and he's gone.

Chil. What stay had we but Clarence? and he's gone.

Duch. What stays had I but they? and they are gone.

Q. Eliz. Was never widow had so dear a loss.

Chil. Were never orphans had so dear a loss.

Duch. Was never mother had so dear a loss.

Alas! I am the mother of these griefs;
Their woes are parcell'd, mine are general.
She for an Edward weeps, and so do I;
I for a Clarence weep, so doth not she;
These babes for Clarence weep, and so do I;
I for an Edward weep, so do not they:<sup>6</sup>
Alas! you three on me, threefold distress'd,
Pour all your tears, I am your sorrow's nurse,
And I will pamper it with lamentations.

Dor. Comfort, dear mother: God is much displeas'd
That you take with unthankfulness his doing;
In common worldly things 'tis called ungrateful,
With dull unwillingness to repay a debt,
Which with a bounteous hand was kindly lent;
Much more to be thus opposite with heaven,
For it requires the royal debt it lent you.

Riv. Madam, bethink you, like a careful mother,
Of the young prince your son: send straight for him,

Let him be crown'd; in him your comfort lives:
Drown desperate sorrow in dead Edward's grave,
And plant your joys in living Edward's throne.<sup>7</sup>

Enter GLOSTER, BUCKINGHAM, STANLEY, HASTINGS,
RATCLIFF, and others.

Glo. Sister, have comfort: all of us have cause
To wail the dimming of our shining star;
But none can help our<sup>8</sup> harms by wailing them.
Madam, my mother, I do cry you mercy,
I did not see your grace:—Humbly on my knee
I crave your blessing.

Duch. God bless thee, and put meekness in thy breast,
Love, charity, obedience, and true duty!

Glo. Amen; and make me die a good old man!
That is the butt-end of a mother's blessing;

I marvel that her grace did leave it out. [Aside.]

Buck. You cloudy princes, and heart-sorrowing peers,
That bear this heavy mutual<sup>9</sup> load of moan,
Now cheer each other in each other's love:
Though we have spent our harvest of this king,
We are to reap the harvest of his son.
The broken rancour of your high swoln hearts,<sup>10</sup>
But lately splinter'd, knit, and join'd together,
Must gently be preserv'd, cherish'd, and kept:
Me seemeth good, that, with some little train,
Forthwith from Ludlow the young prince be fet<sup>a</sup>
Hither to London, to be crown'd our king.

Riv. Why with some little train, my lord of Buckingham?

Buck. Marry, my lord, lest by a multitude,
The new-heal'd wound of malice should break out;
Which would be so much the more dangerous,
By how much the estate is green and yet ungovern'd:
Where every horse bears his commanding rein,
And may direct his course as please himself,
As well the fear of harm, as harm apparent,
In my opinion, ought to be prevented.

Glo. I hope the king made peace with all of us;
And the compact is firm, and true, in me.

Riv. And so in me; and so, I think, in all:
Yet, since it is but green, it should be put
To no apparent likelihood of breach,
Which, haply, by much company might be urg'd:
Therefore I say, with noble Buckingham,
That it is meet so few should fetch the prince.

Hast. And so say I.<sup>11</sup>

Glo. Then be it so; and go we to determine
Who they shall be that straight shall post to Ludlow.
Madam, and you my sister,<sup>12</sup> will you go
To give your censures<sup>13</sup> in this weighty business?

[Exeunt all but BUCKINGHAM and GLOSTER.]

Buck. My lord, whoever journeys to the prince,
For God's sake, let not us two stay at home:
For, by the way, I'll sort occasion,
As index to the story we late talk'd of,
To part the queen's proud kindred from the prince.

Glo. My other self, my counsel's consistory,
My oracle, my prophet!—My dear cousin,
I, as a child, will go by thy direction.
Towards Ludlow then, for we'll not stay behind.

[Exeunt.]

<sup>1</sup> So the folio; the quartos, perpetual rest.

<sup>5</sup> Complaints in the folio; the quartos, lamentations.

<sup>6</sup> This is the reading of the quarto of 1597. The folio has—
"These babes for Clarence weep, so do not they."

The portion of the text omitted evidently requires to be restored.

<sup>9</sup> Heavy mutual in the folio; the quartos have the words transposed.

<sup>10</sup> Hearts in the quartos; the folio, hates. Monck Mason objects that the poet, by "inadvertency," exhorts them to preserve the rancour of their hearts. It is surely the broken rancour—the breaking up of the rancour—that must be preserved and cherished.

<sup>13</sup> Censures—opinions.

SCENE III.—The same. A Street.Enter Two Citizens, meeting.

1 Cit. Good morrow, neighbour: Whither away so fast?

2 Cit. I promise you, I scarcely know myself
Hear you the news abroad?

1 Cit. Yes; that the king is dead.

2 Cit. Ill news, by'r lady; seldom comes the better:
I fear, I fear, 'twill prove a giddy world.

Enter another Citizen.

3 Cit. Neighbours, God speed!

1 Cit. Give you good morrow, sir.

3 Cit. Doth the news hold of good king Edward's death?

2 Cit. Ay, sir, it is too true; God help, the while!

3 Cit. Then, masters, look to see a troublous world.

1 Cit. No, no; by God's good grace his son shall reign.

3 Cit. Woe to that land that's govern'd by a child!

2 Cit. In him there is a hope of government;

That in his nonage council under him,
And in his full and ripen'd years himself,
No doubt, shall then, and till then, govern well.

1 Cit. So stood the state when Henry the Sixth
Was crown'd in Paris but at nine months old.

3 Cit. Stood the state so? no, no, good friends, God wot;
For then this land was famously enrich'd
With politic grave counsel; then the king
Had virtuous uncles to protect his grace.

1 Cit. Why, so hath this, both by his father and mother.

3 Cit. Better it were they all came by his father;
Or, by his father, there were none at all:
For emulation who shall now be nearest,
Will touch us all too near, if God prevent not.
O, full of danger is the duke of Gloster;
And the queen's sons and brothers haught and proud:
And were they to be rul'd, and not to rule,
This sickly land might solace as before.

1 Cit. Come, come, we fear the worst; all will be well.

3 Cit. When clouds are seen wise men put on their cloaks;
When great leaves fall then winter is at hand;
When the sun sets who doth not look for night?
Untimely storms make men expect a dearth:
All may be well; but, if God sort it so,
'Tis more than we deserve, or I expect.

2 Cit. Truly, the hearts of men are full of fear:
You cannot reason<sup>1</sup> almost with a man
That looks not heavily and full of dread.

3 Cit. Before the days of change, still is it so:
By a divine instinct, men's minds mistrust
Ensuing danger; as, by proof, we see
The waters swell before a boist'rous storm.
But leave it all to God. Whither away?

2 Cit. Marry, we were sent for to the justices.

3 Cit. And so was I; I'll bear you company. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The same. A Room in the Palace.

Enter the ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, the young DUKE OF YORK, QUEEN ELIZABETH, and the DUCHESS OF YORK.

Arch. Last night, I hear, they lay at Northampton;

<sup>1</sup> Reason—converse.

<sup>2</sup> This is the reading of the quarto. The folio has—

“Last night, I heard, they lay at Stony-Stratford;
And at Northampton they do rest to-night.”

The Cambridge editors agree with Malone that the correction in the folio, made probably for the sake of the metre, is inconsistent with the archbishop's ignorance of the fact that the young king had been taken back to Northampton. (See Historical Illustration.)

At Stony-Stratford will they be to-night:<sup>2</sup>
To-morrow, or next day, they will be here.

Duch. I long with all my heart to see the prince.
I hope he is much grown since last I saw him.

Q. Eliz. But I hear, no; they say, my son of York
Hath almost overta'en him in his growth.

York. Ay, mother, but I would not have it so.

Duch. Why, my good cousin? it is good to grow.

York. Grandam, one night, as we did sit at supper,
My uncle Rivers talk'd how I did grow
More than my brother; “Ay,” quoth my uncle Gloster,
“Small herbs have grace, great weeds do grow apace:”
And since, methinks, I would not grow so fast,
Because sweet flowers are slow, and weeds make haste.

Duch. 'Good faith, 'good faith, the saying did not hold
In him that did object the same to thee:

He was the wretched'st thing, when he was young,
So long a growing, and so leisurely,
That, if his rule were true, he should be gracious.

Arch. And so, no doubt, he is, my gracious madam.

Duch. I hope he is; but yet let mothers doubt.

York. Now, by my troth, if I had been remember'd,
I could have given my uncle's grace a flout,
To touch his growth nearer than he touch'd mine.

Duch. How, my young York? I prithee let me hear it.

York. Marry, they say, my uncle grew so fast,
That he could gnaw a crust at two hours old;
'Twas full two years ere I could get a tooth.
Grandam, this would have been a biting jest.

Duch. I prithee, pretty York, who told thee this?

York. Grandam, his nurse.

Duch. His nurse! why, she was dead ere thou wast born.

York. If 'twere not she I cannot tell who told me.

Q. Eliz. A parlous boy: Go to, you are too shrewd.

Arch. Good madam, be not angry with the child.

Q. Eliz. Pitchers have ears.

Enter a Messenger.

Arch. Here comes a messenger:
What news?

Mess. Such news, my lord,
As grieves me to report.<sup>3</sup>

Q. Eliz. How doth the prince?

Mess. Well, madam, and in health.

Duch. What is thy news?

Mess. Lord Rivers, and lord Grey, are sent to Pomfret,
And with them sir Thomas Vaughan, prisoners.

Duch. Who hath committed them?

Mess. The mighty dukes,
Gloster and Buckingham.

Arch. For what offence?

Mess. The sum of all I can I have disclos'd;
Why, or for what, the nobles were committed,
Is all unknown to me, my gracious lord.<sup>4</sup>

Q. Eliz. Ah me, I see the ruin of my house!
The tiger now hath seiz'd the gentle hind;
Insulting tyranny begins to jut

Upon the innocent and awless throne:
Welcome, destruction, blood, and massacre!
I see, as in a map, the end of all.

Duch. Accursed and unquiet wrangling days,
How many of you have mine eyes beheld!
My husband lost his life to get the crown;
And often up and down my sons were toss'd,
For me to joy, and weep, their gain and loss:
And being seated, and domestic broils
Clean over-blown, themselves, the conquerors,

<sup>4</sup> Lord in the folio; the quartos, lady. The correction is necessary, for in all the old copies the archbishop asks the question to which this is an answer.

OF YORK.

QUEEN ELIZABETH I AND THE (KING JAMES VI)

Make war upon themselves; brother to brother,
Blood to blood, self against self: O, preposterous
And frantic outrage,<sup>1</sup> end thy damned spleen:
Or let me die, to look on death<sup>2</sup> no more!

Q. Eliz. Come, come, my boy, we will to sanctuary.
Madam, farewell.

Duch. Stay, I will go with you.

Q. Eliz. You have no cause.

Arch. My gracious lady, go,
[To the QUEEN.]

And thither bear your treasure and your goods.
For my part, I'll resign unto your grace
The seal I keep: And so betide to me,
As well I tender you, and all of yours!
Go,<sup>3</sup> I'll conduct you to the sanctuary. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—London. A Street.

The trumpets sound. Enter the PRINCE OF WALES, GLOSTER, BUCKINGHAM, CARDINAL BOURCHIER, and others.

Buck. Welcome, sweet prince, to London, to your chamber.<sup>4</sup>

Glo. Welcome, dear cousin, my thoughts' sovereign:
The weary way hath made you melancholy.

Prince. No, uncle; but our crosses on the way
Have made it tedious, wearisome, and heavy:
I want more uncles here to welcome me.

Glo. Sweet prince, the untainted virtue of your years
Hath not yet div'd into the world's deceit:
No more can you distinguish of a man
Than of his outward show; which, God he knows,
Seldom or never jumpeth with the heart.
Those uncles which you want were dangerous;
Your grace attended to their sugar'd words,
But look'd not on the poison of their hearts:
God keep you from them, and from such false friends!

Prince. God keep me from false friends! but they were none.

Glo. My lord, the mayor of London comes to greet you.

Enter the Lord Mayor, and his Train.

May. God bless your grace with health and happy days!

Prince. I thank you, good my lord;—and thank you all.—

[Exeunt Mayor, &c.]

I thought my mother and my brother York
Would long ere this have met us on the way:
Fie, what a slug is Hastings! that he comes not
To tell us whether they will come, or no.

Enter HASTINGS.

Buck. And in good time, here comes the sweating lord.

Prince. Welcome, my lord: What, will our mother come?

Hast. On what occasion, God he knows, not I,
The queen, your mother, and your brother York,
Have taken sanctuary: The tender prince

Would fain have come with me to meet your grace,
But by his mother was perforce withheld.

Buck. Fie! what an indirect and peevish course
Is this of hers!—Lord cardinal, will your grace
Persuade the queen to send the duke of York
Unto his princely brother presently?
If she deny, lord Hastings, go with him,
And from her jealous arms pluck him perforce.

Card. My lord of Buckingham, if my weak oratory
Can from his mother win the duke of York,
Anon expect him here: But if she be obdurate
To mild entreaties, God in heaven<sup>4</sup> forbid
We should infringe the holy privilege
Of blessed sanctuary! not for all this land
Would I be guilty of so great<sup>5</sup> a sin.

Buck. You are too senseless-obstinate, my lord,
Too ceremonious and traditional:
Weigh it but with the grossness of this age,
You break not sanctuary in seizing him.

The benefit thereof is always granted
To those whose dealings have deserv'd the place,
And those who have the wit to claim the place:
This prince hath neither claim'd it, nor deserv'd it;
And therefore, in mine opinion, cannot have it:
Then, taking him from thence, that is not there,
You break no privilege nor charter there.

Oft have I heard of sanctuary men;
But sanctuary children ne'er till now.

Card. My lord, you shall o'errule my mind for once.
Come on, lord Hastings, will you go with me?

Hast. I go, my lord.

Prince. Good lords, make all the speedy haste you may.

[Exeunt CARDINAL and HASTINGS.]

Say, uncle Gloster, if our brother come,
Where shall we sojourn till our coronation?

Glo. Where it seems<sup>6</sup> best unto your royal self.
If I may counsel you, some day or two
Your highness shall repose you at the Tower:
Then where you please, and<sup>7</sup> shall be thought most fit
For your best health and recreation.

Prince. I do not like the Tower, of any place:—
Did Julius Cæsar build that place, my lord?

Glo. He did, my gracious lord, begin that place;
Which, since, succeeding ages have re-edified.

Prince. Is it upon record? or else reported
Successively from age to age, he built it?

Buck. Upon record, my gracious lord.

Prince. But say, my lord, it were not register'd;
Methinks, the truth could live from age to age,
As 'twere retail'd<sup>8</sup> to all posterity,
Even to the general all-ending day.

Glo. So wise, so young, they say, do never live long.

[Aside.]

Prince. What say you, uncle?

Glo. I say, without characters,<sup>9</sup> fame lives long.
Thus like the formal Vice Iniquity,<sup>b</sup>
I moralise two meanings in one word.<sup>10</sup>

[Aside.]

Prince. That Julius Cæsar was a famous man:
With what his valour did enrich his wit,
His wit set down to make his valour live:

<sup>1</sup> The quarto of 1597 and the folio agree in reading outrage; some of the other old editions have courage.

<sup>2</sup> Death is the reading of the quarto of 1597; the other quartos and the folio have earth.

<sup>3</sup> Go in the folio; the quartos, come.

<sup>7</sup> Where is understood here; if it were repeated there would be no difficulty in the construction of the sentence.

<sup>8</sup> Retail'd. In the fourth act this verb is again used with the same meaning:—

“To whom I will retail my conquest won.”

Retail and detail, according to Tooke, are both derived from tale, the past participle of the Anglo Saxon verb tell-an, to tell. The tale is something told, as in the well-known passage in Milton's “L'Allegro:”—

“And every shepherd tells his tale.”

This is not—tells his story—but counts over the number of his sheep as he lets them out of their fold, in the earliest hour of the morning. So to retail is to tell over again; and the word became applied to small tradings, because to sell by tale is to sell by numeration, and the retail was the repetition of the numeration. In Lord Berners' Froissart we find merchandise “taled and retailed.” The truth “retail'd to all posterity” is the truth retold to all posterity.

<sup>10</sup> The equivocation which Richard uses consists in the repetition of the words “live long,” which the prince has caught, but with a different “meaning.” He has moralised “two meanings” by retaining the same conclusion of his sentence, or “word.”

Death makes no conquest of this conqueror ;
For now he lives in fame, though not in life.—
I'll tell you what, my cousin Buckingham.

Buck. What, my gracious lord ?

Prince. An if I live until I be a man,
I'll win our ancient right in France again,
Or die a soldier, as I liv'd a king.

Glo. Short summers lightly<sup>1</sup> have a forward spring.

[Aside.]

Enter YORK, HASTINGS, and the CARDINAL.

Buck. Now, in good time, here comes the duke of York.

Prince. Richard of York! how fares our noble<sup>2</sup> brother ?

York. Well, my dread<sup>3</sup> lord; so must I call you now.

Prince. Ay, brother; to our grief, as it is yours:
Too late<sup>4</sup> he died that might have kept that title,
Which by his death hath lost much majesty.

Glo. How fares our cousin, noble lord of York ?

York. I thank you, gentle uncle. O, my lord,
You said, that idle weeds are fast in growth:
The prince my brother hath outgrown me far.

Glo. He hath, my lord.

York. And therefore is he idle ?

Glo. O, my fair cousin, I must not say so.

York. Then he is more beholden to you than I.

Glo. He may command me as my sovereign;
But you have power in me, as in a kinsman.

York. I pray you, uncle,<sup>5</sup> give me this dagger.

Glo. My dagger, little cousin? with all my heart.

Prince. A beggar, brother ?

York. Of my kind uncle, that I know will give;
And, being but a toy, which is no grief to give.

Glo. A greater gift than that I'll give my cousin.

York. A greater gift? O, that's the sword to it.

Glo. Ay, gentle cousin, were it light enough.

York. O then, I see, you will part but with light gifts;

In weightier things you'll say a beggar, nay.

Glo. It is too weighty for your grace to wear.

York. I weigh it lightly, were it heavier.

Glo. What, would you have my weapon, little lord ?

York. I would, that I might thank you as you call me.

Glo. How ?

York. Little.

Prince. My lord of York will still be cross in talk;
Uncle, your grace knows how to bear with him.

York. You mean, to bear me, not to bear with me:
Uncle, my brother mocks both you and me;
Because that I am little, like an ape,
He thinks that you should bear me on your shoulders.

Buck. With what a sharp-provided wit he reasons!
To mitigate the scorn he gives his uncle,
He prettily and aptly taunts himself:
So cunning, and so young, is wonderful.

Glo. My lord,<sup>6</sup> will't please you pass along?
Myself, and my good cousin Buckingham,
Will to your mother, to entreat of her
To meet you at the Tower, and welcome you.

York. What, will you go unto the Tower, my lord ?

Prince. My lord protector needs will have it so.

York. I shall not sleep in quiet at the Tower.

Glo. Why, what should you fear ?<sup>7</sup>

York. Marry, my uncle Clarence' angry ghost?
My grandam told me he was murther'd there.

Prince. I fear no uncles dead.

Glo. Nor none that live, I hope.

Prince. An if they live, I hope I need not fear.

But come, my lord, and, with a heavy heart,
Thinking on them, go I unto the Tower.

[Exeunt PRINCE, YORK, HASTINGS, CARDINAL,
and Attendants.]

Buck. Think you, my lord, this little prating York
Was not incensed<sup>8</sup> by his subtle mother,
To taunt and scorn you thus opprobriously ?

Glo. No doubt, no doubt: O, 'tis a parlous boy;
Bold, quick, ingenious, forward, capable;
He's all the mother's, from the top to toe.

Buck. Well, let them rest.

Come hither, Catesby; thou art sworn
As deeply to effect what we intend,
As closely to conceal what we impart:
Thou know'st our reasons urg'd upon the way:
What think'st thou? is it not an easy matter
To make William lord Hastings of our mind,
For the instalment of this noble duke
In the seat royal of this famous isle ?

Cate. He, for his father's sake, so loves the prince,
That he will not be won to aught against him.

Buck. What think'st thou then of Stanley? will not he ?

Cate. He will do all in all as Hastings doth.

Buck. Well then, no more but this: Go, gentle Catesby,
And, as it were far off, sound thou lord Hastings
How he doth stand affected to our purpose;
And summon him to-morrow to the Tower,
To sit about the coronation.<sup>9</sup>

If thou dost find him tractable to us,
Encourage him, and tell him all our reasons:
If he be leaden, icy, cold, unwilling,
Be thou so too; and so break off the talk,
And give us notice of his inclination:
For we to-morrow hold divided councils,
Wherein thyself shalt highly be employ'd.

Glo. Commend me to lord William: tell him, Catesby,
His ancient knot of dangerous adversaries
To-morrow are let blood at Pomfret-castle;
And bid my lord,<sup>10</sup> for joy of this good news,
Give mistress Shore one gentle kiss the more.

Buck. Good Catesby, go, effect this business soundly.

Cate. My good lords both, with all the heed I can.

Glo. Shall we hear from you, Catesby, ere we sleep ?

Cate. You shall, my lord.

Glo. At Crosby-house there shall you find us both.<sup>11</sup>

[Exit CATESBY.]

Buck. Now, my lord, what shall we do, if we perceive
Lord Hastings will not yield to our complots ?

Glo. Chop off his head;—something we will determine:<sup>11</sup>—

And, look, when I am king, claim thou of me
The earldom of Hereford, and all the moveables
Whereof the king my brother was possess'd.

Buck. I'll claim that promise at your grace's hand.

Glo. And look to have it yielded with all kindness.

Come, let us sup betimes; that afterwards
We may digest our complots in some form.

[Exeunt.]

<sup>1</sup> Lightly—commonly.

Noble in the folio; one of the quartos, loving.

<sup>3</sup> Dread in one of the quartos; in the folio, dear. The epithet dread requires to be retained, for "dear lord" would not mark the new title by which York addresses his brother—lord being the title by which York is himself subsequently named. Dread, most dread, was a kingly epithet—Rex metuendissimus.

<sup>4</sup> Late—lately.

<sup>5</sup> Here the word then has been thrust in "for the sake of metre."

Hanmer reads, "Why, sir, what should you fear?" which is found in most editions before that of Malone, who very justly repudiates the notion "that every word, and every short address of three or four words, are to be considered as parts of metrical verses."

<sup>10</sup> Lord in the folio; in the quartos, friend.

<sup>11</sup> This is the reading of the folio. That of the quartos is—

"Chop off his head, man;—somewhat we will do."

It is difficult not to have a leaning to the text of the quartos (the received one), with which we have so long been familiar; but, on the other hand, it is impossible to believe that the correction came from any hand but that of the author.

SCENE II.—Before Lord Hastings' House.Enter a Messenger.Mess. My lord, my lord. [Knocking.]Hast. [Within.] Who knocks?Mess. One from the lord Stanley.Hast. [Within.] What is't o'clock?Mess. Upon the stroke of four.Enter HASTINGS.Hast. Cannot my lord Stanley sleep these tedious nights?<sup>1</sup>Mess. So it appears<sup>2</sup> by that I have to say. First, he commends him to your noble self.<sup>3</sup>Hast. What then?Mess. Then certifies your lordship, that this night He dreamt the boar had rased off his helm:<sup>4</sup> Besides, he says, there are two councils kept;<sup>5</sup> And that may be determin'd at the one, Which may make you and him to rue at th' other. Therefore he sends to know your lordship's pleasure,— If you will presently<sup>6</sup> take horse with him, And with all speed post with him toward the north, To shun the danger that his soul divines.Hast. Go, fellow, go, return unto thy lord: Bid him not fear the separated councils: His honour and myself are at the one, And at the other is my good friend Catesby; Where nothing can proceed that toucheth us Whereof I shall not have intelligence. Tell him, his fears are shallow, without<sup>7</sup> instance: And, for his dreams, I wonder he's so simple<sup>8</sup> To trust the mockery of unquiet slumbers: To fly the boar, before the boar pursues, Were to incense the boar to follow us, And make pursuit where he did mean no chase. Go, bid thy master rise and come to me; And we will both together to the Tower, Where, he shall see, the boar will use us kindly.Mess. I'll go, my lord, and tell him what you say. [Exit.]Enter CATESBY.Cate. Many good morrows to my noble lord!Hast. Good morrow, Catesby; you are early stirring: What news, what news, in this our tottering state?Cate. It is a reeling world, indeed, my lord; And I believe will never stand upright, Till Richard wear the garland of the realm.Hast. How! wear the garland! dost thou mean the crown?Cate. Ay, my good lord.Hast. I'll have this crown of mine cut from my shoulders Before I'll see the crown so foul misplac'd. But canst thou guess that he doth aim at it?Cate. Ay, on my life; and hopes to find you forward Upon his party, for the gain thereof: And, thereupon, he sends you this good news,— That, this same very day, your enemies, The kindred of the queen, must die at Pomfret.Hast. Indeed, I am no mourner for that news,

Because they have been still my adversaries: But, that I'll give my voice on Richard's side, To bar my master's heirs in true descent, God knows, I will not do it, to the death.

Cate. God keep your lordship in that gracious mind!Hast. But I shall laugh at this a twelvemonth hence, That they which brought me in my master's hate, I live to look upon their tragedy. Well, Catesby, ere a fortnight make me older, I'll send some packing that yet think not on't.Cate. 'Tis a vile thing to die, my gracious lord, When men are unprepar'd and look not for it.Hast. O monstrous, monstrous! and so falls it out With Rivers, Vaughan, Grey: and so 'twill do With some men else, who think themselves as safe As thou and I; who, as thou know'st, are dear To princely Richard, and to Buckingham.Cate. The princes both make high account of you,— For they account his head upon the bridge. [Aside.]Hast. I know they do; and I have well deserv'd it.Enter STANLEY.

Come on, come on; where is your boar-spear, man? Fear you the boar, and go so unprovided?

Stan. My lord, good morrow; and good morrow,

Catesby:—

You may jest on, but, by the holy rood, I do not like these several councils, I.

Hast. My lord, I hold my life as dear as yours;<sup>9</sup> And never, in my days,<sup>10</sup> I do protest, Was it so precious to me as 'tis now:<sup>11</sup> Think you, but that I know our state secure, I would be so triumphant as I am?Stan. The lords at Pomfret, when they rode from London, Were jocund, and suppos'd their states were sure, And they, indeed, had no cause to mistrust; But yet, you see, how soon the day o'ercast. This sudden stab of rancour I misdoubt; Pray God, I say, I prove a needless coward! What, shall we toward the Tower? the day is spent.Hast. Come, come, have with you.—Wot you what, my lord?

To-day the lords you talk of are beheaded.

Stan. They, for their truth, might better wear their heads, Than some that have accus'd them wear their hats. But come my lord, let's away.Enter a Pursuivant.Hast. Go on before, I'll talk with this good fellow.[Exeunt STAN. and CATESBY.]

How now, sirrah? how goes the world with thee?

Purs. The better that your lordship please to ask.Hast. I tell thee, man, 'tis better with me now, Than when thou met'st me last where now we meet: Then was I going prisoner to the Tower, By the suggestion of the queen's allies; But now, I tell thee, (keep it to thyself,) This day those enemies are put to death, And I in better state than ere I was.Purs. God hold it, to your honour's good content!<sup>1</sup> So the folio; the quartos—

"Cannot thy master sleep these tedious nights?"

<sup>2</sup> Appears in the folio; the quartos, should seem.<sup>3</sup> Self in the folio; the quartos, lordship.<sup>4</sup> This is the reading of the folio. That of the quartos is—"And then he sends you word
He dreamt to-night the boar had rased his helm."<sup>5</sup> Kept in the folio; the quartos, held.<sup>6</sup> So the folio; the quartos, presently, you will.<sup>7</sup> The folio without; the quartos, wanting. The word instance signifies here,as in other passages of Shakspeare, example, fact in proof, corroboration. So in The Merry Wives of Windsor, "My desires had instance and argument to commend themselves."<sup>8</sup> Simple in the folio; the quartos, fond.<sup>9</sup> The quartos have, "My lord, I hold my life as dear as you do yours."<sup>10</sup> Days in the folio; in the quartos, life. This is one of the very numerous instances of the minute accuracy with which the text of the folio had been revised. Days is evidently substituted for life, to avoid the repetition of that word, which occurs in the preceding line.<sup>11</sup> So the folio; the quartos—"Was it more precious to me than 'tis now."

Hast. Gramercy, fellow : There, drink that for me.

Purs. I thank your honour. [Throwing him his purse.
Exit Pursuivant.]

Enter a Priest.

Pr. Well met, my lord ; I am glad to see your honour.

Hast. I thank thee, good sir John, with all my heart.
I am in your debt for your last exercise ;
Come the next Sabbath, and I will content you.

Pr. I'll wait upon your lordship.<sup>1</sup>

Enter BUCKINGHAM.

Buck. What, talking with a priest, lord chamberlain ?
Your friends at Pomfret they do need the priest ;
Your honour hath no shriving work in hand.

Hast. 'Good faith, and when I met this holy man,
The men you talk of came into my mind.
What, go you toward the Tower ?

Buck. I do, my lord ; but long I cannot stay there :
I shall return before your lordship thence.

Hast. Nay, like enough, for I stay dinner there.

Buck. And supper too, although thou know'st it not. [Aside.]

Come, will you go ?

Hast. I'll wait upon your lordship. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Pomfret. Before the Castle.

Enter RATCLIFF, with a Guard, conducting RIVERS, GREY, and VAUGHAN, to execution.

Riv. Sir Richard Ratcliff, let me tell thee this,—
To-day shalt thou behold a subject die,
For truth, for duty, and for loyalty.<sup>2</sup>

Grey. God keep the prince from all the pack of you !
A knot you are of damned blood-suckers.

Vaugh. You live that shall cry woe for this hereafter.

Rat. Despatch ; the limit of your lives is out.

Riv. O Pomfret, Pomfret ! O thou bloody prison,
Fatal and ominous to noble peers !

Within the guilty closure of thy walls
Richard the Second here was hack'd to death :
And, for more slander to thy dismal seat,
We give to thee our guiltless blood to drink.

Grey. Now Margaret's curse is fallen upon our heads
When she exclaim'd on Hastings, you, and I,
For standing by when Richard stabb'd her son.

Riv. Then curs'd she Richard, then curs'd she Bucking-
ham,

Then curs'd she Hastings :—O, remember, God,
To hear her prayer for them, as now for us !
And for my sister, and her princely sons,
Be satisfied, dear God, with our true blood,
Which, as thou know'st, unjustly must be spilt !

Rat. Make haste, the hour of death is expiate.<sup>3</sup>

Riv. Come, Grey,—come, Vaughan,—let us here embrace :

Farewell, until we meet again in heaven. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—London. A Room in the Tower.

BUCKINGHAM, STANLEY, HASTINGS, the BISHOP OF ELY, RATCLIFF, LOVEL, and others, sitting at a table Officers of the Council attending.

Hast. Now, noble peers, the cause why we are met
Is, to determine of the coronation :

In God's name, speak, when is the royal day ?

Buck. Are all things ready for that royal time ?

Stan. They are ; and wants but nomination.

Ely. To-morrow then I judge a happy day.

Buck. Who knows the lord protector's mind herein ?
Who is most inward with the noble duke ?

Ely. Your grace, we think, should soonest know his mind.

Buck. We know each other's faces : for our hearts,
He knows no more of mine than I of yours ;
Nor I of his, my lord, than you of mine :
Lord Hastings, you and he are near in love.

Hast. I thank his grace, I know he loves me well :
But, for his purpose in the coronation,
I have not sounded him, nor he deliver'd
His gracious pleasure any way therein :
But you, my honourable lords,<sup>4</sup> may name the time ;
And in the duke's behalf I'll give my voice,
Which, I presume, he'll take in gentle part.

Enter GLOSTER.

Ely. In happy time, here comes the duke himself.

Glo. My noble lords and cousins all, good morrow :
I have been long a sleeper ; but, I trust,
My absence doth neglect no great design,
Which by my presence might have been concluded.

Buck. Had you not come upon your cue, my lord,
William lord Hastings had pronounc'd your part,—
I mean, your voice,—for crowning of the king.

Glo. Than my lord Hastings no man might be bolder ;
His lordship knows me well, and loves me well.

My lord of Ely, when I was last in Holborn,
I saw good strawberries in your garden there ;
I do beseech you send for some of them.<sup>5</sup>

Ely. Marry and will, my lord, with all my heart.

Glo. Cousin of Buckingham, a word with you. [Exit ELY.]

Catesby hath sounded Hastings in our business ;
And finds the testy gentleman so hot

That he will lose his head, ere give consent
His master's child, as worshipfully he terms it,
Shall lose the royalty of England's throne.

Buck. Withdraw yourself awhile, I'll go with you.

Stan. We have not yet set down this day of triumph.
To-morrow, in my judgment, is too sudden ;
For I myself am not so well provided,
As else I would be, were the day prolong'd.

Re-enter BISHOP OF ELY.

Ely. Where is my lord the duke of Gloster ?<sup>5</sup>
I have sent for these strawberries.

Hast. His grace looks cheerfully and smooth this morning ;

<sup>2</sup> In the quartos this scene opens with Ratcliff exclaiming, "Come, bring forth the prisoners." The stage direction of the folio is, "Enter Sir Richard Ratcliff, with halberds, carrying the nobles to death at Pomfret." The line is therefore clearly unnecessary.

<sup>3</sup> Expiate. This word does not occur in the quartos. The second folio reads, "the hour of death is now expired." However forced the meaning of expiate may be, Shakspeare has used it in his Twenty-second Sonnet in a similar manner:—

"My glass shall not persuade me I am old,
So long as youth and thou are of one date ;
But when in thee time's furrows I behold,
Then look I death my days should expiate."

Expiate was the reading of Steevens.

<sup>4</sup> Honourable lords in the folio ; in the quartos, noble lord.

<sup>5</sup> In the quartos we have, "Where is my lord protector ?"

There's some conceit or other likes him well,
When that he bids<sup>1</sup> good morrow with such spirit.
I think there's ne'er a man in Christendom,
Can lesser hide his love or hate than he;
For by his face straight shall you know his heart.

Stan. What of his heart perceive you in his face,
By any livelihood<sup>2</sup> he show'd to-day?

Hast. Marry, that with no man here he is offended;
For were he, he had shown it in his looks.

Re-enter GLOSTER and BUCKINGHAM.

Glo. I pray you all, tell me what they deserve
That do conspire my death with devilish plots
Of damned witchcraft; and that have prevail'd
Upon my body with their hellish charms?

Hast. The tender love I bear your grace, my lord,
Makes me most forward in this princely<sup>3</sup> presence
To doom the offenders, whosoe'er they be:
I say, my lord, they have deserved death.

Glo. Then be your eyes the witness of their evil!
Look how I am bewitch'd; behold mine arm
Is, like a blasted sapling, wither'd up:
And this is Edward's wife, that monstrous witch,
Consorted with that harlot-strumpet Shore,
That by their witchcraft thus have marked me.

Hast. If they have done this deed, my noble lord,—

Glo. If? thou protector of this damned strumpet,
Talk'st thou to me of ifs?—Thou art a traitor:—
Off with his head:—now, by Saint Paul I swear,
I will not dine until I see the same.
Lovel and Ratcliff,<sup>4</sup> look that it be done;
The rest that love me, rise, and follow me.

[Exeunt Council, with GLOSTER and BUCKINGHAM.]

Hast. Woe, woe, for England! not a whit for me;
For I, too fond, might have prevented this:
Stanley did dream the boar did rase his helm;
And I did scorn it, and disdain'd to fly.<sup>5</sup>
Three times to-day my foot-cloth horse did stumble,
And started when he look'd upon the Tower,
As loath to bear me to the slaughter-house.
O, now I need<sup>6</sup> the priest that spake to me:
I now repent I told the pursuivant,
As too triumphing, how mine enemies
To-day at Pomfret bloodily were butcher'd,
And I myself secure in grace and favour.
O, Margaret, Margaret, now thy heavy curse
Is lighted on poor Hastings' wretched head.

Rat. Come, come, despatch,<sup>7</sup> the duke would be at dinner;
Make a short shrift, he longs to see your head.

Hast. O momentary grace of mortal men,
Which we more hunt for than the grace of God!

<sup>2</sup> Livelihood. So the folio. The meaning is perfectly clear, the word being used in the same sense as in All's Well that Ends Well (Act I. Sc. I.)—"The tyranny of her sorrows takes all livelihood from her cheek." Stanley asks how they interpret Gloster's livelihood, liveliness, cheerfulness. And yet some modern editors prefer the tame reading of the quartos, likelihood, which they interpret as appearance, and thus perpetuate what was no doubt a typographical error.

<sup>4</sup> Instead of this line of the folio text we have in the quartos, "Some see it done." The stage direction of the quarto is, "Manet Ca. with Hast." and Catesby subsequently speaks the two lines which in the folio are given to Ratcliff. The line which Lovel speaks is not found in the quartos. In modern editions Catesby was substituted for Ratcliff, and we read—

"Lovel and Catesby, look that it be done."

The change was made to avoid the apparent impossibility of Ratcliff, who in the preceding scene is attending the execution at Pomfret, being on the same day in London. But in making this change the editors can only prescribe a half-remedy, for in the next scene they are constrained to keep Ratcliff on the London scene, bringing in Hastings's head. In that scene Gloster says in the folio—which line is retained in the modern text—

"Be patient, they are friends; Ratcliff and Lovel."

We must either, it appears to us, take the text of the quarto altogether, in which

Who builds his hope in air of your good<sup>8</sup> looks,
Lives like a drunken sailor on a mast;
Ready, with every nod, to tumble down
Into the fatal bowels of the deep.

Lov. Come, come, despatch; 'tis bootless to exclaim.

Hast. O, bloody Richard!—miserable England!
I prophesy the fearful'st time to thee
That ever wretched age hath look'd upon.
Come, lead me to the block, bear him my head;
They smile at me who shortly shall be dead. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—The same. The Tower Walls.

Enter GLOSTER and BUCKINGHAM, in rotten armour, marvellous ill-favoured.<sup>9</sup>

Glo. Come, cousin, canst thou quake and change thy colour,

Murder thy breath in middle of a word,
And then again begin, and stop again,
As if thou wert distraught and mad with terror?

Buck. Tut, I can counterfeit the deep tragedian;
Speak, and look back, and pry on every side,
Tremble and start at wagging of a straw,
Intending<sup>10</sup> deep suspicion: ghastly looks
Are at my service, like enforced smiles;
And both are ready in their offices,
At any time, to grace my stratagems.

But what, is Catesby gone?

Glo. He is; and, see, he brings the mayor along.

Enter the Lord Mayor and CATESBY.

Buck. Lord mayor,—

Glo. Look to the drawbridge there.

Buck. Hark! a drum.

Glo. Catesby, o'erlook the walls.

Buck. Lord mayor, the reason we have sent—

Glo. Look back, defend thee, here are enemies.

Buck. God and our innocency defend and guard us!<sup>11</sup>

Enter LOVEL and RATCLIFF, with HASTINGS' head.

Glo. Be patient, they are friends; Ratcliff and Lovel.

Lov. Here is the head of that ignoble traitor,
The dangerous and unsuspected Hastings.

Glo. So dear I lov'd the man, that I must weep.

I took him for the plainest harmless creature
That breath'd upon the earth a Christian;
Made him my book, wherein my soul recorded
The history of all her secret thoughts:

neither Ratcliff nor Lovel appears, or adopt the apparent absurdity of the folio. But in truth this is one of those positions in which the poet has trusted to the imagination of his audience rather than to their topographical knowledge; and by a bold anticipation of a rate of travelling which is now a reality, Ratcliff is without offence at Pomfret and London on the same day. In the rapid course of the dramatic action this is easily overlooked. We have little doubt that Ratcliff and Lovel are thus brought upon the scene together, in the folio copy, in association with the history "how Collingbourne was cruelly executed for making a rhyme:"—

"The Cat, the Rat, and Lovel our dog, Rule all England under a hog."

The audience were familiar with this story; and it was natural that Shakspeare should show Richard (the hog) in association with Catesby (the cat), Ratcliff (the rat), and Lovel, the three most confidential ministers of his usurpation. In the third scene of Act I, Margaret calls Richard "rooting hog."

<sup>5</sup> So the folio. The verbs are transposed in the quartos.

<sup>11</sup> This rapid dialogue between Buckingham and Gloster is given by us as in the folio. The ordinary text was made up from the quartos and the folio, seemingly upon the principle that it is desirable not to lose any word that can be found in either edition.

So smooth he daub'd his vice with show of virtue,
That, his apparent open guilt omitted,—
I mean, his conversation with Shore's wife,—
He liv'd from all attainder of suspects.

Buck. Well, well, he was the covert'st shelter'd traitor
That ever liv'd.

Would you imagine, or almost believe,
(Were 't not that, by great preservation
We live to tell it you,) the subtle traitor
This day had plotted, in the council-house,
To murder me, and my good lord of Gloster?

May. Had he done so?

Glo. What! think you we are Turks or infidels?
Or that we would, against the form of law,
Proceed thus rashly in the villain's death,
But that the extreme peril of the case,
The peace of England, and our persons' safety,
Enforc'd us to this execution?

May. Now, fair befall you! he deserv'd his death;
And your good graces both have well proceeded,
To warn false traitors from the like attempts.
I never look'd for better at his hands,
After he once fell in with mistress Shore.

Glo. Yet had we not determin'd he should die,
Until your lordship came to see his end;
Which now the loving haste of these our friends,
Something against our meaning, hath prevented:
Because, my lord, we would have had you heard
The traitor speak, and timorously confess
The manner and the purpose of his treasons;
That you might well have signified the same
Unto the citizens, who, haply, may Misconster us in him, and wail his death.<sup>1</sup>

May. But, my good lord, your grace's word shall serve
As well as I had seen and heard him speak:
And do not doubt, right noble princes both,
But I'll acquaint our duteous citizens
With all your just proceedings in this case.

Glo. And to that end we wish'd your lordship here,
To avoid the censures of the carping world.

Buck. But since you come too late of our intent,
Yet witness what you hear we did intend:
And so, my good lord mayor, we bid farewell.

[Exit Lord Mayor.]

Glo. Go after, after, cousin Buckingham.
The mayor towards Guild-hall hies him in all post:
There, at your meetest vantage of the time,
Infer the bastardy of Edward's children:
Tell them, how Edward put to death a citizen,
Only for saying he would make his son
Heir to the crown; meaning, indeed, his house,
Which by the sign thereof was termed so.
Moreover, urge his hateful luxury,
And bestial appetite in change of lust;
Which stretch'd unto their servants, daughters, wives,
Even where his raging eye, or savage heart,
Without control lusted to make a prey:<sup>2</sup>
Nay, for a need, thus far come near my person:—
Tell them, when that my mother went with child
Of that insatiate Edward, noble York,
My princely father, then had wars in France;
And, by true<sup>3</sup> computation of the time,
Found that the issue was not his begot;
Which well appeared in his lineaments,
Being nothing like the noble duke my father:

<sup>2</sup> So the folio; the quartos read lustful instead of raging—lusted instead of lusted—and his prey instead of a prey.

<sup>4</sup> Order in the folio; the quartos, notice.

Yet touch this sparingly, as 'twere far off;
Because, my lord, you know my mother lives.

Buck. Doubt not, my lord: I'll play the orator,
As if the golden fee for which I plead
Were for myself: and so, my lord, adieu.

Glo. If you thrive well bring them to Baynard's castle;<sup>o</sup>
Where you shall find me well accompanied
With reverend fathers, and well-learned bishops.

Buck. I go; and, towards three or four o'clock,
Look for the news that the Guild-hall affords.

[Exit BUCKINGHAM.]

Glo. Go, Lovel, with all speed to Doctor Shaw.
Go thou [to CATE.] to friar Penker;—bid them both
Meet me, within this hour, at Baynard's castle.

[Exeunt LOVEL and CATESBY.]

Now will I go, to take some privy order
To draw the brats of Clarence out of sight;
And to give order,<sup>4</sup> that no manner person<sup>5</sup>
Have, any time, recourse unto the princes. [Exit.]

SCENE VI.—A Street.

Enter a Scrivener.

Scriv. Here is the indictment of the good lord Hastings;
Which in a set hand fairly is engross'd,
That it may be to-day read o'er in Paul's.
And mark how well the sequel hangs together:
Eleven hours I have spent to write it over,
For yesternight by Catesby was it sent me;
The precedent was full as long a doing:
And yet within these five hours Hastings liv'd,
Untainted, unexamin'd, free, at liberty.
Here's a good world the while! Who is so gross
That cannot see this palpable device?
Yet who so bold but says he sees it not?
Bad is the world; and all will come to nought,
When such ill dealing must be seen in thought. [Exit.]

SCENE VII.—The same. Court of Baynard's Castle.

Enter GLOSTER and BUCKINGHAM, meeting.

Glo. How now, how now? what say the citizens?

Buck. Now by the holy mother of our Lord,
The citizens are mum, say not a word.

Glo. Touch'd you the bastardy of Edward's children?

Buck. I did; with his contract with lady Lucy,
And his contract by deputy in France:
The insatiate greediness of his desire,
And his enforcement of the city wives;
His tyranny for trifles; his own bastardy,
As being got, your father then in France;
And his resemblance being not like the duke.
Withal, I did infer your lineaments,
Being the right idea of your father,
Both in your form and nobleness of mind:
Laid open all your victories in Scotland,
Your discipline in war, wisdom in peace,
Your bounty, virtue, fair humility;
Indeed, left nothing fitting for your purpose
Untouch'd, or slightly handled, in discourse.
And, when my oratory grew toward<sup>6</sup> end,
I bade them that did love their country's good
Cry—"God save Richard, England's royal king!"

<sup>5</sup> No manner person. This is the reading of the folio, and is a common idiom of our old language. The quartos, however, have no manner of person. Both forms were indifferently used. In the same chapter (Lev. vii.) of our common translation of the Bible we find no manner fat, and no manner of blood. No manner person is probably the more ancient form, and it appears to us that these minute archaisms should be preserved in Shakspeare wherever we have authority for them.

<sup>6</sup> Toward in the folio; the quartos, to an.

Glo. And did they so?

Buck. No, so God help me, they spake not a word;
But, like dumb statues<sup>1</sup> or breathing stones,
Star'd each on other, and look'd deadly pale.
Which when I saw I reprehended them;
And ask'd the mayor, what meant this wilful silence:
His answer was, the people were not used
To be spoke to but by the recorder.
Then he was urg'd to tell my tale again;—
“Thus saith the duke, thus hath the duke inferr'd;
But nothing spoke in warrant from himself.
When he had done, some followers of mine own,
At lower end o' the hall, hurl'd up their caps,
And some ten voices cried, “God save king Richard!”
And thus I took the vantage of those few,—
“Thanks, gentle citizens, and friends,” quoth I;
“This general applause, and cheerful shout,
Argues your wisdom, and your love to Richard:”
And even here brake off, and came away.

Glo. What tongueless blocks were they! Would they not speak?

Will not the mayor then and his brethren come?

Buck. The mayor is here at hand; intend some fear;
Be not you spoke with but by mighty suit:
And look you, get a prayer-book in your hand,
And stand between two churchmen, good my lord;
For on that ground I'll make a holy descant:
And be not easily won to our requests;
Play the maid's part, still answer nay, and take it.

Glo. I go: And if you plead as well for them
As I can say nay to thee for myself,
No doubt we'll bring it to a happy issue.

Buck. Go, go, up to the leads; the lord mayor knocks.
[Exit GLOSTER.]

Enter the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens.

Welcome, my lord: I dance attendance here;
I think the duke will not be spoke withal.

Enter from the Castle, CATESBY.

Now, Catesby! what says your lord to my request?

Cate. He doth entreat your grace, my noble lord,
To visit him to-morrow, or next day:
He is within, with two right reverend fathers,
Divinely bent to meditation:
And in no worldly suits would he be mov'd,
To draw him from his holy exercise.

Buck. Return, good Catesby, to the gracious duke;
Tell him, myself, the mayor and aldermen,
In deep designs, in matter of great moment,
No less importing than our general good,
Are come to have some conference with his grace.

Cate. I'll signify so much unto him straight. [Exit.]

Buck. Ah, ha, my lord, this prince is not an Edward!
He is not lulling<sup>2</sup> on a lewd love-bed,<sup>3</sup>
But on his knees at meditation;
Not dallying with a brace of courtezans,
But meditating with two deep divines;
Not sleeping, to engross<sup>4</sup> his idle body,
But praying, to enrich his watchful soul:
Happy were England would this virtuous prince

<sup>1</sup> Statues. The word statue, which here, as well as in The Two Gentlemen of Verona (Act IV. Sc. IV.), probably means picture, as distinguished from “breathing stones,” must be read as a trisyllable; and for this reason it is printed in modern editions statua. In Julius Caesar (Act II. Sc. II.) we have—

“She dreamt to-night she saw my statue.”

And again in the same play (Act III. Sc. II.)—

“Even at the base of Pompey's statue.”

Take on his grace<sup>5</sup> the sovereignty thereof:
But, sure, I fear we shall not win him to it.

May. Marry, God defend his grace should say us nay!

Buck. I fear he will: Here Catesby comes again;—

Re-enter CATESBY.

Now, Catesby, what says his grace?

Cate. He wonders to what end you have assembled
Such troops of citizens to come to him,
His grace not being warn'd thereof before;
He fears, my lord, you mean no good to him.

Buck. Sorry I am my noble cousin should Suspect me, that I mean no good to him:
By heaven, we come to him in perfect love;
And so once more return and tell his grace.

[Exit CATESBY.]

When holy and devout religious men
Are at their beads, 'tis much<sup>6</sup> to draw them thence;
So sweet is zealous contemplation.

Enter GLOSTER, in a gallery above, between two Bishops.
CATESBY returns.

May. See, where his grace stands 'tween two clergymen!

Buck. Two props of virtue for a Christian prince,
To stay him from the fall of vanity:
And, see, a book of prayer in his hand;
True ornament to know a holy man.
Famous Plantagenet, most gracious prince,
Lend favourable ear to our requests;
And pardon us the interruption
Of thy devotion and right Christian zeal.

Glo. My lord, there needs no such apology;
I do beseech your grace to pardon me,<sup>7</sup>
Who, earnest in the service of my God,
Deferr'd<sup>8</sup> the visitation of my friends.
But, leaving this, what is your grace's pleasure?

Buck. Even that, I hope, which pleaseth God above,
And all good men of this ungovern'd isle.

Glo. I do suspect I have done some offence,
That seems disgracious in the city's eye;
And that you come to reprehend my ignorance.

Buck. You have, my lord: Would it might please your grace

On our entreaties to amend your fault!

Glo. Else wherefore breathe I in a Christian land?

Buck. Know, then, it is your fault, that you resign
The supreme seat, the throne majestic,
The sceptred office of your ancestors,
Your state of fortune, and your due of birth,
The lineal glory of your royal house,
To the corruption of a blemish'd stock:
Whiles, in the mildness of your sleepy thoughts,
(Which here we waken to our country's good,)
The noble isle doth want her proper limbs;
Her face defac'd with scars of infamy,
Her royal stock graft with ignoble plants,
And almost shoulder'd in the swallowing gulf
Of dark forgetfulness and deep oblivion.
Which to recure we heartily solicit
Your gracious self to take on you the charge
And kingly government of this your land:
Not as protector, steward, substitute,

Lulling. So all the ancient copies; the modern editions, lolling.

<sup>6</sup> So the folio; the quartos—

“I rather do beseech you pardon me.”

<sup>7</sup> Deferr'd in the folio; the quartos, neglect.

Or lowly factor for another's gain ;
But as successively, from blood to blood,
Your right of birth, your empery, your own.
For this, consorted with the citizens,
Your very worshipful and loving friends,
And by their vehement instigation,
In this just cause<sup>1</sup> come I to move your grace.

Glo. I cannot tell, if to depart in silence,
Or bitterly to speak in your reproof,
Best fitteth my degree, or your condition :
If not to answer, you might haply think,
Tongue-tied ambition, not replying, yielded
To bear the golden yoke of sovereignty,
Which fondly you would here impose on me ;
If to reprove you for this suit of yours,
So season'd with your faithful love to me,
Then, on the other side, I check'd my friends.
Therefore,—to speak, and to avoid the first ;
And then, in speaking, not to incur the last,—
Definitively thus I answer you.<sup>2</sup>

Your love deserves my thanks ; but my desert
Unmeritable shuns your high request.
First, if all obstacles were cut away,
And that my path were even to the crown,
As the ripe revenue and due of birth ;
Yet so much is my poverty of spirit,
So mighty, and so many, my defects,
That I would rather hide me from my greatness,
Being a bark to brook no mighty sea,
Than in my greatness covet to be hid,
And in the vapour of my glory smother'd.
But, God be thank'd, there is no need of me ;
(And much I need to help you, were there need ;<sup>3</sup>)
The royal tree hath left us royal fruit,
Which, mellow'd by the stealing hours of time,
Will well become the seat of majesty,
And make, no doubt, us happy by his reign.
On him I lay that you would lay on me,
The right and fortune of his happy stars,
Which God defend that I should wring from him !

Buck. My lord, this argues conscience in your grace ;
But the respects thereof are nice and trivial,
All circumstances well considered.
You say that Edward is your brother's son ;
So say we too, but not by Edward's wife :
For first was he contract to lady Lucy,—
Your mother lives a witness to his vow ;
And afterwards by substitute betroth'd
To Bona, sister to the king of France.
These both put off,<sup>4</sup> a poor petitioner,
A care-craz'd mother to a many sons,
A beauty-waning and distressed widow,
Even in the afternoon of her best days,
Made prize and purchase of his wanton eye,
Seduc'd the pitch and height of his degree<sup>5</sup>
To base declension and loath'd bigamy ;
By her, in his unlawful bed, he got
This Edward, whom our manners call the prince.
More bitterly could I expostulate,
Save that, for reverence to some alive,
I give a sparing limit to my tongue.
Then, good my lord, take to your royal self
This proffer'd benefit of dignity :
If not to bless us and the land withal,
Yet to draw forth your noble ancestry

From the corruption of abusing time,
Unto a lineal true-derived course.

May. Do, good my lord ; your citizens entreat you.

Buck. Refuse not, mighty lord, this proffer'd love.

Cate. O make them joyful, grant their lawful suit.

Glo. Alas, why would you heap this care<sup>6</sup> on me ?

I am unfit for state and majesty :

I do beseech you, take it not amiss ;

I cannot, nor I will not yield to you.

Buck. If you refuse it,—as in love and zeal,
Loath to depose the child, your brother's son,
As well we know your tenderness of heart,
And gentle, kind, effeminate remorse,
Which we have noted in you to your kindred,
And equally, indeed, to all estates,—
Yet know, whe'r you accept our suit or no,
Your brother's son shall never reign our king ;
But we will plant some other in the<sup>7</sup> throne,
To the disgrace and downfall of your house.
And in this resolution here we leave you ;—
Come, citizens, we will entreat no more.<sup>8</sup>

[Exeunt BUCKINGHAM and Citizens.]

Cate. Call them again, sweet prince, accept their suit ;
If you deny them, all the land will rue it.

Glo. Will you enforce me to a world of cares ?
Call them again ; I am not made of stone,
But penetrable to your kind entreaties, [Exit CATESBY.]
Albeit against my conscience and my soul.

Re-enter BUCKINGHAM, and the rest.

Cousin of Buckingham, and sage grave men,
Since you will buckle fortune on my back,
To bear her burden, whe'r I will or no,
I must have patience to endure the load :
But if black scandal, or foul-fac'd reproach,
Attend the sequel of your imposition,
Your mere enforcement shall acquittance me
From all the impure blots and stains thereof ;
For God doth know,<sup>9</sup> and you may partly see,
How far I am from the desire of this.

May. God bless your grace ! we see it, and will say it.

Glo. In saying so you shall but say the truth.

Buck. Then I salute you with this royal title,—
Long live king Richard, England's worthy king !

All. Amen.

Buck. To-morrow may it please you to be crown'd ?

Glo. Even when you please, for you will have it so.

Buck. To-morrow, then, we will attend your grace ;
And so most joyfully we take our leave.

Glo. Come, let us to our holy work again :—

[To the Bishops.
Farewell, my cousin ;—farewell, gentle friends. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Before the Tower.

Enter, on one side, QUEEN ELIZABETH, DUCHESS OF YORK, and MARQUIS OF DORSET ; on the other, ANNE,
DUCHESS OF GLOSTER, leading LADY MARGARET
PLANTAGENET, CLARENCE'S young daughter.

Duch. Who meets us here ?—my niece<sup>10</sup> Plantagenet
Led in the hand of her kind aunt of Gloster ?

To which Gloster responds—

“ O do not swear, my lord of Buckingham.”

Mr. G. White thinks “ it is quite probable that this passage was originally written thus, and that the change was made by Shakspeare, because it made Gloster overdo his hypocrisy.”

<sup>8</sup> The quarto has a most characteristic passage here. Buckingham says—
“ Come, citizens ; zounds, I'll entreat no more.”

Now, for my life, she's wand'ring to the Tower,
On pure heart's love, to greet the tender prince.
Daughter, well met.

Anne. God give your graces both
A happy and a joyful time of day!

Q. Eliz. As much to you, good sister! Whither away?

Anne. No further than the Tower; and, as I guess,
Upon the like devotion as yourselves,
To gratulate the gentle princes there.

Q. Eliz. Kind sister, thanks; we'll enter all together:

Enter BRAKENBURY.

And, in good time, here the lieutenant comes.
Master lieutenant, pray you, by your leave,
How doth the prince, and my young son of York?

Brak. Right well, dear madam: By your patience,
I may not suffer you to visit them;
The king hath strictly charg'd the contrary.

Q. Eliz. The king! who's that?

Brak. I mean the lord protector.

Q. Eliz. The lord protect him from that kingly title!
Hath he set bounds between their love and me?
I am their mother, who shall bar me from them?

Duch. I am their father's mother, I will see them.

Anne. Their aunt I am in law, in love their mother
Then bring me to their sights; I'll bear thy blame,
And take thy office from thee, on my peril.

Brak. No, madam, no, I may not leave it so;
I am bound by oath, and therefore pardon me.

[Exit BRAKENBURY.]

Enter STANLEY.

Stan. Let me but meet you, ladies, one hour hence,
And I'll salute your grace of York as mother,
And reverend looker-on of two fair queens.
Come, madam, you must straight to Westminster,
[To the DUCHESS OF GLOSTER.]

There to be crowned Richard's royal queen.

Q. Eliz. Ah, cut my lace asunder!

That my pent heart may have some scope to beat,
Or else I swoon with this dead-killing news.

Anne. Despiteful tidings! O displeasing news!

Dor. Be of good cheer: Mother, how fares your grace?

Q. Eliz. O Dorset, speak not to me, get thee gone,
Death and destruction dog thee at thy heels;
Thy mother's name is ominous to children:
If thou wilt outstrip death, go cross the seas,
And live with Richmond, from the reach of hell.
Go, hie thee, hie thee, from this slaughter-house,
Lest thou increase the number of the dead;
And make me die the thrall of Margaret's curse,—
Nor mother, wife, nor England's counted queen.

Stan. Full of wise care is this your counsel, madam:
Take all the swift advantage of the hours;
You shall have letters from me to my son
In your behalf, to meet you on the way:
Be not ta'en tardy by unwise delay.

Duch. O ill-dispersing wind of misery!
O my accursed womb, the bed of death;

A cockatrice hast thou hatch'd to the world,
Whose unavoyded eye is murtherous!

Stan. Come, madam, come; I in all haste was sent.

Anne. And I with all unwillingness will go.

O, would to God that the inclusive verge
Of golden metal that must round my brow
Were red-hot steel to sear me to the brain!<sup>a</sup>
Anointed let me be with deadly venom;
And die, ere men can say—God save the queen!

Q. Eliz. Go, go, poor soul, I envy not thy glory,
To feed my humour: wish thyself no harm.

Anne. No! why?—When he that is my husband now
Came to me, as I follow'd Henry's corse;
When scarce the blood was well wash'd from his hands,
Which issued from my other angel husband,
And that dear<sup>1</sup> saint which then I weeping follow'd;
O, when, I say, I look'd on Richard's face,
This was my wish,—“Be thou,” quoth I, “accurs'd,
For making me, so young, so old a widow!
And when thou wedd'st let sorrow haunt thy bed;
And be thy wife (if any be so mad)
More miserable by the life of thee,
Than thou hast made me by my dear lord's death!”
Lo, ere I can repeat this curse again,
Within so small a time,<sup>2</sup> my woman's heart
Grossly grew captive to his honey words,
And prov'd the subject of mine own soul's curse;
Which hitherto hath held mine eyes from rest:<sup>3</sup>
For never yet one hour in his bed
Did I enjoy the golden dew of sleep,
But with his timorous dreams was still awak'd.
Besides, he hates me for my father Warwick;
And will, no doubt, shortly be rid of me.

Q. Eliz. Poor heart, adieu! I pity thy complaining.

Anne. No more than with my soul I mourn for yours.

Dor. Farewell, thou woful welcomer of glory!

Anne. Adieu, poor soul, that tak'st thy leave of it!

Duch. Go thou to Richmond, and good fortune guide thee! [To DORSET.]

Go thou to Richard, and good angels tend thee!

[To ANNE.]

Go thou to sanctuary, and good thoughts possess thee!

[To QUEEN ELIZABETH.]

I to my grave, where peace and rest lie with me!

Eighty odd years of sorrow have I seen,
And each hour's joy wrack'd with a week of teen.<sup>4</sup>

Q. Eliz. Stay; yet look back, with me, unto the Tower.
Pity, you ancient stones, those tender babes,
Whom envy hath immur'd within your walls!
Rough cradle for such little pretty ones!
Rude ragged nurse! old sullen play-fellow
For tender princes, use my babies well!
So foolish sorrow bids your stones farewell.<sup>5</sup> [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room of State in the Palacc.

Flourish of trumpets. RICHARD, as King, upon his throne;
BUCKINGHAM, CATESBY, a Page, and others.

K. Rich. Stand all apart. Cousin of Buckingham,—

Buck. My gracious sovereign.

K. Rich. Give me thy hand. Thus high, by thy advice,

<sup>1</sup> Dear in the folio; the quartos, dead.

<sup>2</sup> So the folio; the quartos, even in so short a space.

“Which ever since hath kept my eyes from sleep.”

The plain course for the earlier editors to have pursued would have been to take the line as it stands in one or the other edition, according to their belief in its authenticity. But in this, as in many other instances, they made up a text from each copy—

“Which ever since hath held mine eyes from rest.”

Their successors have been more consistent.

<sup>5</sup> This speech is not in the quartos. It bears the mark of Shakspeare's later years in its bold imagery.

“Rude ragged nurse! old sullen play-fellow,” possesses all the highest attributes of poetry—that of suggesting a long train of thought by some short and powerful allusion, far more effective than the most skillful elaboration. And yet Johnson with the most ludicrous solemnity says, “To call the Tower nurse and play-fellow is very harsh: perhaps part of this speech is addressed to the Tower, and part to the Lieutenant.”

And thy assistance, is king Richard seated :
But shall we wear these glories for a day ?
Or shall they last, and we rejoice in them ?

Buck. Still live they, and for ever let them last !

K. Rich. Ah, Buckingham, now do I play the touch,<sup>1</sup>
To try if thou be current gold, indeed :
Young Edward lives :—Think now what I would speak.

Buck. Say on, my loving lord.

K. Rich. Why, Buckingham, I say I would be king.

Buck. Why, so you are, my thrice-renowned lord.

K. Rich. Ha ! am I king ? 'Tis so : but Edward lives.

Buck. True, noble prince.

K. Rich. O bitter consequence,
That Edward still should live !—true, noble prince !—
Cousin, thou wast not wont to be so dull :
Shall I be plain ? I wish the bastards dead ;
And I would have it suddenly perform'd.

What say'st thou now ? speak suddenly, be brief.

Buck. Your grace may do your pleasure.

K. Rich. Tut, tut, thou art all ice, thy kindness freezes :
Say, have I thy consent that they shall die ?

Buck. Give me some little breath, some pause, dear lord,<sup>2</sup>

Before I positively speak in this :

I will resolve you herein presently.<sup>3</sup> [Exit BUCKINGHAM.]

Cate. The king is angry ; see, he gnaws his lip. [Aside.]

K. Rich. I will converse with iron-witted fools,
[Descends from his throne.]

And unrespective<sup>4</sup> boys ; none are for me
That look into me with considerate eyes.
High-reaching Buckingham grows circumspect.
Boy !

Page. My lord.

K. Rich. Know'st thou not any whom corrupting gold
Would tempt unto a close exploit of death ?

Page. I know a discontented gentleman,
Whose humble means match not his haughty spirit :<sup>5</sup>
Gold were as good as twenty orators,
And will, no doubt, tempt him to anything.

K. Rich. What is his name ?

Page. His name, my lord, is Tyrrel.

K. Rich. I partly know the man : Go, call him hither, * boy. [Exit Page.]

The deep-revolving witty Buckingham
No more shall be the neighbour to my counsels :
Hath he so long held out with me untir'd,
And stops he now for breath ?—well, be it so.—

Enter STANLEY.

How now, lord Stanley ? what's the news ?

Stan. Know, my loving lord,
The marquis Dorset, as I hear, is fled
To Richmond, in the parts where he abides.

K. Rich. Come hither, Catesby : rumour it abroad
That Anne, my wife, is very grievous sick ;
I will take order for her keeping close.
Inquire me out some mean, poor<sup>6</sup> gentleman,
Whom I will marry straight to Clarence' daughter.—
The boy is foolish, and I fear not him.—

Look, how thou dream'st !—I say again, give out
That Anne my queen is sick, and like to die
About it ; for it stands me much upon,
To stop all hopes whose growth may damage me.

[Exit CATESBY.]

I must be married to my brother's daughter,

Or else my kingdom stands on brittle glass :
Murther her brothers, and then marry her !
Uncertain way of gain ! But I am in
So far in blood, that sin will pluck on sin.
Tear-falling pity dwells not in this eye.

Re-enter Page, with TYRREL.

Is thy name Tyrrel ?

Tyr. James Tyrrel, and your most obedient subject.

K. Rich. Art thou, indeed ?

Tyr.

Prove me, my gracious lord.

K. Rich. Dar'st thou resolve to kill a friend of mine ?

Tyr. Please you, but I had rather kill two enemies.

K. Rich. Why, then thou hast it ; two deep enemies,
Foes to my rest, and my sweet sleep's disturbers,
Are they that I would have thee deal upon :
Tyrrel, I mean those bastards in the Tower.

Tyr. Let me have open means to come to them,
And soon I'll rid you from the fear of them.

K. Rich. Thou sing'st sweet music. Hark, come hither, Tyrrel :

Go, by this token :—Rise, and lend thine ear : [Whispers.]
There is no more but so :—Say, it is done,
And I will love thee, and prefer thee for it.

Tyr. I will despatch it straight.

[Exit.]

Re-enter BUCKINGHAM.

Buck. My lord, I have consider'd in my mind
The late request<sup>7</sup> that you did sound me in.

K. Rich. Well, let that rest. Dorset is fled to Richmond.

Buck. I hear the news, my lord.

K. Rich. Stanley, he is your wife's son :—Well look unto it.

Buck. My lord, I claim the gift, my due by promise,
For which your honour and your faith is pawn'd ;
The earldom of Hereford, and the moveables,
Which you have promised I shall possess.

K. Rich. Stanley, look to your wife ; if she convey
Letters to Richmond, you shall answer it.

Buck. What says your highness to my just request ?

K. Rich. I do remember me,—Henry the Sixth
Did prophesy that Richmond should be king,
When Richmond was a little peevish boy.
A king !—perhaps—

[Buck. My lord,—

K. Rich. How chance the prophet could not at that time
Have told me, I being by, that I should kill him ?

Buck. My lord, your promise for the earldom,—

K. Rich. Richmond !—When last I was at Exeter,
The mayor in courtesy show'd me the castle,
And call'd it Rouge-mont : at which name I started,
Because a bard of Ireland told me once
I should not live long after I saw Richmond.

Buck. My lord,—

K. Rich. Ay, what's o'clock ?

Buck. I am thus bold to put your grace in mind
Of what you promis'd me.

K. Rich. Well, but what's o'clock ?

Buck. Upon the stroke of ten.

K. Rich. Well, let it strike.

Buck. Why, let it strike ?

K. Rich. Because that, like a Jack,<sup>8</sup> thou keep'st the stroke

Betwixt thy begging and my meditation.
I am not in the giving vein to-day.

<sup>1</sup> Touch—touchstone.

<sup>2</sup> So the folio ; one of the quartos—

“ Give me some breath, some little pause, dear lord.”

<sup>3</sup> So the folio ; the quartos, your grace immediately.

“ Away to heaven respective lenity.”

<sup>6</sup> Mean, poor, in the folio ; the quartos, mean-born. According to the notions of Shakspeare's age, a mean-born gentleman was a contradiction in terms.

<sup>8</sup> The “ Jack of the Clock-house ” was an automaton, which struck the hours upon a bell.

Buck. Why, then resolve me whether you will, or no.<sup>1</sup>

K. Rich. Thou troublest me; I am not in the vein.

[Exeunt KING RICHARD and Train.]

Buck. And is it thus? repays he my deep service
With such contempt? made I him king for this?
O, let me think on Hastings; and be gone
To Brecknock, while my fearful head is on. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The same.

Enter TYRREL.

Tyr. The tyrannous and bloody act is done;
The most arch deed of piteous massacre
That ever yet this land was guilty of.
Dighton and Forrest, whom I did suborn
To do this piece of ruthless butchery,
Albeit they were flesh'd villains, bloody dogs,
Melting with tenderness and mild compassion,
Wept like two children,<sup>2</sup> in their death's sad story.
"O thus," quoth Dighton, "lay the gentle babes,"—
"Thus, thus," quoth Forrest, "girdling one another
Within their alabaster innocent arms:
Their lips were four red roses on a stalk,
And, in their summer beauty, kiss'd each other.
A book of prayers on their pillow lay:
Which once," quoth Forrest, "almost chang'd my mind;
But, O, the devil"—there the villain stopp'd;
When Dighton thus told on,—"We smothered
The most replenished sweet work of nature,
That, from the prime creation, e'er she fram'd."—
Hence both are gone with conscience and remorse;
They could not speak: and so I left them both,
To bear this tidings to the bloody king.

Enter KING RICHARD.

And here he comes:—All health, my sovereign lord!

K. Rich. Kind Tyrrel! am I happy in thy news?

Tyr. If to have done the thing you gave in charge
Beget your happiness, be happy then,
For it is done.

K. Rich. But didst thou see them dead

Tyr. I did, my lord.

K. Rich. And buried, gentle Tyrrel?

Tyr. The chaplain of the Tower hath buried them;
But where, to say the truth, I do not know.

K. Rich. Come to me, Tyrrel, soon, at after supper,
When thou shalt tell the process of their death.
Meantime, but think how I may do thee good,
And be inheritor of thy desire.
Farewell till then.

Tyr. I humbly take my leave. [Exit.]

K. Rich. The son of Clarence have I pent up close;
His daughter meanly have I match'd in marriage;
The sons of Edward sleep in Abraham's bosom;
And Anne my wife hath bid this world good night.
Now, for I know the Bretagne Richmond aims
At young Elizabeth, my brother's daughter,
And, by that knot, looks proudly on the crown,
To her go I, a jolly thriving wooer.

Enter RATCLIFF.<sup>3</sup>

Rat. My lord!

K. Rich. Good or bad news, that thou com'st in so bluntly?

Rat. Bad news, my lord: Morton is fled to Richmond;

And Buckingham, back'd with the hardy Welshmen,
Is in the field, and still his power increaseth.

K. Rich. Ely with Richmond troubles me more near Than Buckingham and his rash-levied strength.
Come,—I have learn'd that fearful commenting
Is leaden servitor to dull delay;
Delay leads impotent and snail-pac'd beggary:
Then fiery expedition be my wing,
Jove's Mercury, and herald for a king!
Go, muster men: my counsel is my shield;
We must be brief when traitors brave the field. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The same. Before the Palace.

Enter QUEEN MARGARET.

Q. Mar. So, now prosperity begins to mellow,
And drop into the rotten mouth of death.
Here in these confines slyly have I lurk'd,
To watch the waning of mine enemies.
A dire induction am I witness to,
And will to France; hoping the consequence
Will prove as bitter, black, and tragical.
Withdraw thee, wretched Margaret! who comes here?

Enter QUEEN ELIZABETH and the DUCHESS OF YORK.

Q. Eliz. Ah, my poor princes! ah, my tender babes!
My unblown flowers, new-appearing sweets!
If yet your gentle souls fly in the air,
And be not fix'd in doom perpetual,
Hover about me with your airy wings,
And hear your mother's lamentation!

Q. Mar. Hover about her; say, that right for right
Hath dimm'd your infant morn to aged night.

Duch. So many miseries have craz'd my voice,
That my woe-wearied tongue is still and mute.
Edward Plantagenet, why art thou dead?

Q. Mar. Plantagenet doth quit Plantagenet,
Edward for Edward pays a dying debt.

Q. Eliz. Wilt thou, O God, fly from such gentle lambs,
And throw them in the entrails of the wolf?
When didst thou sleep when such a deed was done?

Q. Mar. When holy Harry died, and my sweet son.

Duch. Dead life, blind sight, poor mortal-living ghost,
Woe's scene, world's shame, grave's due by life usurp'd,
Brief abstract and record of tedious days,
Rest thy unrest on England's lawful earth, [Sitting down.]
Unlawfully made drunk with innocent blood!

Q. Eliz. Ah, that thou wouldst as soon afford a grave,
As thou canst yield a melancholy seat;
Then would I hide my bones, not rest them here!
Ah, who hath any cause to mourn but we?

[Sitting down by her.]

Q. Mar. If ancient sorrow be most reverent,
Give mine the benefit of seniory,<sup>4</sup>
And let my griefs frown on the upper hand.
If sorrow can admit society, [Sitting down with them.]
[Tell o'er your woes again by viewing mine:—]
I had an Edward, till a Richard kill'd him;
I had a husband,<sup>5</sup> till a Richard kill'd him:
Thou hadst an Edward, till a Richard kill'd him:
Thou hadst a Richard, till a Richard kill'd him.

Duch. I had a Richard too, and thou didst kill him;
I had a Rutland too, thou holp'st to kill him.

Q. Mar. Thou hadst a Clarence too, and Richard kill'd him.
From forth the kennel of thy womb hath crept

<sup>1</sup> This most characteristic passage, which we print in brackets, is not found in the folio. We have only one other instance of any omission in that copy as compared with the quartos; while the additional passages not found in the quartos are numerous.

<sup>5</sup> Husband in the folio; in the quartos we find Richard, clearly an error, which Malone corrects to Henry.

A hell-hound, that doth hunt us all to death :
That dog, that had his teeth before his eyes
To worry lambs and lap their gentle blood ;
That foul defacer of God's handy-work,
That excellent grand tyrant of the earth,
That reigns in galled eyes of weeping souls ;<sup>1</sup>
Thy womb let loose, to chase us to our graves.
O upright, just, and true-disposing God,
How do I thank thee, that this carnal cur
Preys on the issue of his mother's body,
And makes her pew-fellow<sup>2</sup> with others' moan !

Duch. O, Harry's wife, triumph not in my woes ;
God witness with me, I have wept for thine.

Q. Mar. Bear with me ; I am hungry for revenge,
And now I cloy me with beholding it.
Thy Edward he is dead that kill'd my Edward ;
The other Edward dead to quit my Edward ;
Young York he is but boot,<sup>3</sup> because both they Match not the high perfection of my loss.
Thy Clarence he is dead that stabb'd my Edward ;
And the beholders of this frantic<sup>4</sup> play,
The adulterate Hastings, Rivers, Vaughan, Grey,
Untimely smother'd in their dusky graves.
Richard yet lives, hell's black intelligencer ;
Only reserv'd their factor, to buy souls,
And send them thither : But at hand, at hand,
Ensues his piteous and unpitied end :
Earth gapes, hell burns, fiends roar, saints pray,
To have him suddenly convey'd from hence :
Cancel his bond of life, dear God, I pray,
That I may live to say, the dog is dead !

Q. Eliz. O, thou didst prophesy the time would come
That I should wish for thee to help me curse
That bottled spider, that foul bunch-back'd toad.

Q. Mar. I call'd thee then, vain flourish of my fortune ;
I call'd thee then, poor shadow, painted queen ;
The presentation of but what I was,
The flattering index of a direful pageant,
One heav'd a-high, to be hurl'd down below :
A mother only mock'd with two fair babes ;
A dream of what thou wast ; a garish flag,
To be the aim of every dangerous shot ;
A sign of dignity, a breath, a bubble ;
A queen in jest, only to fill the scene.
Where is thy husband now ? where be thy brothers ?
Where be thy two sons ? wherein dost thou joy ?
Who sues, and kneels, and says—God save the queen
Where be the bending peers that flatter'd thee ?
Where be the thronging troops that follow'd thee ?
Decline all this, and see what now thou art.
For happy wife, a most distressed widow ;
For joyful mother, one that wails the name ;
For one being sued to, one that humbly sues ;
For queen, a very caitiff crown'd with care :
For one that scorn'd at me, now scorn'd of me ;
For one being fear'd of all, now fearing one ;
For one<sup>5</sup> commanding all, obey'd of none.
Thus hath the course of justice whirl'd about,
And left thee but a very prey to time !
Having no more but thought of what thou wast,
To torture thee the more, being what thou art.
Thou didst usurp my place, and dost thou not
Usurp the just proportion of my sorrow ?
Now thy proud neck bears half my burthen'd yoke ;
From which even here I slip my wearied head,

<sup>1</sup> These two lines, which are only found in the folio, there stand thus :—

“ That foul defacer of God's handy-work,
That reigns in galled eyes of weeping souls ;
That excellent grand tyrant of the earth.”

Pew-fellow—companion, occupiers of the same seat. The word is used also by Dekker.

<sup>3</sup> Boot. We retain the phrase to boot, something added : into the bargain, as we also still say.

And leave the burthen of it all on thee.
Farewell, York's wife,—and queen of sad mischance,—
These English woes shall make me smile in France.

Q. Eliz. O thou well skill'd in curses, stay awhile,
And teach me how to curse mine enemies.

Q. Mar. Forbear to sleep the night, and fast the day ;
Compare dead happiness with living woe ;
Think that thy babes were fairer<sup>6</sup> than they were,
And he that slew them fouler than he is :
Bettering thy loss makes the bad-causer worse ;
Revolving this will teach thee how to curse.

Q. Eliz. My words are dull, O quicken them with thine !

Q. Mar. Thy woes will make them sharp, and pierce like mine. [Exit QUEEN MARGARET.]

Duch. Why should calamity be full of words ?

Q. Eliz. Windy attorneys to their client woes,
Airy succeeders of intestate joys,
Poor breathing orators of miseries !
Let them have scope : though what they do impart
Help nothing else, yet do they ease the heart.

Duch. If so, then be not tongue-tied : go with me,
And in the breath of bitter words let's smother
My damned son, that thy two sweet sons smother'd.

[Trumpet within.]
The trumpet sounds,<sup>7</sup>—be copious in exclams.

Enter KING RICHARD and his Train, marching.

K. Rich. Who intercepts me in my expedition ?

Duch. O, she that might have intercepted thee,
By strangling thee in her accursed womb,
From all the slaughters, wretch, that thou hast done.

Q. Eliz. Hid'st thou that forehead with a golden crown,
Where should be branded, if that right were right,
The slaughter of the prince that ow'd<sup>8</sup> that crown,
And the dire death of my poor sons and brothers ?
Tell me, thou villain-slave, where are my children ?

Duch. Thou toad, thou toad, where is thy brother
Clarence ?

And little Ned Plantagenet, his son ?

Q. Eliz. Where is the gentle Rivers, Vaughan, Grey ?

Duch. Where is kind Hastings ?

K. Rich. A flourish, trumpets !—strike alarum, drums !
Let not the heavens hear these tell-tale women
Rail on the Lord's anointed : Strike, I say.

[Flourish. Alarums.]

Either be patient, and entreat me fair,
Or with the clamorous report of war
Thus will I drown your exclamations.

Duch. Art thou my son ?

K. Rich. Ay ; I thank God, my father, and yourself.

Duch. Then patiently hear my impatience.

K. Rich. Madam, I have a touch of your condition,
That cannot brook the accent of reproof.

Duch. O, let me speak.

K. Rich. Do, then ; but I'll not hear.

Duch. I will be mild and gentle in my words.

K. Rich. And brief, good mother ; for I am in haste.

Duch. Art thou so hasty ? I have stay'd for thee,
God knows, in torment and in agony.

K. Rich. And came I not at last to comfort you ?

Duch. No, by the holy rood, thou know'st it well,
Thou cam'st on earth to make the earth my hell.
A grievous burthen was thy birth to me ;
Tetchy and wayward was thy infancy ;

<sup>5</sup> The modern editors changed for she of the folio, in each of these three lines, into for one. The first line only is found in the quartos, and there we have for one. We adopt the change in this revised edition.

<sup>6</sup> The reading of the folio is sweeter ; we prefer the fairer of the quartos, as antithetical to fouler.

Thy school-days frightful, desperate, wild, and furious ;
Thy prime of manhood daring, bold, and venturous,
Thy age confirm'd, proud, subtle, sly, and bloody,
More mild, but yet more harmful-kind in hatred :
What comfortable hour canst thou name,
That ever grac'd me in thy company ?

K. Rich. 'Faith, none, but Humphrey Hower,<sup>1</sup> that call'd your grace

To breakfast once, forth of my company.

If I be so disgracious in your eye,<sup>2</sup>

Let me march on, and not offend you, madam.—

Strike up the drum.

Duch. I prithee, hear me speak.

K. Rich. You speak too bitterly.

Duch. Hear me a word,
For I shall never speak to thee again.

K. Rich. So.

Duch. Either thou wilt die, by God's just ordinance,
Ere from this war thou turn a conqueror ;

Or I with grief and extreme age shall perish,

And never more behold<sup>3</sup> thy face again.

Therefore, take with thee my most grievous<sup>4</sup> curse ;

Which, in the day of battle, tire thee more

Than all the complete armour that thou wear'st !

My prayers on the adverse party fight :

And there the little souls of Edward's children

Whisper the spirits of thine enemies,

And promise them success and victory.

Bloody thou art, bloody will be thy end ;

Shame serves thy life, and doth thy death attend. [Exit.]

Q. Eliz. Though far more cause, yet much less spirit to curse

Abides in me ; I say amen to her. [Going.]

K. Rich. Stay, madam, I must talk<sup>5</sup> a word with you.

Q. Eliz. I have no more sons of the royal blood,
For thee to slaughter :<sup>6</sup> for my daughters, Richard,
They shall be praying nuns, not weeping queens ;
And therefore level not to hit their lives.

K. Rich. You have a daughter call'd Elizabeth,
Virtuous and fair, royal and gracious.

Q. Eliz. And must she die for this ? O, let her live,

And I'll corrupt her manners, stain her beauty ;

Slander myself, as false to Edward's bed ;

Throw over her the veil of infamy :

So she may live unscarr'd of bleeding slaughter,

I will confess she was not Edward's daughter.

K. Rich. Wrong not her birth, she is a royal princess.<sup>7</sup>

Q. Eliz. To save her life, I'll say she is not so.

K. Rich. Her life is safest only in her birth.

Q. Eliz. And only in that safety died her brothers.

K. Rich. Lo, at their births good stars were opposite.

Q. Eliz. No, to their lives ill friends were contrary.

K. Rich. All unavoided is the doom of destiny.

Q. Eliz. True, when avoided grace makes destiny :

My babes were destin'd to a fairer death,

If grace had bless'd thee with a fairer life.

K. Rich. You speak as if that I had slain my cousins.

Q. Eliz. Cousins, indeed ; and by their uncle cozen'd

Of comfort, kingdom, kindred, freedom, life.

Whose hands soever lanc'd their tender hearts,

Thy head, all indirectly, gave direction :

No doubt the murderous knife was dull and blunt,

Till it was whetted on thy stone-hard heart,

To revel in the entrails of my lambs.

But that still use of grief makes wild grief tame,

My tongue should to thy ears not name my boys
Till that my nails were anchor'd in thine eyes ;
And I, in such a desperate bay of death,
Like a poor bark, of sails and tackling reft,
Rush all to pieces on thy rocky bosom.<sup>8</sup>

K. Rich. Madam, so thrive I in my enterprise,
And dangerous success of bloody wars,
As I intend more good to you and yours,
Than ever you and yours by me were harm'd !

Q. Eliz. What good is cover'd with the face of heaven,
To be discover'd, that can do me good ?

K. Rich. The advancement of your children, gentle lady.

Q. Eliz. Up to some scaffold, there to lose their heads ?

K. Rich. Unto the dignity and height of fortune,
The high imperial type of this earth's glory.

Q. Eliz. Flatter my sorrow with report of it ;

Tell me, what state, what dignity, what honour,

Canst thou demise to any child of mine ?

K. Rich. Even all I have ; ay, and myself and all,

Will I withal endow a child of thine ;

So in the Lethe of thy angry soul

Thou drown the sad remembrance of those wrongs

Which thou supposest I have done to thee.

Q. Eliz. Be brief, lest that the process of thy kindness
Last longer telling than thy kindness' date.

K. Rich. Then know, that, from my soul, I love thy daughter.

Q. Eliz. My daughter's mother thinks it with her soul.

K. Rich. What do you think ?

Q. Eliz. That thou dost love my daughter, from thy soul :

So, from thy soul's love, didst thou love her brothers ;

And, from my heart's love, I do thank thee for it.

K. Rich. Be not so hasty to confound my meaning ;

I mean, that with my soul I love thy daughter,

And do intend to make her queen of England.

Q. Eliz. Well then, who dost thou mean shall be her
king ?

K. Rich. Even he that makes her queen : Who else should be ?

Q. Eliz. What thou ?

K. Rich. Even so : How think you of it ?<sup>9</sup>

Q. Eliz. How canst thou woo her ?

K. Rich. That I would learn of you,

As one being best acquainted with her humour.

Q. Eliz. And wilt thou learn of me ?

K. Rich. Madam, with all my heart.

Q. Eliz. Send to her, by the man that slew her brothers,

A pair of bleeding hearts ; thereon engrave

Edward, and York ; then, haply, will she weep :

Therefore present to her,—as sometime Margaret

Did to thy father steep'd in Rutland's blood,—

A handkerchief ; which, say to her, did drain

The purple sap from her sweet brothers' bodies,

And bid her wipe her weeping eyes withal.

If this inducement move her not to love,

Send her a letter of thy noble deeds ;

Tell her, thou mad'st away her uncle Clarence,

Her uncle Rivers ; ay, and, for her sake,

Mad'st quick conveyance with her good aunt Anne.

K. Rich. You mock me, madam ; this is not the way

To win your daughter.

Q. Eliz. There is no other way ;

Unless thou couldst put on some other shape,

And not be Richard that hath done all this.

K. Rich. Say, that I did all this for love of her ?

<sup>1</sup> Humphrey Hower. We follow the orthography of the folio, in which we find "what comfortable houre" immediately preceding. Malone says, "Humphrey Hour is merely used in ludicrous language for hour, like Tom Troth for truth." The different modes in which the two words are printed in the folio do not support this argument. Other commentators believe that the allusion is to the proverbial saying of dining with Duke Humphrey. We must be content to leave the matter as we find it.

Talk in the folio ; the quartos, speak.

<sup>6</sup> Slaughter in the folio ; the quartos, murther.

A royal princess in the folio ; the quartos, of royal blood.

<sup>8</sup> The preceding fourteen lines are only found in the folio.

Q. Eliz. Nay, then indeed, she cannot choose but hate<sup>1</sup> thee,
Having bought love with such a bloody spoil.

K. Rich. Look, what is done cannot be now amended;

Men shall deal unadvisedly sometimes,
Which after-hours give leisure to repent.
If I did take the kingdom from your sons,
To make amends, I'll give it to your daughter.
If I have kill'd the issue of your womb,
To quicken your increase, I will beget
Mine issue of your blood upon your daughter.
A grandam's name is little less in love
Than is the doting title of a mother;
They are as children but one step below,
Even of your mettle, of your very blood;
Of all one pain,—save for a night of groans
Endur'd of her, for whom you bid like sorrow.
Your children were vexation to your youth,
But mine shall be a comfort to your age.
The loss, you have, is but a son being king,
And, by that loss, your daughter is made queen.
I cannot make you what amends I would,
Therefore accept such kindness as I can.
Dorset, your son, that, with a fearful soul,
Leads discontented steps in foreign soil,
This fair alliance quickly shall call home
To high promotions and great dignity:
The king, that calls your beauteous daughter wife,
Familiarly shall call thy Dorset brother;
Again shall you be mother to a king,
And all the ruins of distressful times
Repair'd with double riches of content.
What! we have many goodly days to see:
The liquid drops of tears that you have shed
Shall come again, transform'd to orient pearl;
Advantaging their loan, with interest
Of ten-times double gain of happiness.
Go then, my mother, to thy daughter go;
Make bold her bashful years with your experience;
Prepare her ears to hear a wooer's tale;
Put in her tender heart the aspiring flame
Of golden sov'reignty; acquaint the princess
With the sweet silent hours of marriage joys
And when this arm of mine hath chastised
The petty rebel, the dull-brain'd Buckingham,
Bound with triumphant garlands will I come,
And lead thy daughter to a conqueror's bed;
To whom I will retail my conquest won,
And she shall be sole victress, Cæsar's Cæsar.

Q. Eliz. What were I best to say? her father's brother
Would be her lord? Or shall I say, her uncle?
Or he that slew her brothers and her uncles?
Under what title shall I woo for thee,
That God, the law, my honour, and her love,
Can make seem pleasing to her tender years?<sup>2</sup>

K. Rich. Infer fair England's peace by this alliance.

Q. Eliz. Which she shall purchase with still lasting war.

K. Rich. Tell her, the king, that may command, entreats.

Q. Eliz. That at her hands which the king's King forbids.

K. Rich. Say, she shall be a high and mighty queen.

Q. Eliz. To wail the title, as her mother doth.

K. Rich. Say, I will love her everlastingly.

Q. Eliz. But how long shall that title, ever, last?

K. Rich. Sweetly in force unto her fair life's end.

Q. Eliz. But how long fairly shall her sweet life last?

K. Rich. As long as heaven, and nature, lengthens it.

Q. Eliz. As long as hell, and Richard, likes of it.

K. Rich. Say, I, her sovereign, am her subject low.

Q. Eliz. But she, your subject, loathes such sov'reignty.

K. Rich. Be eloquent in my behalf to her.

Q. Eliz. An honest tale speeds best, being plainly told.

K. Rich. Then, plainly to her tell my loving tale.<sup>3</sup>

Q. Eliz. Plain, and not honest, is too harsh a style.

K. Rich. Your reasons are too shallow and too quick.

Q. Eliz. O, no, my reasons are too deep and dead;—
Too deep and dead, poor infants, in their graves.

K. Rich. Harp not on that string, madam; that is past.

Q. Eliz. Harp on it still shall I, till heartstrings break.

K. Rich. Now, by my George, my garter, and my crown,—

Q. Eliz. Profan'd, dishonour'd, and the third usurp'd.

K. Rich. I swear.

Q. Eliz. By nothing: for this is no oath.

Thy George, profan'd, hath lost his lordly<sup>4</sup> honour;

Thy garter, blemish'd, pawn'd his knightly virtue;

Thy crown, usurp'd, disgrac'd his kingly glory:

If something thou wouldst swear to be believ'd,

Swear then by something that thou hast not wrong'd.

K. Rich. Then, by myself,—

Q. Eliz. Thyself is self-misused.

K. Rich. Now, by the world,—

Q. Eliz. 'Tis full of thy foul wrongs.

K. Rich. My father's death,—

Q. Eliz. Thy life hath it dishonour'd.

K. Rich. Why then, by God,—

Q. Eliz. God's wrong is most of all.

If thou hadst fear'd to break an oath by him,

The unity the king my husband<sup>6</sup> made

Thou hadst not broken, nor my brothers died.<sup>7</sup>

If thou hadst fear'd to break an oath by Him,

The imperial metal, circling now thy head,

Had grac'd the tender temples of my child;

And both the princes had been breathing here,

Which now, two tender bed-fellows for dust,

Thy broken faith hath made the prey for worms.

What canst thou swear by now?

K. Rich. The time to come.

Q. Eliz. That thou hast wronged in the time o'er-past;

For I myself have many tears to wash

Hereafter time, for time past, wrong'd by thee.

The children live whose fathers<sup>8</sup> thou hast slaughter'd,

Ungovern'd youth, to wail it in their age;

The parents live whose children thou hast butcher'd

Old barren plants, to wail it with their age.

Swear not by time to come; for that thou hast

Misused ere used, by times ill-used o'er-past.

K. Rich. As I intend to prosper, and repent,

So thrive I in my dangerous affairs<sup>9</sup>

Of hostile arms! myself myself confound!

Heaven and fortune bar me happy hours!

Day yield me not thy light, nor night thy rest!

Be opposite all planets of good luck

To my proceeding! if, with dear<sup>10</sup> heart's love,

Immaculate devotion, holy thoughts,

I tender not thy beauteous princely daughter!

In her consists my happiness, and thine;

Without her, follows to myself, and thee,

Herself, the land, and many a Christian soul,

Death, desolation, ruin, and decay:

It cannot be avoided but by this;

It will not be avoided but by this.

Therefore, dear mother, (I must call you so)

<sup>1</sup> Hate thee. So the clear reading of the folio. Upon the suggestion of M. Mason this has been corrupted into the low phrase, "she cannot choose but have thee."

<sup>5</sup> In the folio Richard first proposes to swear by himself; in the quartos the order is changed.

<sup>6</sup> My husband in the folio; in the quartos, my brother—an evident mistake of the pronoun. Some modern editors correct the mistake, and keep brother.

<sup>7</sup> So the folio; the quartos—

"Had not been broken, nor my brother slain."

<sup>10</sup> Dear in the folio; the quartos, pure.

Be the attorney of my love to her.
Plead what I will be, not what I have been ;
Not my deserts, but what I will deserve :
Urge the necessity and state of times,
And be not peevish found in great designs.

Q. Eliz. Shall I be tempted of the devil thus ?

K. Rich. Ay, if the devil tempt thee to do good.

Q. Eliz. Shall I forget myself to be myself ?

K. Rich. Ay, if yourself's remembrance wrong yourself.

Q. Eliz. Yet, thou didst kill my children.

K. Rich. But in your daughter's womb I bury them :

Where, in that nest of spicery, they will breed
Selves of themselves to your recomforture.

Q. Eliz. Shall I go win my daughter to thy will ?

K. Rich. And be a happy mother by the deed.

Q. Eliz. I go.—Write to me very shortly,
And you shall understand from me her mind.

K. Rich. Bear her my true love's kiss, and so farewell.

[Kissing her. Exit QUEEN ELIZABETH.]

Relenting fool, and shallow changing woman !
How now ? what news ?

Enter RATCLIFF ; CATESBY following.

Rat. Most mighty sovereign, on the western coast
Rideth a puissant navy ; to our<sup>1</sup> shores
Throng many doubtful hollow-hearted friends,
Unarm'd, and unresolv'd to beat them back :
'Tis thought that Richmond is their admiral ;
And there they hull, expecting but the aid
Of Buckingham to welcome them ashore.

K. Rich. Some light-foot friend post to the duke of Norfolk :—

Ratcliff, thyself,—or Catesby ; where is he ?

Cate. Here, my good lord.

K. Rich. Catesby, fly to the duke.

Cate. I will, my lord, with all convenient haste.

K. Rich. Ratcliff, come hither : Post to Salisbury ;
When thou com'st thither,—Dull unmindful villain,

[To CATESBY.]

Why stay'st thou here, and go'st not to the duke ?

Cate. First, mighty liege, tell me your highness' pleasure,
What from your grace I shall deliver to him.

K. Rich. O, true, good Catesby :—Bid him levy straight
The greatest strength and power that he can make,
And meet me suddenly at Salisbury.

Cate. I go. [Exit.]

Rat. What, may it please you, shall I do at Salisbury ?

K. Rich. Why, what wouldst thou do there, before I go ?

Rat. Your highness told me I should post before.

Enter STANLEY.

K. Rich. My mind is chang'd.—Stanley, what news with you ?

Stan. None good, my liege, to please you with the hearing ;

Nor none so bad but well may be reported.

K. Rich. Heyday, a riddle ! neither good nor bad !
What need'st thou run so many miles about,
When thou may'st tell thy tale the nearest way ?
Once more, what news ?

Stan. Richmond is on the seas.

K. Rich. There let him sink, and be the seas on him !
White-liver'd runagate, what doth he there ?

Stan. I know not, mighty sovereign, but by guess.

K. Rich. Well, as you guess ?

Stan. Stirr'd up by Dorset, Buckingham, and Morton,
He makes for England, here to claim the crown.

K. Rich. Is the chair empty ? Is the sword unsway'd ?
Is the king dead ? the empire unpossess'd ?
What heir of York is there alive but we ?

And who is England's king but great York's heir ?

Then, tell me, what makes he upon the seas ?

Stan. Unless for that, my liege, I cannot guess.

K. Rich. Unless for that he comes to be your liege,

You cannot guess wherefore the Welshman comes ?

Thou wilt revolt, and fly to him, I fear.

Stan. No, my good lord,<sup>2</sup> therefore mistrust me not.

K. Rich. Where is thy power then, to beat him back ?

Where be thy tenants and thy followers ?

Are they not now upon the western shore,
Safe conducting the rebels from their ships ?

Stan. No, my good lord, my friends are in the north.

K. Rich. Cold friends to me : What do they in the north,

When they should serve their sovereign in the west ?

Stan. They have not been commanded, mighty king :

Pleaseth your majesty to give me leave,

I'll muster up my friends, and meet your grace

Where, and what time, your majesty shall please.

K. Rich. Ay, thou wouldst be gone to join with Richmond :

But I'll not trust thee.<sup>3</sup>

Stan. Most mighty sovereign,
You have no cause to hold my friendship doubtful ;
I never was, nor never will be, false.

K. Rich. Go then, and muster men. But leave behind<sup>4</sup>
Your son, George Stanley ; look your heart be firm,
Or else his head's assurance is but frail.

Stan. So deal with him as I prove true to you.

[Exit STANLEY.]

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. My gracious sovereign, now in Devonshire,
As I by friends am well advertised,
Sir Edward Courtney, and the haughty prelate
Bishop of Exeter, his elder brother,
With many more confederates, are in arms.

Enter another Messenger.

<sup>2</sup> Mess. In Kent, my liege, the Guilfords are in arms ;
And every hour more competitors<sup>5</sup>
Flock to the rebels, and their power grows strong.

Enter another Messenger.

<sup>3</sup> Mess. My lord, the army of great Buckingham—

K. Rich. Out on ye, owls ! nothing but songs of death ?

[He strikes him.]

There, take thou that, till thou bring better news.

<sup>3</sup> Mess. The news I have to tell your majesty,
Is,—that, by sudden floods and fall of waters,
Buckingham's army is dispers'd and scatter'd ;
And he himself wander'd away alone,
No man knows whither.

K. Rich. I cry thee mercy :

There is my purse, to cure that blow of thine.

Hath any well-advised friend proclaim'd

Reward to him that brings the traitor in ?

<sup>3</sup> Mess. Such proclamation hath been made, my liege.

<sup>3</sup> So the folio ; the quartos, I will not trust you, sir.

<sup>4</sup> So the folio ; the quartos—

“ Well, go, muster men. But, hear you, leave behind.”

<sup>5</sup> Competitors—associates.

'Tis said, my liege, in Yorkshire are in arms.
But this good comfort bring I to your highness,—
The Bretagne navy is dispers'd by tempest :
Richmond, in Dorsetshire, sent out a boat
Unto the shore, to ask those on the banks
If they were his assistants, yea, or no ;
Who answer'd him, they came from Buckingham
Upon his party : he, mistrusting them,
Hois'd sail, and made his course again for Bretagne.
K. Rich. March on, march on, since we are up in arms ;
If not to fight with foreign enemies,
Yet to beat down these rebels here at home.

Enter CATESBY.

Cate. My liege, the duke of Buckingham is taken,
That is the best news. That the earl of Richmond
Is with a mighty power landed at Milford,
Is colder news, but yet they must be told.

K. Rich. Away towards Salisbury ; while we reason here
A royal battle might be won and lost :
Some one take order Buckingham be brought
To Salisbury ;—the rest march on with me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—A Room in Lord Stanley's House.

Enter STANLEY, and SIR CHRISTOPHER URSWICK.

Stan. Sir Christopher, tell Richmond this from me :—
That, in the sty of this most bloody boar,<sup>1</sup>
My son George Stanley is frank'd up in hold ;
If I revolt, off goes young George's head ;
The fear of that holds off<sup>2</sup> my present aid.
So, get thee gone ; commend me to thy lord.
Withal, say, that the queen hath heartily consented
He shall espouse Elizabeth her daughter.
But, tell me, where is princely Richmond now ?

Chris. At Pembroke, or at Ha'rford-west, in Wales.

Stan. What men of name resort to him ?

Chris. Sir Walter Herbert, a renowned soldier ;
Sir Gilbert Talbot, sir William Stanley ;
Oxford, redoubted Pembroke, sir James Blunt,
And Rice ap Thomas, with a valiant crew ;
And many other of great name and worth :
And towards London do they bend their power,<sup>3</sup>
If by the way they be not fought withal.

Stan. Well, hie thee to thy lord ; I kiss his hand.
My letter will resolve him of my mind.
Farewell.<sup>4</sup> [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Salisbury. An open Place.

Enter the Sheriff and Guard, with BUCKINGHAM, led to execution.

Buck. Will not king Richard let me speak with him ?

Sher. No, my good lord : therefore be patient.

Buck. Hastings, and Edward's children, Grey, and Rivers,
Holy king Henry, and thy fair son Edward,
Vaughan, and all that have miscarried

<sup>1</sup> This most bloody boar is the reading of the quartos ; the folio, the most deadly.

Holds off in the folio ; the quartos, withholds.

<sup>4</sup> This is the literal reading of the folio, and it appears unexceptionable. The quartos read—

By underhand corrupted foul injustice !
If that your moody discontented souls
Do through the clouds behold this present hour,
Even for revenge mock my destruction !
This is All-Souls' day, fellow, is it not ?

Sher. It is, my lord.

Buck. Why, then All-Souls' day is my body's doomsday.
This is the day which, in king Edward's time,
I wish'd might fall on me, when I was found
False to his children, and his wife's allies :
This is the day wherein I wish'd to fall
By the false faith of him whom most I trusted :
This, this All-Souls' day to my fearful soul,
Is the determin'd respite of my wrongs.
That high All-seer which I dallied with,
Hath turn'd my feigned prayer on my head,
And given in earnest what I begg'd in jest.
Thus doth he force the swords of wicked men
To turn their own points on their masters' bosoms :
Thus Margaret's curse falls heavy on my neck,—
"When he," quoth she, "shall split thy heart with sorrow, Remember Margaret was a prophetess."—
Come, lead me, officers,<sup>5</sup> to the block of shame ;
Wrong hath but wrong, and blame the due of blame.

[Exeunt BUCKINGHAM, &c.]

SCENE II.—Plain near Tamworth.

Enter, with drum and colours, RICHMOND, OXFORD, SIR JAMES BLUNT, SIR WALTER HERBERT, and others, with Forces, marching.

Richm. Fellows in arms, and my most loving friends,
Bruis'd underneath the yoke of tyranny,
Thus far into the bowels of the land
Have we march'd on without impediment ;
And here receive we from our father Stanley
Lines of fair comfort and encouragement.
The wretched, bloody, and usurping boar,
That spoil'd your summer fields and fruitful vines,
Swills your warm blood like wash, and makes his trough
In your embowell'd bosoms, this foul swine
Lies now even in the centre of this isle,
Near to the town of Leicester, as we learn :
From Tamworth thither is but one day's march.
In God's name, cheerly on, courageous friends,
To reap the harvest of perpetual peace
By this one bloody trial of sharp war.

Oxf. Every man's conscience is a thousand men,<sup>6</sup>
To fight against this bloody homicide.

Herb. I doubt not but his friends will turn to us.

Blunt. He hath no friends but what are friends for fear ;
Which, in his dearest need, will fly from him.

Richm. All for our vantage. Then, in God's name, march :

True hope is swift, and flies with swallow's wings,
Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Bosworth Field.

Enter KING RICHARD and Forces; the DUKE OF NORFOLK, EARL OF SURREY, and others.

K. Rich. Here pitch our tent, even here in Bosworth field.

My lord of Surrey, why look you so sad ?

"Return unto my lord, commend me to him.
Tell him the queen hath heartily consented
He shall espouse Elizabeth her daughter.
These letters will resolve him of my mind.
Farewell."

<sup>5</sup> Lead me, officers, in the folio ; the quartos, sirs, convey me.

<sup>6</sup> Men in the folio ; the quartos, swords.

Sur. My heart is ten times lighter than my looks.

K. Rich. My lord of Norfolk!

Nor. Here, most gracious liege.

K. Rich. Norfolk, we must have knocks: Ha! must we not?

Nor. We must both give and take, my loving lord.

K. Rich. Up with my tent: Here will I lie to-night;

[Soldiers begin to set up the KING'S tent.]

But where, to-morrow?—Well, all's one for that.—

Who hath descried the number of the traitors?

Nor. Six or seven thousand is their utmost power.

K. Rich. Why, our battalia trebles that account:

Besides, the king's name is a tower of strength,

Which they upon the adverse faction want.

Up with the tent.—Come, noble gentlemen,

Let us survey the vantage of the ground;—

Call for some men of sound direction:

Let's lack<sup>1</sup> no discipline, make no delay;

For, lords, to-morrow is a busy day. [Exeunt.]

Enter, on the other side of the field, RICHMOND, SIR WILLIAM BRANDON, OXFORD, and other Lords. Some of the Soldiers pitch RICHMOND'S tent.

Richm. The weary sun hath made a golden set,

And, by the bright track of his fiery car,

Gives token of a goodly day to-morrow.

Sir William Brandon, you shall bear my standard.

Give me some ink and paper in my tent;—

I'll draw the form and model of our battle,

Limit each leader to his several charge,

And part in just proportion our small power.

My lord of Oxford, you, sir William Brandon,

And you, sir Walter Herbert, stay with me:

The earl of Pembroke keeps his regiment;<sup>2</sup>

Good captain Blunt, bear my good night to him,

And by the second hour in the morning

Desire the earl to see me in my tent:

Yet one thing more, good captain, do for me:

Where is lord Stanley quarter'd, do you know?

Blunt. Unless I have mista'en his colours much,

(Which well I am assur'd I have not done,)

His regiment lies half a mile at least

South from the mighty power of the king.

Richm. If without peril it be possible,

Sweet Blunt, make some good means to speak with him,

And give him from me this most needful note.

Blunt. Upon my life, my lord, I'll undertake it;

And so, God give you quiet rest to-night!

Richm. Good night, good captain Blunt. Come, gentlemen,

Let us consult upon to-morrow's business;

In to my tent, the dew<sup>3</sup> is raw and cold.

[They withdraw into the tent.]

Enter, to his tent, KING RICHARD, NORFOLK, RATCLIFF, and CATESBY.

K. Rich. What is 't o'clock?

Cate. It's supper time, my lord;

It's nine o'clock.

“His regiment lies half a mile at least
South from the mighty power of the king.”

And—

“Good lords, conduct him to his regiment.”

Regiment is here used in the secondary meaning of the word. We have the primary meaning in Antony and Cleopatra:—

“And gives his potent regiment to a trull.”

<sup>4</sup> A watch. The verb give—and the subsequent expression “bid my guard

K. Rich. I will not sup to-night.

Give me some ink and paper.

What, is my beaver easier than it was?

And all my armour laid into my tent?

Cate. It is, my liege; and all things are in readiness.

K. Rich. Good Norfolk, hie thee to thy charge;

Use careful watch, choose trusty sentinels.

Nor. I go, my lord.

K. Rich. Stir with the lark to-morrow, gentle Norfolk.

Nor. I warrant you, my lord. [Exit.]

K. Rich. Ratcliff!

Rat. My lord?

K. Rich. Send out a pursuivant at arms

To Stanley's regiment: bid him bring his power

Before sun-rising, lest his son George fall

Into the blind cave of eternal night.

Fill me a bowl of wine.—Give me a watch!<sup>4</sup>—

[To CATESBY.]

Saddle white Surrey for the field to-morrow.—

Look that my staves be sound, and not too heavy.

Ratcliff!

Rat. My lord?

K. Rich. Saw'st thou the melancholy lord Northumberland?

Rat. Thomas the earl of Surrey, and himself,
Much about cock-shut<sup>5</sup> time, from troop to troop,
Went through the army cheering up the soldiers.

K. Rich. So, I am satisfied. Give me a bowl of wine:

I have not that alacrity of spirit,

Nor cheer of mind that I was wont to have.

Set it down.—Is ink and paper ready?

Rat. It is, my lord.

K. Rich. Bid my guard watch; leave me.

Ratcliff, about the mid of night come to my tent,

And help to arm me.—Leave me, I say.

[*KING RICHARD retires into his tent. Exeunt
RATCLIFF and CATESBY.*]

RICHMOND'S tent opens, and discovers him and his Officers, &c.

Enter STANLEY.

Stan. Fortune and victory sit on thy helm!

Richm. All comfort that the dark night can afford

Be to thy person, noble father-in-law!

Tell me how fares our noble mother?

Stan. I, by attorney, bless thee from thy mother,

Who prays continually for Richmond's good!

So much for that. The silent hours steal on,

And flaky darkness breaks within the east.

In brief, for so the season bids us be,

Prepare thy battle early in the morning;

And put thy fortune to the arbitrement

Of bloody strokes, and mortal staring war.

I, as I may, (that which I would I cannot,)

With best advantage will deceive the time,

And aid thee in this doubtful shock of arms:

But on thy side I may not be too forward,

Lest, being seen, thy brother, tender George,

Be executed in his father's sight.

Farewell: The leisure and the fearful time watch”—show that Richard is not asking for a sentinel, as some have supposed. The watch is the watch-light. The night-candle was divided by marks to indicate how long it had burned.

<sup>5</sup> Cock-shut. In Ben Jonson's “The Satyr” we have—

“Kiss him in the cock-shut light.”

Whalley explains this expression as equivalent with twilight, and says it is derived from the name of a net, a cockshut, which is used in the twilight. Gifford adopts the explanation. We incline to think that cock-shut time is equivalent to cock-roost time—the hour at which the cock goes to rest. As morning is cock-crow, evening may by a parallel image be cock-shut. We may observe that when, at the opening of this scene, Shakspeare changed the “supper-time” from six of the quarto to nine in the folio, he had regard to what was the time of twilight on the 21st of August, the eve of the battle, when Northumberland and Surrey were reported to Richard as having gone “through the army” “at cock-shut time.”

Cuts off the ceremonious vows of love,
And ample interchange of sweet discourse,
Which so long sunder'd friends should dwell upon ;
God give us leisure for these rites of love !
Once more, adieu :—Be valiant, and speed well !

Richm. Good lords, conduct him to his regiment
I'll strive, with troubled thoughts, to take a nap ;
Lest leaden slumber peise me down<sup>1</sup> to-morrow,
When I should mount with wings of victory :
Once more, good night, kind lords and gentlemen.

[Exeunt Lords, &c., with STANLEY.]

O Thou ! whose captain I account myself,
Look on my forces with a gracious eye ;
Put in their hands thy bruising irons of wrath,
That they may crush down with a heavy fall
The usurping helmets of our adversaries !
Make us thy ministers of chastisement,
That we may praise thee in thy victory !
To thee I do commend my watchful soul,
Ere I let fall the windows of mine eyes ;
Sleeping, and waking, O, defend me still !

[Sleeps.]

The Ghost of PRINCE EDWARD, son to HENRY VI., rises between the two tents.

Ghost. Let me sit heavy on thy soul to-morrow !
[To KING RICHARD.]

Think, how thou stabb'dst me in my prime of youth
At Tewkesbury : Despair therefore, and die !

Be cheerful, Richmond ; for the wronged souls
Of butcher'd princes fight in thy behalf :
King Henry's issue, Richmond, comforts thee.

The Ghost of KING HENRY VI. rises.

Ghost. When I was mortal, my anointed body
[To KING RICHARD.]

By thee was punched full of deadly holes :
Think on the Tower and me : Despair, and die ;
Harry the Sixth bids thee despair, and die !—

Virtuous and holy, be thou conqueror ! [To RICHMOND.]
Harry, that prophesied thou shouldst be king,
Doth comfort thee in thy sleep : Live, and flourish !

The Ghost of CLARENCE rises.

Ghost. Let me sit heavy on thy soul to-morrow !
[To KING RICHARD.]

I, that was wash'd to death with fulsome wine,
Poor Clarence, by thy guile betray'd to death !
To-morrow in the battle think on me,
And fall thy edgeless sword : Despair, and die !

Thou offspring of the house of Lancaster,
[To RICHMOND.]

The wronged heirs of York do pray for thee ;
Good angels guard thy battle ! Live, and flourish !

The Ghosts of RIVERS, GREY, and VAUGHAN rise.

Riv. Let me sit heavy on thy soul to-morrow,
[To KING RICHARD.]

Rivers, that died at Pomfret ! Despair, and die !

Grey. Think upon Grey, and let thy soul despair !
[To KING RICHARD.]

Vaugh. Think upon Vaughan ; and, with guilty fear,
Let fall thy lance ! Despair, and die !—

[To KING RICHARD.]

All. Awake ! and think, our wrongs in Richard's bosom
[To RICHMOND.]

Will conquer him ;—awake, and win the day !

The Ghost of HASTINGS rises.

Ghost. Bloody and guilty, guiltily awake,
[To KING RICHARD.]

And in a bloody battle end thy days !
Think on lord Hastings ; and despair, and die !—

Quiet untroubled soul, awake, awake ! [To RICHMOND.]
Arm, fight, and conquer, for fair England's sake !

The Ghosts of the two young Princes rise.

Ghosts. Dream on thy cousins smother'd in the Tower,
Let us be lead<sup>2</sup> within thy bosom, Richard,
And weigh thee down to ruin, shame, and death !
Thy nephews' souls bid thee despair, and die.

Sleep, Richmond, sleep in peace, and wake in joy ;
Good angels guard thee from the boar's annoy !
Live, and beget a happy race of kings !
Edward's unhappy sons do bid thee flourish.

The Ghost of QUEEN ANNE rises.

Ghost. Richard, thy wife, that wretched Anne thy wife,
That never slept a quiet hour with thee,
Now fills thy sleep with perturbations :
To-morrow in the battle think on me,
And fall thy edgeless sword : Despair, and die !—

Thou, quiet soul, sleep thou a quiet sleep ;
[To RICHMOND.]

Dream of success and happy victory ;
Thy adversary's wife doth pray for thee.

The Ghost of BUCKINGHAM rises.

Ghost. The first was I that help'd thee to the crown ;
[To KING RICHARD.]

The last was I that felt thy tyranny :
O, in the battle think on Buckingham,
And die in terror of thy guiltiness !
Dream on, dream on, of bloody deeds and death !
Fainting, despair ; despairing, yield thy breath !

I died for hope, ere I could lend thee aid :
[To RICHMOND.]

But cheer thy heart, and be thou not dismay'd :
God and good angels fight on Richmond's side ;
And Richard fall<sup>3</sup> in height of all his pride.

[The Ghosts vanish. KING RICHARD starts out of his dream.]

K. Rich. Give me another horse,—bind up my wounds,—
Have mercy, Jesu !—Soft ; I did but dream.

O coward conscience, how dost thou afflict me !
The lights burn blue.—It is now dead midnight.
Cold fearful drops stand on my trembling flesh.

What, do I fear myself ? there's none else by :
Richard loves Richard ; that is, I am I.
Is there a murderer here ? No ;—Yes ; I am :
Then fly,—What, from myself ? Great reason : Why ?
Lest I revenge. What ? Myself upon myself ?
Alack, I love myself. Wherefore ? for any good,
That I myself have done unto myself ?

O, no : alas, I rather hate myself,
For hateful deeds committed by myself.
I am a villain : Yet I lie, I am not.
Fool, of thyself speak well :—Fool, do not flatter.
My conscience hath a thousand several tongues,
And every tongue brings in a several tale,
And every tale condemns me for a villain.

Perjury, perjury, in the high'st degree ;
Murder, stern murder, in the dir'st degree
All several sins, all used in each degree,
Throng to the bar, crying all,—Guilty ! guilty !
I shall despair.—There is no creature loves me ;

<sup>3</sup> Fall in the folio ; the quartos, falls.

And if I die, no soul shall pity me ;—
Nay, wherefore should they ? since that I myself
Find in myself no pity to myself.
Methought, the souls of all that I had murther'd
Came to my tent : and every one did threat
To-morrow's vengeance on the head of Richard.

Enter RATCLIFF.

Rat. My lord ?

K. Rich. Who's there ?

Rat. Ratcliff, my lord ; 'tis I. The early village cock
Hath twice done salutation to the morn ;
Your friends are up, and buckle on their armour.

[K. Rich. O, Ratcliff, I have dream'd a fearful dream !—
What thinkest thou, will our friends prove all true ?

Rat. No doubt, my lord.]<sup>1</sup>

K. Rich. Ratcliff, I fear, I fear,—

Rat. Nay, good my lord, be not afraid of shadows.

K. Rich. By the apostle Paul, shadows to-night
Have struck more terror to the soul of Richard,
Than can the substance of ten thousand soldiers,
Armed in proof, and led by shallow Richmond.
It is not yet near day. Come, go with me ;
Under our tents I'll play the eaves-dropper,
To hear if any mean to shrink from me.

[Exeunt KING RICHARD and RATCLIFF.

RICHMOND wakes. Enter OXFORD and others.

Lords. Good morrow, Richmond.

Richm. 'Cry mercy, lords, and watchful gentlemen,
That you have ta'en a tardy sluggard here.

Lords. How have you slept, my lord ?

Richm. The sweetest sleep, and fairest-boding dreams,
That ever enter'd in a drowsy head,
Have I since your departure had, my lords.
Methought, their souls whose bodies Richard murther'd,
Came to my tent, and cried on Victory.
I promise you, my heart is very jocund
In the remembrance of so fair a dream.
How far into the morning is it, lords ?

Lords. Upon the stroke of four.

Richm. Why, then 'tis time to arm, and give direction.—
[He advances to the Troops.

More than I have said, loving countrymen,
The leisure and enforcement of the time
Forbids to dwell upon : Yet, remember this,—
God, and our good cause, fight upon our side ;
The prayers of holy saints and wronged souls,
Like high-rear'd bulwarks, stand before our faces :
Richard except, those whom we fight against
Had rather have us win, than him they follow.
For what is he they follow ? truly, gentlemen,
A bloody tyrant, and a homicide ;
One rais'd in blood, and one in blood establish'd ;
One that made means to come by what he hath,
And slaughter'd those that were the means to help him ;
A base foul stone, made precious by the foil
Of England's chair, where he is falsely set ;
One that hath ever been God's enemy :
Then if you fight against God's enemy,
God will, in justice, ward you as his soldiers ;
If you do sweat to put a tyrant down,
You sleep in peace, the tyrant being slain ;
If you do fight against your country's foes,
Your country's fat shall pay your pains the hire ;
If you do fight in safeguard of your wives,
Your wives shall welcome home the conquerors ;
If you do free your children from the sword,

Your children's children quit it in your age.
Then, in the name of God, and all these rights,
Advance your standards, draw your willing swords :
For me, the ransom of my bold attempt
Shall be this cold corpse on the earth's cold face ;
But if I thrive, the gain of my attempt
The least of you shall share his part thereof.
Sound, drums and trumpets, boldly and cheerfully ;
God and Saint George ! Richmond and victory !

[Exeunt.

Re-enter KING RICHARD, RATCLIFF, Attendants, and Forces.

K. Rich. What said Northumberland, as touching Richmond ?

Rat. That he was never trained up in arms.

K. Rich. He said the truth : And what said Surrey then ?

Rat. He smil'd and said, the better for our purpose.

K. Rich. He was i' the right ; and so, indeed, it is.

[Clock strikes.

Tell the clock there.—Give me a calendar.—
Who saw the sun to-day ?

Rat. Not I, my lord.

K. Rich. Then he disdains to shine ; for, by the book,
He should have braved the east an hour ago :

A black day will it be to somebody.—

Ratcliff,—

Rat. My lord ?

K. Rich. The sun will not be seen to-day ;
The sky doth frown and lour upon our army.
I would these dewy tears were from the ground.
Not shine to-day ! Why, what is that to me,
More than to Richmond ? for the self-same heaven
That frowns on me looks sadly upon him.

Enter NORFOLK.

Nor. Arm, arm, my lord ; the foe vaunts in the field.

K. Rich. Come, bustle, bustle :—Caparison my horse ;—
Call up lord Stanley, bid him bring his power :

I will lead forth my soldiers to the plain,
And thus my battle shall be ordered.
My forward shall be drawn out all in length,
Consisting equally of horse and foot ;

Our archers shall be placed in the midst :
John duke of Norfolk, Thomas earl of Surrey,
Shall have the leading of the foot and horse.

They thus directed, we will follow
In the main battle ; whose puissance on either side
Shall be well winged with our chiefest horse.
This, and Saint George to boot !—What think'st thou,
Norfolk ?

Nor. A good direction, warlike sovereign.
This found I on my tent this morning. [Giving a scroll.

K. Rich. [Reads.] " Jocky of Norfolk, be not so <sup>2</sup> bold,
For Dickon thy master is bought and sold."

A thing devised by the enemy.—

Go, gentlemen, every man unto his charge :
Let not our babbling dreams affright our souls ;
For conscience is a word that cowards use,
Devis'd at first to keep the strong in awe ;
Our strong arms be our conscience, swords our law.
March on, join bravely, let us to 't pell-mell ;
If not to heaven, then hand in hand to hell.

What shall I say more than I have inferr'd ?
Remember whom you are to cope withal ;—
A sort of vagabonds, rascals, and runaways,
A scum of Bretagnes, and base lackey peasants,

<sup>1</sup> The lines in brackets are not found in the folio.

<sup>2</sup> So in all the old copies. The line in the Chronicle is—

" Jocky of Norfolk, be not too bold."

Whom their o'er-cloy'd country vomits forth
To desperate ventures and assur'd destruction.
You sleeping safe, they bring you to unrest;
You having lands, and bless'd with beauteous wives,
They would restrain the one, distain the other.
And who doth lead them but a paltry fellow,
Long kept in Bretagne at our mother's cost?
A milksop, one that never in his life
Felt so much cold as over shoes in snow?
Let's whip these stragglers o'er the seas again;
Lash hence these overweening rags of France,
These famish'd beggars, weary of their lives;
Who, but for dreaming on this fond exploit,
For want of means, poor rats, had hang'd themselves.
If we be conquer'd, let men conquer us,
And not these bastard Bretagnes, whom our fathers
Have in their own land beaten, bob'd, and thump'd,
And, on record, left them the heirs of shame.
Shall these enjoy our lands? lie with our wives?
Ravish our daughters?—Hark, I hear their drum.

[Drum afar off.]

Fight, gentlemen of England! fight, bold<sup>1</sup> yeomen!
Draw, archers, draw your arrows to the head!
Spur your proud horses hard, and ride in blood;
Amaze the welkin with your broken staves!

Enter a Messenger.

What says lord Stanley? will he bring his power?

Mess. My lord, he doth deny to come.

K. Rich. Off<sup>2</sup> with his son George's head!

Nor. My lord, the enemy is pass'd the marsh;
After the battle let George Stanley die.

K. Rich. A thousand hearts are great within my bosom:
Advance our standards, set upon our foes;
Our ancient word of courage, fair Saint George,
Inspire us with the spleen of fiery dragons!
Upon them! Victory sits on our helms. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Another part of the Field.

Alarum: Excursions. Enter NORFOLK and Forces; to him CATESBY.

Cate. Rescue, my lord of Norfolk, rescue, rescue!
The king enacts more wonders than a man,
Daring an opposite to every danger;
His horse is slain, and all on foot he fights,
Seeking for Richmond in the throat of death:
Rescue, fair lord, or else the day is lost!

Alarum. Enter KING RICHARD.

K. Rich. A horse! a horse! my kingdom for a horse!

Cate. Withdraw, my lord, I'll help you to a horse.
K. Rich. Slave, I have set my life upon a cast,
And I will stand the hazard of the die:
I think there be six Richmonds in the field;
Five have I slain to-day, instead of him:
A horse! a horse! my kingdom for a horse! [Exeunt.]

Alarums. Enter KING RICHARD and RICHMOND; they fight; RICHARD is slain.<sup>3</sup>

Retreat and flourish. Then enter RICHMOND, STANLEY bearing the crown, with divers other Lords, and Forces.

Richm. God, and your arms, be prais'd, victorious friends;
The day is ours, the bloody dog is dead.

Stan. Courageous Richmond, well hast thou acquit
thee!

Lo, here, these long-usurped royalties,<sup>4</sup>
From the dead temples of this bloody wretch
Have I pluck'd off, to grace thy brows withal;
Wear it, endure it, make much of it.

Richm. Great God of heaven, say, amen, to all!

But, tell me, is young George Stanley living?

Stan. He is, my lord, and safe in Leicester town;
Whither, if you please, we may withdraw us.<sup>5</sup>

Richm. What men of name are slain on either side?

Stan. John duke of Norfolk, Walter lord Ferrers,
Sir Robert Brakenbury, and sir William Brandon.

Richm. Inter their bodies as becomes their births.
Proclaim a pardon to the soldiers fled

That in submission will return to us;
And then, as we have ta'en the sacrament,
We will unite the white rose and the red:
Smile heaven upon this fair conjunction,
That long hath frown'd upon their enmity!
What traitor hears me, and says not amen?
England hath long been mad, and scarr'd herself;
The brother blindly shed the brother's blood,
The father rashly slaughter'd his own son,
The son, compell'd, been butcher to the sire;
All this divided York and Lancaster,
Divided in their dire division.

O, now let Richmond and Elizabeth,
The true succeeders of each royal house,
By God's fair ordinance conjoin together!
And let their heirs, (God, if thy will be so),
Enrich the time to come with smooth-fac'd peace,
With smiling plenty, and fair prosperous days!
Abate the edge of traitors, gracious Lord,
That would reduce<sup>6</sup> these bloody days again,
And make poor England weep in streams of blood!
Let them not live to taste this land's increase,
That would with treason wound this fair land's peace!
Now civil wounds are stopp'd, peace lives again;
That she may long live here, God say—Amen! [Exeunt.] action. In the modern editions we have, "Enter King Richard and Richmond; and exeunt fighting."

<sup>5</sup> So the folio; the quartos, Whither, if it please you, we may now, &c.

ACT I.

<sup>a</sup> SCENE II.—“Come now, toward Chertsey with your holy load.”

THE monastery of Chertsey, to which, after resting a day at St. Paul's, the corpse of Henry VI. was carried to be interred, exhibits scarcely any trace of its former state. An old building stands upon its site, and a few mouldering walls indicate that the men of other days have here abided.

<sup>b</sup> SCENE II.—“*Dead Henry's wounds
Open their congeal'd mouths and bleed afresh!*”

Drayton has stated the popular superstition to which this passage refers:—

“If the vile actors of the heinous deed
Near the dead body happily be brought,
Oft't hath been prov'd the breathless corpse will bleed.”

In a very interesting collection of “English Causes Célèbres,” edited by Mr. Craik, the belief is shown to have been so universally established in Scotland as late as 1688, that the crown counsel, Sir George Mackenzie, in the remarkable trial of Philip Standsfield, thus alludes to a fact sworn to by several witnesses on that trial:—“God Almighty himself was pleased to bear a share in the testimonies which we produce. That Divine Power which makes the blood circulate during life has oftentimes, in all nations, opened a passage to it after death upon such occasions, but most in this case; for after all the wounds had been sewed up, and the body designedly shaken up and down, and, which is most wonderful, after the body had been buried for several days, which naturally occasions the blood to congeal, upon Philip's touching it the blood darted and sprung out, to the great astonishment of the surgeons themselves, who were desired to watch this event; whereupon Philip, astonished more than they, threw down the body, crying, O God! O God! and, cleansing his hand, grew so faint that they were forced to give him a cordial.”

ACT II.

<sup>a</sup> SCENE II.—“Me seemeth good, that, with some little train, Forthwith from Ludlow the young prince be fet.”

Ludlow Castle was the ancient palace of the Princes of Wales, attached to the principality. Prince Edward was residing here under the governance of Earl Rivers, his maternal uncle. The castle is stated to have been founded on its rocky ridge in the reign of Henry I. It is now ruinous and deserted; but its associations are of the most enduring nature. “With whatever feats of chivalry it might have been anciently ennobled, the representation of ‘Comus’ in this stately fortress will ever be mentioned as one of the most memorable and honourable circumstances in the course of its history.”

ACT III.

SCENE I.—“Welcome, sweet prince, to London, to your chamber.”

An extract from Ben Jonson's “Part of King James's Entertainment in passing to his Coronation” will explain this passage:—“The scene presented itself in a square and flat upright, like to the side of a city: the top thereof, above the vent and crest, adorned with houses, towers, and steeples, set off in perspective. Upon the battlements in a great capital letter was inscribed

LONDINIUM

Beneath that, in a less and different character, was written

CAMERA REGIA,

* J. Warton, Milton's Minor Poems.

which title immediately after the Norman Conquest it began to have; and, by the indulgence of succeeding princes, hath been hitherto continued. In the frieze over the gate it seemeth to speak this verse:—

PAR DOMUS HÆC CÆLO, SED MINOR EST DOMINO, taken out of Martial, and implying, that though this city (for the state and magnificence) might by hyperbole be said to touch the stars, and reach up to heaven, yet was it far inferior to the master thereof, who was His Majesty; and in that respect unworthy to receive him. The highest person advanced therein was

MONARCHICA BRITANNICA;

and fitly; applying to the above-mentioned title of the city, The King's Chamber, and therefore here placed as in the proper seat of the empire.”

<sup>b</sup> SCENE I.—“Thus like the formal Vice Iniquity.”

In an illustration of Henry IV., Part II., Act III., we have given a brief notice of the Vice of the old drama. Gifford has thus described him, with his usual good sense; and his description may spare our readers the trouble of wading through the elaborate dissertations which generally accompany the passage before us:—“He appears to have been a perfect counterpart of the Harlequin of the modern stage, and had a twofold office; to instigate the hero of the piece to wickedness, and, at the same time, to protect him from the devil, whom he was permitted to buffet and baffle with his wooden sword, till the process of the story required that both the protector and the protected should be carried off by the fiend; or the latter driven roaring from the stage by some miraculous interposition in favour of the repentant offender.” This note is appended to a passage in the first scene of Ben Jonson's “The Devil is an Ass.” We learn from this scene that there were Vices of various ranks, which had their proper appellations:—

“Sat. What Vice?
What kind wouldst thou have it of?
“Pug. Why any: Fraud,
Or Covetousness, or Lady Vanity,
Or old Iniquity.”

We have here, then, the very personage to which Richard refers; and Jonson brings him upon the scene to proclaim his own excellences, in a style of which the following is a specimen:—

“What is he calls upon me, and would seem to lack a Vice?
Ere his words be half spoken, I am with him in a trice;
Here, there, and everywhere, as the cat is with the mice:
True Vetus Iniquitas. Lack'st thou cards, friend, or dice?
I will teach thee to cheat, child, to cog, lie, and swagger,
And ever and anon to be drawing forth thy dagger:
To swear by Gogs-nowns, like a lusty Juventus,
In a cloak to thy heel, and a hat like a pent-house.”

Satan, however, will have nothing to do with Iniquity, whom he holds to be obsolete:—

“They are other things
That are received now upon earth, for Vices;
Stranger and newer; and changed every hour.”

In “The Staple of News” there is a sort of Chorus, or “Intermean,” between each act, in which the previous scenes are remarked upon. We learn again from this that the Vice had become obsolete in Jonson's time. The Vices of the play are explained to be the vicious characters; but Tattle, one of the performers in the Intermean, objects to this; which Mirth, another performer, defends:—

“Tat. But here is never a fiend to carry him away. Besides, he has never a wooden dagger! I would not give a rush for a Vice that has not a wooden dagger to snap at everybody he meets.

“Mirth. That was the old way, gossip, when Iniquity came in like Hokos Pokos, in a juggler's jerkin, with false skirts, like the Knave of Clubs; but now they are attired like men and women of the time, the Vices male and female.”

Iniquity, then, was no doubt a character whose attributes were always essentially the same; who was dressed always according to one fashion; who constantly went through the same round of action; who had his own peculiar cant words;—something, in fact, very similar to that most interesting relic of antiquity, Punch, who, in spite of meddling legislation, still beats his wife and still defies the devil. It is to this fixed character of the “Vice Iniquity” that we think Shakspeare alludes when he calls him “the formel Vice”—the Vice who conducts himself according to a set form. It was his custom, no doubt, to “Moralize two meanings in one word.”

It is to this formal character that Hamlet alludes:—

“A vice of kings—
A cutpurse of the empire and the rule;
That from a shelf the precious diadem stole,
And put it in his pocket!”
“A king
Of shreds and patches.”

° SCENE I.—“At Crosby-house there shall you find us both.”

No historical fact can be better ascertained than the connection of Richard III. with Crosby House. It was the mansion of Sir John Crosby, an eminent citizen, who was sheriff in 1470. The temporary occupation of this splendid house by Richard was probably owing to the favour in which he was held in the city, where he had many zealous, and, no doubt, conscientious partisans. This fine specimen of the domestic architecture of the fifteenth century has been singularly fortunate in partially escaping the accidents of time, and the more ruthless devastation of modern improvement. What remains to us has been judiciously restored; and we have no doubt that the national love of whatever is connected with the name of Shakspeare has thus secured to us one of the most interesting places associated with his immortal scenes.

° SCENE IV.—“*My lord of Ely, when I was last in Holborn,
I saw good strawberries in your garden there;
I do beseech you send for some of them.*”

Sir Thomas More, no doubt, had this circumstance of the remarkable scene which preceded the death of Hastings from some well-authenticated report. It was not a thing to be invented.† Ely Place, a century afterwards, was surrounded with fields and gardens; and in the time of Richard III. strawberries were an article of ordinary consumption in London. In Lydgate’s poem of “London Lyckpeny” we have the following lines:—

“Then unto London I dyde me hye,
Of all the land it bearyeth the pryse;
‘Gode pescode,’ owne began to cry—
‘Strabery rype, and cherrys in the ryse.’”

° SCENE V.—“If you thrive well bring them to Baynard’s castle.”

Baynard’s Castle, which stood on the bank of the river in Thames Street, has been swept away by the commercial necessities of London. The dingy barge is moored in the place of the splendid galley, and porters and carmen squabble on the spot where princes held their state. The Baynard’s Castle of the time of Richard III. was built by Humphrey Duke of Gloster; and it was subsequently granted by Henry VI. to Richard’s father, the Duke of York.

ACT IV.

° SCENE I.—“Were red-hot steel to sear me to the brain.”

It is probable that Shakspeare had access to the story which is detailed in Goulart’s “Admirable and Memorable Histories” (1607), how John, the son of Vaivode Stephen, having defeated an army of Hungarian peasants in 1514, caused their general, “called George, to be stripped naked, upon whose head the executioner set a crown of hot burning iron.” This is the “Luke’s iron crown” of Goldsmith. In Wyntown’s Chronicle we have the like punishment assigned to “Jak Bonhowne.”

HISTORICAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

ACT I.

It has not been our design, in these Illustrations, to advance the knowledge of the real facts of history, and to show the proper dependence of one fact upon another, for the purpose of correcting the poetical view of any series of events; far less have we endeavoured to enter upon disputed points, and to place conflicting evidence, for the most part derived from the more accurate researches of modern times, in opposition to the details of the old historical authorities. It is our business simply to show the foundations upon which our poet built—to trace the relations between his dramatic situations and the narratives with which he was evidently familiar. In the great drama before us Shakspeare fell in with the popular view of the character of Richard III., preserving all the strong lineaments of his guilty ambition, as represented by Sir Thomas More, and the chroniclers who followed the narrative of that illustrious man, with marvellous subservience to his own wonderful conception of the high intellectual supremacy of this usurper. We are not about to inquire whether the Richard of history has had justice done to him, but whether the Richard of Shakspeare accords with the Richard of the old annalists. We shall quote invariably from Hall, because his narrative is more literally copied from More and the contemporary writers than that of Holinshed, who is never so quaint and vigorous; and further, because we wish to show that the nonsense which has been uttered by Malone and others, that Shakspeare knew no other historian than Holinshed, is disproved in the clearest manner by the accuracy with which in some scenes he follows the older chronicler.

We first give Hall’s description (from More) of Richard’s person and character:—

“Richard duke of Gloster was in wit and courage equal with the others (his brothers Edward and George), but in beauty and lineaments of nature far underneath both; for he was little of stature, evil-featured of limbs, crook-backed, the left shoulder much higher than the right, hard favoured of visage, such as in estates is called a warlike visage and among common persons a crabbed face. He was malicious, wrathful, and envious, and, as it is reported, his mother the duchess had much ado in her travail, and that he came into the world the feet forward, as men be borne outward, and, as the fame ran, not untoothed: whether that men of hatred reported above the truth, or that nature changed his course in his beginning which in his life many things unnaturally committed, this I leave to God his judgment. He was none evil captain in war, as to the which his disposition was more inclined to than to peace. Sundry victories he had, and some overthrows, but never for default of his own person, either for lack of hardiness or politic order. Free he was of his dispenses, and somewhat above his power liberal; with large gifts he got him unsteadfast friendship, for which cause he was fain to borrow, pill, and extort in other places, which got him steadfast hatred. He was close and secret, a deep dissimuler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly familiar where he inwardly hated, not letting to kiss whom he thought to kill; despiteous and cruel, not alway for evil will, but often for ambition and to serve his purpose; friend and foe were all indifferent where his advantage grew; he spared no man's death whose life withstood his purpose. He slew in the Tower King Henry the Sixth, saying, Now is there no heir male of King Edward the Third but we of the house of York; which murder was done without King Edward his assent, which would have appointed that butcherly office to some other rather than to his own brother. Some wise men also wene that his drift lacked not in helping forth his own brother of Clarence to his death, which thing to all appearance he resisted, although he inwardly minded it. And the cause thereof was, as men noting his doings and proceedings did mark, because that he long in King Edward his time thought to obtain the crown in case that the king his brother, whose life he looked that evil diet would soon shorten, should happen to decease, as he did indeed, his children being young. And then, if the Duke of Clarence had lived, his pretended purpose had been far hindered; for if the Duke of Clarence had kept himself true to his nephew the young king, or would have taken upon him to be king, every one of these casts had been a trump in the Duke of Gloster's way: but when he was sure that his brother of Clarence was dead, then he knew he might work without that jeopardy. But of these points there is no certainty, and whosoever divineth or conjectureth may as well shoot too far as too short; but this conjecture afterward took place (as few do), as you shall perceive hereafter."

The "taking off" of Clarence is not imputed by the old historians to Richard. At the time when Shakspeare wrote, little more than a century after these events, it was probably usual to ascribe crimes which we have not even heard of to the usurper who had perished, and from whose triumphant rival the reigning family had sprung. The history of the murder of Clarence is thus related:—

"In the xvii year of King Edward there fell a sparkle of privy malice between the king and his brother the Duke of Clarence, whether it rose of old grudges before time passed, or were it newly kindled and set afire by the queen or her blood, which were ever mistrusting and privily barking at the king's lineage, or were he desirous to reign after his brother: to men that have thereof made large inquisition, of such as were of no small authority in those days, the certainty thereof was hid, and could not truly be disclosed but by conjectures, which as often deceive the imaginations of fantastical folk, as declare truth to them in conclusion. The fame was that the king or the queen, or both, sore troubled with a foolish prophecy, and by reason thereof began to stomach and grievously to grudge against the duke: the effect of which was, after King Edward should reign one whose first letter of his name should be a G; and because the devil is wont with such witchcrafts to wrap and illaquate the minds of men, which delight in such devilish fantasies, they said afterward that that prophecy lost not his effect, when after King Edward Gloster usurped his kingdom.

"Other allege this to be the cause of his death:—That of late the old rancour between them being newly revived (the which between no creatures can be more vehement than between brethren, especially when it is firmly radicate), the duke, being destitute of a wife, by the means of Lady Margaret Duchess of Bourgoyne, his sister, procured to have the Lady Mary, daughter and heir to Duke Charles her husband, to be given to him in matrimony; which marriage King Edward (envying the felicity of his brother) both gainsaid and disturbed. This privy displeasure was openly appeased, but not inwardly forgotten nor outwardly forgiven; for that notwithstanding a servant of the duke's was suddenly accused (I cannot say of truth or untruly suspected by the duke's enemies) of poisoning, sorcery, or enchantment, and thereof condemned, and put to taste the pains of death. The duke, which might not suffer the wrongful condemnation of his man (as he in his conscience adjudged), nor yet forbear, nor patiently suffer the unjust handling of his trusty servant, daily did oppugn and with ill words murmur at the doing thereof. The king, much grieved and troubled with his brother's daily querimony and continual exclamation, caused him to be apprehended and cast into the Tower, where he, being taken and adjudged for a traitor, was privily drowned in a butt of malmesey.

"But sure it is that although King Edward were consenting to his death and destruction, yet he much did both lament his unfortunate chance and repent his sudden execution; inasmuch that, when any person sued to him for pardon or remission of any malefactor condemned to the punishment of death, he would accustomably say, and openly speak, O unfortunate brother, for whose life not one creature would make intercession! openly speaking, and apparently meaning, that, by the means of some of the nobility, he was circumvented and brought to his confusion."

The marriage of Richard with the young widow of the son of Henry VI. is a remarkable circumstance—as remarkable as the fact that he had afterwards obtained sufficient influence with the widow of Edward IV. to propose to marry her daughter Elizabeth. The wooing scene with Anne is an example of the skill with which our great dramatist reconciles contradictions. If Richard were unsuspected by his wife to have murdered her husband and his father, it was not unnatural that she should have married him; if she were cognizant of these actions, which the poet has represented she was, her disgust could only have been overcome by the profound dissimulation with which he has also shown her to be propitiated.

ACT II.

The death of Edward IV. was at once succeeded by the most decided movement on the part of Richard. He, in concert with Buckingham, assembled a large body of followers, and reached the young king at Stony-Stratford, on his way to London. They arrested his followers, and carried him back to Northampton. The scene is thus described by Hall:—

"And forthwith they arrested the Lord Richard, and Sir Thomas Vaughan, and Sir Richard Hawte, knights, in the king's presence, and brought the king and all back to Northampton, where they took further counsel in their affairs; and there they sent from the king whom it pleased them, and set about him such servants as better pleased them than him; at which dealing he wept and was not content, but it booted not. And at dinner the Duke of Gloster sent a dish from his own table to the Lord Rivers, praying him to be of good cheer, and all should be well; he thanked him, and prayed the messenger to bear it to his nephew the Lord Richard, with like words, whom he knew to have need of comfort, as one to whom such adversity was strange; but he himself had been all his days enured therewith, and therefore could bear it the better. But for all this message, the Duke of Gloster sent the Lord Rivers, the Lord Richard, and Sir Thomas Vaughan, and Sir Richard Hawte, into the north parts, into divers prisons; but at last all came to Pomfret, where they all four were beheaded without judgment."

The flight of the queen to sanctuary is thus most graphically described by the chronicler. There is a quiet power in the concluding sentence, "The queen sat alone below on the rushes, all desolate and dismayed," which is akin to the highest poetry:—

"Whereupon the bishop called up all his servants and took with him the great seal, and came before day to the queen, about whom he found much heaviness, rumble, haste, business, conveyance and carriage of her stuff into sanctuary; every man was busy to carry, bear, and convey stuff, chests and fardells; no man was unoccupied, and some carried more than they were commanded to another place. The queen sat alone below on the rushes, all desolate and dismayed, whom the archbishop comforted in the best manner that he could."

ACT III.

Sir Thomas More's "Tragical History of Richard III." (otherwise called "The History of the pitiful Life and unfortunate Death of King Edward V.") ought to be regarded with veneration, for it has given to Shakspeare the materials for some of the most spirited of these scenes. Hall copied More verbatim; and in that he showed his good sense. The scenes described by More have a wonderful air of truth—probably, in great part, from the notice of little incidents that could only have been derived from actual observation. It is supposed that he obtained these minute particulars from Morton Bishop of Ely, the same bishop who had very good strawberries in his garden at Holborn. However the transactions of the reign of Richard may have been coloured, the colouring must remain. The scenes which More has recorded, and Shakspeare rendered perpetual, must continue to be received as true. They may not be the literal truth, but they involve, there can be little doubt, the higher general truth, with reference to the mysterious events of this turbulent period. We have little more to do here than indicate the connection between the old narrative and the action of this drama.

The following is the foundation of the first scene of this act:—

“When the cardinal and the other lords had received the young duke, they brought him into the Star Chamber, where the protector took him into his arms and kissed him, with these words: Now welcome, my lord, with all my very heart; and he said in that of likelihood even as he inwardly thought, and thereupon forthwith brought him to the king his brother into the bishop’s palace at Paul’s, and from thence through the city honourably into the Tower, out of which after that day they never came abroad. When the protector had both the children in his possession, yea, and that they were in a sure place, he then began to thirst to see the end of his enterprise. And to avoid all suspicion he caused all the lords which he knew to be faithful to the king to assemble at Baynard’s castle to commune of the order of the coronation, while he and other of his complices and of his affinity at Crosby’s-place contrived the contrary, and to make the protector king: to which counsel there were adhibit very few, and they very secret.”

With what skill Shakspeare has caught the dramatic situation of the old history may be seen by a comparison of the following extract from Hall with Scene II. :—

“A marvellous case it is to hear, either the warnings that he should have voided, or the tokens of that he could not void. For the next night before his death the Lord Stanley sent to him a trusty messenger at midnight in all the haste, requiring him to rise and ride away with him, for he was disposed utterly no longer for to abide, for he had a fearful dream, in the which he thought that a boar with his tusks so rased them both by the heads that the blood ran about both their shoulders; and for as much as the protector gave the boar for his cognizance, he imagined that it should be he. This dream made such a fearful impression in his heart, that he was thoroughly determined no longer to tarry, but had his horse ready, if the Lord Hastings would go with him; so that they would ride so far that night that they should be out of danger by the next day. Ah! good lord (q<sup>d</sup> the Lord Hastings to the messenger): leaneth my lord thy master so much to such trifles, and hath such faith in dreams, which either his own fear phantasieth, or do rise in the night’s rest by reason of the day’s thought? Tell him it is plain witchcraft to believe in such dreams, which, if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh he not that we might as likely make them true by our going, if we were caught and brought back (as friends fail fliers)? for then had the boar a cause likely to rase us with his tusks, as folks that fled for some falsehood, wherefore either is there peril, nor none there is deed, or if any be it is rather in going than abiding. And if we should needs fall in peril one way or other, yet had I liefer that men should say it were by other men’s falsehood, than think it were either our own fault or faint feeble heart; and therefore go to thy master and commend me to him, and say that I pray him to be merry and have no fear, for I assure him I am assured of the man he wotteth of, as I am sure of mine own hand. God send grace (q<sup>d</sup> the messenger); and so departed. Certain it is also that, in riding toward the Tower the same morning in which he was beheaded, his horse that he accustomed to ride on stumbled with him twice or thrice almost to the falling; which thing, although it happeth to them daily to whom no mischance is toward, yet hath it been as an old evil token observed as a going toward mischief. Now this that followeth was no warning, but an envious scorn. The same morning, ere he were up from his bed, there came to him Sir Thomas Haward, son to the Lord Haward (which lord was one of the priviest of the lord protector’s council and doing), as it were of courtesy to accompany him to the council, but of truth sent by the lord protector to haste him hitherward.

“This Sir Thomas, while the Lord Hastings staid a while communing with a priest whom he met in the Tower-street, brake the lord’s tale, saying to him merely, What, my lord! I pray you come on; wherefore talk you so long with that priest? you have no need of a priest yet: and laughed upon him, as though he would say, You shall have need of one soon. But little wist the other what he meant

(but or night these words were well remembered by them that heard them); so the true Lord Hastings little mistrusted, and was never merrier, nor thought his life in more surety in all his days, which thing is often a sign of change: but I shall rather let anything pass me than the vain surety of man’s mind so near his death; for upon the very Tower wharf, so near the place where his head was off so soon after as a man might well cast a ball, a pursuivant of his own, called Hastings, met with him, and of their meeting in that place he was put in remembrance of another time in which it happened them to meet before together in the place, at which time the Lord Hastings had been accused to King Edward by the Lord Rivers, the queen’s brother, insomuch that he was for a while, which lasted not long, highly in the king’s indignation. As he now met the same pursuivant in the same place, the jeopardy so well passed, it gave him great pleasure to talk with him thereof, with whom he had talked in the same place of that matter, and therefore he said, Ah, Hastings, art thou remembered when I met thee here once with an heavy heart? Yea, my lord, (q<sup>d</sup> he,) that I remember well, and thanked be to God they gat no good nor you no harm thereby. Thou wouldest say so (q<sup>d</sup> he) if thou knewest so much as I do, which few know yet, and more shall shortly. That meant he, that the Earl Rivers and the Lord Richard and Sir Thomas Vaughan should that day be beheaded at Pomfret, as they were indeed; which act he wist well should be done, but nothing ware that the axe hung so near his own head. In faith, man, (q<sup>d</sup> he,) I was never so sorry, nor never stood in so great danger of my life, as I did when thou and I met here; and lo! the world is turned now; now stand mine enemies in the danger, as thou mayest hap to know more hereafter, and I never in my life merrier, nor never in so great surety. I pray God it prove so (q<sup>d</sup> Hastings). Prove! (q<sup>d</sup> he :) doubtst thou that? nay, nay, I warrant thee. And so in manner displeased he entered into the Tower.”

So more especially with the great scene (Scene IV.) of the arrest of Hastings:—

“The lord protector caused a council to be set at the Tower on the Friday the thirteenth day of June, where was much communing for the honourable solemnity of the coronation, of the which the time appointed approached so near that the pageants were a making day and night at Westminster, and victual killed which afterward was cast away.

“These lords thus sitting communing of this matter, the protector came in among them about nine of the clock, saluting them courteously, excusing himself that he had been from them so long, saying merely that he had been a sleeper that day; and after a little talking with them he said to the Bishop of Ely, My lord, you have very good strawberries in your garden at Holborn, I require you let us have a mess of them. Gladly, my lord, (q<sup>d</sup> he,) I would I had some better thing as ready to your pleasure as that: and with that in all haste he sent his servant for a dish of strawberries. The protector set the lords fast in communing, and thereupon prayed them to spare him a little, and so he departed, and came again between ten and eleven of the clock into the chamber all changed, with a sour angry countenance, knitting the brows, frowning, and fretting, and gnawing on his lips, and so set him down in his place. All the lords were dismayed, and sore marvelled of this manner and sudden change, and what thing should him ail. When he had sitten a while, thus he began: What were they worthy to have that compass and imagine the destruction of me, being so near of blood to the king, and protector of this his royal realm? At which question all the lords sat sore astonished, musing much by whom the question should be meant, of which every man knew himself clear.

“Then the Lord Hastings, as he that for the familiarity that was between them thought he might be boldest with him, answered and said, That they were worthy to be punished as heinous traitors, whatsoever they were: and all the other affirmed the same. That is (q<sup>d</sup> he) yonder sorceress my brother’s wife, and other with her: meaning the queen. At these words many of the lords were sore abashed which favoured her; but the Lord Hastings was better content in his mind that it was moved by her than by any other that he loved better, albeit his heart grudged that he was not afore made of counsel of this matter, as well as he was of the taking of her kindred, and of their putting to death, which were by his assent before devised to be beheaded at Pomfret this self-same day, in the which he was not ware that it was by other devised that he himself should the same day be beheaded at London. Then, said the protector, in what wise that sorceress and other of her counsel, as Shore’s wife with her affinity, have by their sorcery and witchcraft thus wasted my body: and therewith plucked up his doublet sleeve to his elbow on his left arm, where he showed a wearish withered arm, and small as it was never other. And thereupon every man's mind misgave them, well perceiving that this matter was but a quarrel, for well they wist that the queen was both too wise to go about any such folly, and also, if she would, yet would she of all folk make Shore's wife least of her counsel, whom of all women she most hated as that concubine whom the king her husband most loved.

"Also, there was no man there but knew that his arm was ever such sith the day of his birth. Nevertheless the Lord Hastings, which from the death of King Edward kept Shore's wife, whom he somewhat doted in the king's life, saying, it is said, that he forbare her for reverence toward his king, or else of a certain kind of fidelity toward his friend; yet now his heart somewhat grudged to have her whom he loved so highly accused, and that as he knew well untruly; therefore he answered and said, Certainly, my lord, if they have so done they be worthy of heinous punishment. What! (q<sup>d</sup> the protector,) thou servest me, I ween, with if and with and: I tell thee they have done it, and that will I make good on thy body, traitor: and therewith (as in a great anger) he clapped his fist on the board a great rap; at which token given, one cried treason without the chamber, and therewith a door clapped, and in came rushing men in harness, as many as the chamber could hold; and anon the protector said to the Lord Hastings, I arrest thee, traitor! What, me, my lord? q<sup>d</sup> he. Yea, thee traitor, q<sup>d</sup> the protector; and one let fly at the Lord Stanley, which shrunk at the stroke, and fell under the table, or else his head had been cleft to the teeth, for as shortly as he shrank yet ran the blood about his ears. Then was the Archbishop of York, and Doctor Morton Bishop of Ely, and the Lord Stanley, taken, and divers other, which were bestowed in divers chambers, save the Lord Hastings (whom the protector commanded to speed and shrive him apace), For by Saint Paul (q<sup>d</sup> he) I will not dine till I see thy head off. It booted him not to ask why, but heavily he took a priest at a venture and made a short shrift, for a longer would not be suffered, the protector made so much haste to his dinner, which might not go to it till this murder were done for saving of his ungracious oath. So was he brought forth into the green beside the chapel within the Tower, and his head laid down on a log of timber that lay there for building of the chapel, and there tyrannously stricken off, and after his body and head were interred at Windsor by his master, King Edward the Fourth, whose souls Jesu pardon. Amen."

The scene upon the Tower walls, where Gloster and Buckingham appear in "rotten armour, marvellous ill-favoured," has its origin in the following description of their practice upon the credulity of the citizens, showing themselves in "old evil-favoured briganders, such as no man would ween that they would have vouchsafed to have put on their backs, except some sudden necessity had constrained them:"—

"Now flew the fame of this lord's death through the city and farther about, like a wind in every man's ear; but the protector immediately after dinner, intending to set some colour upon the matter, sent in all the haste for many substantial men out of the city into the Tower, and at their coming himself with the Duke of Buckingham stood harnessed in old evil-favoured briganders, such as no man would ween that they would have vouchsafed to have put on their backs, except some sudden necessity had constrained them. Then the lord protector showed them that the Lord Hastings and other of his conspiracy had contrived to have suddenly destroyed him and the Duke of Buckingham there the same day in counsel, and what they intended farther was yet not well known; of which their treason he had never knowledge before x of the clock the same forenoon, which sudden fear drave them to put on such harness as came next to their hands for their defence, and so God help them! that the mischief turned upon them that would have done it, and thus he required them to report. Every man answered fair, as though no man mistrusted the matter, which of truth no man believed."

The seventh scene, one of the most skilfully conducted of the whole play, may be traced in very minute particulars to the graphic historian:—

"When the duke had said, and looked that the people, whom he hoped that the mayor had framed before, should, after this flattering proposition made, have cried King Richard! King Richard! all was still and mute, and not one word answered to; wherewith the duke was marvellously abashed, and taking the mayor near to him, with other that were about him privy to the matter, said unto them softly, What meaneth this that the people be so still? Sir, quod the mayor, percase they perceive you not well. That shall we amend, quod he, if be that will help; and therewith somewhat louder rehearsed the same matter again, in other order and other words, so well and ornately, and nevertheless so evidently and plain, with voice, gesture, and countenance so comely and so convenient, that every man much marvelled that heard him, and thought that they never heard in their lives so evil a tale so well told. But were it for wonder, or fear, or that each looked that other should speak first, not one word was there answered of all the people that stood before; but all were as still as the midnight, not so much rouning* among them, by which they might seem once to commune what was best to do. When the mayor saw this, he, with other partners of the counsel, drew about the duke, and said that the people had not been accustomed there to be spoken to but by the recorder, which is the mouth of the city, and haply to him they will answer. With that the recorder, called Thomas Fitz William, a sad man and an honest, which was but newly come to the office, and never had spoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to begin, notwithstanding, thereunto commanded by the mayor, made rehearsal to the commons of that which the duke had twice purposed himself; but the recorder so tempered his tale that he showed everything as the duke his words were, and no part of his own: but all this no change made in the people, which alway after one stood as they had been amazed. Whereupon the duke roused with the mayor, and said, This is a marvellous obstinate silence; and therewith turned to the people again, with these words:—Dear friends, we come to move you to that thing which peradventure we so greatly needed not, but that the lords of this realm and commons of other parts might have sufficed, saying such love we bear you, and so much set by you, that we would not gladly do without you that thing in which to be partners is your weal and honour, which as to us seemeth you see not or weigh not; wherefore we require you to give us an answer, one or other, whether ye be minded, as all the nobles of the realm be, to have this noble prince, now protector, to be your king? And at these words the people began to whisper among themselves secretly, that the voice was neither loud nor base, but like a swarm of bees, till at the last, at the nether end of the hall, a bushment of the duke's servants, and one Nashfield, and other belonging to the protector, with some prentices and lads that thrusted into the hall amongst the press, began suddenly at men's backs to cry out as loud as they could, King Richard! King Richard! and then threw up their caps in token of joy, and they that stood before cast back their heads marvelling thereat, but nothing they said. And when the duke and the mayor saw this manner, they wisely turned it to their purpose, and said it was a goodly cry and a joyful to hear every man with one voice, and no man saying nay. Wherefore friends, (quod the duke,) sith we perceive that it is all your whole minds to have this noble man for your king, whereof we shall make his grace so effectual report that we doubt not but that it shall redound to your great wealth and commodity. We therefore require you that to-morrow ye go with us, and we with you, to his noble grace, to make our humble petition and request to him in manner before remembered.

"Then on the morrow the mayor and aldermen and chief commons of the city, in their best manner apparelled, assembled them together at Paul's, resorted to Baynard's castle, where the protector lay, to which place also, according to the appointment, repaired the Duke of Buckingham, and divers nobles with him, besides many knights and gentlemen. And thereupon the duke sent word to the lord protector of the being there of a great honourable company to move a great matter to his grace. Whereupon the protector made great difficulty to come down to them, except he knew some part of their errand, as though he doubted, and partly mistrusted, the coming of such a number to him so suddenly, without any warning or knowledge whether they came for good or harm. Then, when the duke had showed this to the mayor and other, that they might thereby see how little the protector looked for this matter, they sent again by the messenger such loving message, and therewith so humbly besought him to vouchsafe that they might resort to his presence to purpose their intent, of which they would to none other person any part disclose. At the last he came out of his chamber, and yet not down to them, but in a gallery over them, with a bishop on every hand of him, where they beneath might see him and speak to him, as though he would not yet come near them till he wist what they meant. And thereupon the Duke of Buckingham first made humble petition to him, on the behalf of them all, that his grace would pardon them, and license them to purpose unto his grace the intent of their coming without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained they durst not be so bold to move him of that matter; in which, albeit they meant as much honour to his grace as wealth to all the realm beside, yet were they not sure how his grace would take it, whom they would in no wise offend. Then the protector, as he was very gentle of himself, and also longed sore apparently to know what they meant, gave him leave to purpose what him liked, verily trusting for the good mind that he bare them all, none of them anything would intend to himward, wherewith he thought to be grieved. When the duke had this leave and pardon to speak, then waxed he bold to show him their intent and purpose, with all the causes moving them thereto, as ye before have heard; and finally, to beseech his grace that it would like him, of his accustomed goodness and zeal unto the realm, now with his eye of pity to behold the long continued distress and decay of the same, and to set his gracious hand to the redress and amendment thereof, by taking upon him the crown and governance of the realm according to his right and title lawfully descended unto him, and to the laud of God, profit and surety of the land, and unto his grace so much the more honour and less pain, in that that never prince reigned upon any people that were so glad to live under his obeisance as the people of this realm under his.

* To roun, or round, is to speak privately.

“When the protector had heard the proposition he looked very strangely thereat, and made answer, that albeit he knew partly the things by them alleged to be true, yet such entire love he bare to King Edward and his children, and so much more regarded his honour in other realms about than the crown of any one, of which he was never desirous, so that he could not find in his heart in this point to induce to their desire, for in all other nations where the truth were not well known it should peradventure be thought that it were his own ambitious mind and device to depose the prince and to take himself the crown, with which infamy he would in no wise have his honour stained for any crown, in which he had ever perchance perceived much more labour and pain than pleasure to him that so would use it, as he that would not and were not worthy to have it. Notwithstanding, he not only pardoned them of the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the love and hearty favour they bare him, praying them for his sake to bear the same to the prince under whom he was and would be content to live, and with his labour and counsel, as far as it should like the king to use it, he would do his uttermost devoir to set the realm in good estate, which was already in the little time of his protectorship (lauded be God!) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before the occasion of the contrary, and of new intended to be, were now, partly by good policy, partly more by God his special providence than man’s provision, repressed and put under.

“Upon this answer given, the Duke of Buckingham by the protector his licence a little rounded, as well with other noble men about him as with the mayor and recorder of London. And after that (upon like pardon desired and obtained) he showed aloud unto the protector, for a final conclusion, that the realm was appointed that King Edward his line should no longer reign upon them, both that they had so far gone that it was now no surety to retreat, as for that they thought it for the weal universal to take that way, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore, if it would like his grace to take the crown upon him, they would humbly beseech him thereunto, and if he would give them a resolute answer to the contrary, (which they would be loth to hear,) then must they seek, and should not fail to find, some other nobleman that would. These words much moved the protector, which, as every man of small intelligence may wit, would never have inclined thereto; but when he saw there was none other way but that he must take it, or else he and his both to go from it, he said to the lords and commons, Sith it is we perceive well that all the realm is so set (whereof we be very sorry), that they will not suffer in any wise King Edward his line to govern them, whom no man earthly can govern against their wills: and we also perceive that no man is there to whom the crown can by so just title appertain as to ourself, as very right heir lawfully begotten of the body of our most dread and dear father Richard late Duke of York, to which title is now joined your election, the nobles and commons of the realm, which we of all titles possible take for most effectual, we be content and agree favourably to incline to your petition and request, and according to the same here we take upon us the royal estate of pre-eminence and kingdom of the two noble realms England and France; the one, from this day forward by us and our heirs to rule, govern, and defend; the other, by God his grace and your good help, to get again, subdue, and establish for ever in due obedience unto this realm of England, the advancement whereof we never ask of God longer to live than we intend to procure and set forth. With this there was a great cry and shout, crying King Richard! and so the lords went up to the king, and so he was after that day called.”

ACT IV.

The tragic story of the murder of Richard’s nephews thus presented itself to Shakspeare:—

“And forasmuch as his mind gave him that, his nephews living, men would not reckon that he could have right to the realm, he thought therefore without delay to rid them, as though the killing of his kinsmen might end his cause and make him kindly king. Whereupon he sent John Green, whom he specially trusted, unto Sir Robert Brakenbury, constable of the Tower, with a letter and credence also, that the same Sir Robert in any wise should put the two children to death. This John Green did his errand to Brakenbury, kneeling before Our Lady in the Tower; who plainly answered that he would never put them to death to die therefore. With the which answer Green returned, recounting the same to King Richard at Warwick, yet on his journey; wherewith he took such displeasure and thought, that the same night he said to a secret page of his, Ah, whom shall a man trust? they that I have brought up myself, they that I weened would have most surely served me, even those fail me, and at my commandment will do nothing for me. Sir, quoth the page, there lieth one in the pallet chamber without, that I dare well say, to do your grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that he would refuse meaning by this James Tyrrel.”

“James Tyrrel devised that they should be murdered in their beds, and no blood shed; to the execution whereof he appointed Miles Forest, one of the four that before kept them, a fellow flesh bred in murder beforetime; and to him he joined one John Dighton, his own horsekeeper, a big, broad, square, and strong knave. Then, all the other being removed from them, this Miles Forest and John Dighton about midnight, the sely children lying in their beds, came into the chamber, and suddenly lapped them up amongst the clothes, and so bewrapped them and entangled them, keeping down by force the feather-bed and pillows hard unto their mouths, that within awhile they smothered and stifled them; and their breaths failing, they gave up to God their innocent souls into the joys of heaven, leaving to the tormentors their bodies dead in the bed; which after the wretches perceived, first by the struggling with the pangs of death, and after long lying still, to be thoroughly dead, they laid the bodies out upon the bed, and fetched James Tyrrel to see them; which when he saw them perfectly dead, he caused the murderers to bury them at the stair foot, meetly deep in the ground, under a great heap of stones.

“Then rode James Tyrrel in great haste to King Richard, and showed him all the manner of the murder; who gave him great thanks, and, as men say, there made him knight.”

It forms no part of our duty to enter into the inquiry whether the narrative of More is supported by other authorities; nor, further, whether the bones which were found in the reign of Charles II. were those of the unfortunate princes. Tradition represents the event to have taken place in what is still called “The Bloody Tower.” Upon these old legends little historical reliance can be placed; but they still belong to the province of poetry.

The remarkable scene (Scene IV.) between Richard and the widow of Edward IV. has its foundation in the following narrative of Hall:—

“There came into his ungracious mind a thing not only detestable to be spoken of in the remembrance of man, but much more cruel and abominable to be put in execution: for when he resolved in his wavering mind how great a fountain of mischief toward him should spring if the Earl of Richmond should be advanced to the marriage of his niece, (which thing he heard say by the rumour of the people that no small number of wise and witty personages enterprised to compass and bring to conclusion,) he clearly determined to reconcile to his favour his brother's wife, Queen Elizabeth, either by fair words or liberal promises, firmly believing, her favour once obtained, that she would not stick to commit and lovingly credit to him the rule and governance both of her and her daughters; and so by that means the Earl of Richmond of the affinity of his niece should be utterly defrauded and beguiled. And if no ingenious remedy could be otherwise invented to save the innumerable mischiefs which were even at hand and like to fall, if it should happen Queen Anne his wife to depart out of this present world, then he himself would rather take to wife his cousin and niece the Lady Elizabeth, than for lack of that affinity the whole realm should run to ruin, as who said, that if he once fell from his estate and dignity the ruin of the realm must needs shortly ensue and follow. Wherefore he sent to the queen, being in sanctuary, divers and often messages, which first should excuse and purge him of all things before against her attempted or procured, and after should so largely promise promotions innumerable and benefits, not only to her, but also to her son Lord Thomas Marquis Dorset, that they should bring her, if it were possible, into some wanhope, or, as some men say, into a fool's paradise. The messengers, being men both of wit and gravity, so persuaded the queen with great and pregnant reasons, then with fair and large promises, that she began somewhat to relent and to give to them no deaf ear, insomuch that she faithfully promised to submit and yield herself fully and frankly to the king's will and pleasure."

The suspicions of Richard increased as his dangers thickened around him. Hall says:—

"Amongst the noblemen whom he most mistrusted, these were the principal:—Thomas Lord Stanley, Sir William Stanley his brother, Gilbert Talbot, and vi hundred other, of whose purposes although King Richard were ignorant, yet he gave neither confidence nor credence to any one of them, and least of all to the Lord Stanley, because he was joined in matrimony with the Lady Margaret, mother to the Earl of Richmond, as afterward apparently ye may perceive. For when the said Lord Stanley would have departed into his country to visit his family, and to recreate and refresh his spirits (as he openly said), but the truth was to the intent to be in a perfect readiness to receive the Earl of Richmond at his first arrival in England, the king in no wise would suffer him to depart before that he had left as an hostage in the court George Stanley, Lord Strange, his first-begotten son and heir."

This appears the foundation of the spirited scene between Stanley and Richard.

ACT V.

The execution of Buckingham is briefly detailed by the chroniclers. They hasten on to the retribution which was preparing for Richard. "Tidings came that the Earl of Richmond was passed Severn, and come to Shrewsbury without any detriment or encumbrance. At which message he (Richard) was sore moved and broiled with melancholy and dolour; and cried out, asking vengeance of them that contrary to their oath and promise had fraudulently deceived him." But with his wonted energy "he determined himself out of hand the same day to occur and resist his adversaries." He was then "keeping his house in the castle of Nottingham." The chronicler proceeds:—"Then he, environed with his satellites and yeomen of the crown, with a frowning countenance and truculent aspect, mounted on a great white courser, followed with his footmen, the wings of horsemen coasting and ranging on every side. And keeping this array, he with great pomp entered the town of Leicester after the sunset." At Leicester Richard slept at a house which still remains. Hutton, in his "Battle of Bosworth Field," thus describes the old house and its appurtenances:—"In the Northgate Street yet stands a large handsome half-timber house, with one story projecting over the other, formerly an inn, the Blue Boar; hence an adjoining street derived its name, now corrupted into Blubber-lane. In one of the apartments Richard rested that night. The room seems to have been once elegant, though now in disuse. He brought his own bedstead of wood, large, and in some places gilt. It continued there 200 years after he left the place, and its remains are now in the possession of Alderman Drake. It had a wooden bottom, and under that a false one, of the same materials, like a floor and its under ceiling. Between these two bottoms was concealed a quantity of gold coin, worth about £300 of our present money, but then worth many times that sum. Thus he personally watched his treasure, and slept on his military chest."

"The Earl of Richmond," says the chronicler, "raised his camp, and departed from Lichfield to the town of Tamworth." Shakspeare carefully follows the localities of the historians:—

"This foul swine
Lies now even in the centre of this isle,
Near to the town of Leicester, as we learn:
From Tamworth thither is but one day's march."

We continue the narrative of Hall:—

"In the mean season King Richard (which was appointed now to finish his last labour by the very divine justice and providence of God, which called him to condign punishment for his scelerate merits and mischievous deserts) marched to a place meet for two battles to encounter, by a village called Bosworth, not far from Leicester, and there he pitched his field, refreshed his soldiers, and took his rest. The fame went that he had the same night a dreadful and a terrible dream; for it seemed to him, being asleep, that he saw divers images like terrible devils, which pulled and hauled him, not suffering him to take any quiet or rest. The which strange vision not so suddenly strake his heart with a sudden fear, but it stuffed his head and troubled his mind with many dreadful and busy imaginations; for incontinent after, his heart being almost damped, he prognosticated before the doubtful chance of the battle to come, not using the alacrity and mirth of mind and of countenance as he was accustomed to do before he came toward the battle. And lest that it might be suspected that he was abashed for fear of his enemies, and for that cause looked so piteously, he recited and declared to his familiar friends in the morning his wonderful vision and terrible dream."

The plan of the battle is minutely detailed in the narratives; and Shakspeare has availed himself, with wonderful accuracy and spirit, of the circumstances attending the disposition of the field.

According to the usual practice of the chroniclers they give us long orations by the respective leaders previous to the battle being joined. Shakspeare has availed himself of some of the most prominent parts of these apparently fictitious compositions. The legend of "Jocky of Norfolk" is told thus by Hall:—"Of the nobility were slain John Duke of Norfolk, which was warned by divers to refrain from the field, insomuch that the night before he should set forward toward the king one wrote on his gate,

'Jack of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dykon thy master is bought and sold.'

The battle and the victory are thus described by Hall with the accustomed spirit of these old masters of our language:—

"He had scanty finished his saying but the one army espied the other. Lord! how hastily the soldiers buckled their helms! how quickly the archers bent their bows and frused their feathers! how readily the billmen shook their bills and proved their staves! ready to approach and join when the terrible trumpet should sound the bloody blast to victory or death. Between both armies there was a great morass, which the Earl of Richmond left on his right hand, for this intent, that it should be on that side a defence for his part; and in so doing he had the sun at his back and in the faces of his enemies. When King Richard saw the earl's company was passed the morass, he commanded with all haste to set upon them; then the trumpets blew and the soldiers shouted, and the king's archers courageously let fly their arrows: the earl's bowmen stood not still, but paid them home again. The terrible shot once passed, the armies joined and came to hand-strokes, where neither sword nor bill was spared; at which encounter the Lord Stanley joined with the earl. The Earl of Oxford in the mean season, fearing lest while his company was fighting they should be compassed and circumvented with the multitude of his enemies, gave commandment in every rank that no man should be so hardy as go above ten foot from the standard; which commandment once known, they knit themselves together, and ceased a little from fighting. The adversaries, suddenly abashed at the matter, and mistrusting some fraud or deceit, began also to pause, and left striking, and not against the wills of many, which had liefer had the king destroyed than saved, and therefore they fought very faintly or stood still. The Earl of Oxford, bringing all his band together on the one part, set on his enemies freshly. Again, the adversaries perceiving that, placed their men slender and thin before, and thick and broad behind, beginning again hardily the battle. While the two forwards thus mortally fought, each intending to vanquish and convince the other, King Richard was admonished by his explorators and espials that the Earl of Richmond, accompanied with a small number of men of arms, was not far off; and as he approached and marched toward him, he perfectly knew his personage by certain demonstrations and tokens which he had learnt and known of other; and being inflamed with ire and vexed with outrageous malice, he put his spurs to his horse, and rode out of the side of the range of his battle, leaving the avant-gardes fighting, and like a hungry lion ran with spear in rest toward him. The Earl of Richmond perceived well the king furiously coming toward him, and, by cause the whole hope of his wealth and purpose was to be determined by battle, he gladly proffered to encounter with him body to body, and man to man. King Richard set on so sharply at the first brunt that he overthrew the earl's standard and slew Sir William Brandon, his standard-bearer, (which was father to Sir Charles Brandon, by King Henry the Eighth created Duke of Suffolk,) and matched hand to hand with Sir John Cheinye, a man of great force and strength, which would have resisted him, and the said John was by him manfully overthrown, and so he making open passage by dint of sword as he went forward, the Earl of Richmond withstood his violence and kept him at the sword's point without advantage longer than his companions other thought or judged; which, being almost in despair of victory, were suddenly recomforted by Sir William Stanley, which came to succours with iii thousand tall men, at which very instant King Richard's men were driven back and fled, and he himself, manfully fighting in the middle of his enemies, was slain and brought to his death as he worthily had deserved."

KING RICHARD III.
